"A life of Mrs. Siddons, by Mr. Campbell the poet, cannot but strongly excite the curiosity of the public. We have read it through with an interest proportionate to the eminence of the parties; we never forget that a man of genius is the author, nor fail to recognize those touches of fine poetic feeling, and especially those felicitous similes, for which Mr. Campbell's criticisms are always remarkable."—Leigh Hunt's London Journal.

"The impress of the immortal genius of the author is visible in every page of this work. In sentiments manly, dignified, and ennobled; in feeling warm, generous, and enthusiastic; in language pure, natural, and classically elegant: the Life of Siddons, by the bard of the 'Pleasures of Hope,' is a book of great, of transcendent merit. It is in one word a pattern of biography."—The Sun.

"But to say only that the work is well written and a faithful portrait of the greatest female tragedian that ever graced the English stage, is to omit perhaps its greatest excellence. The 'Life of Siddons' comprises a great deal of useful, stage, and critical information, respecting the state of the British Drama from the accession of Charles II., with anecdotes of the most celebrated female actors, to our own times; it is further illustrated by notes from the pen of Mrs. Siddons herself."—The Sun.

"One of the most splendid pieces of biography that has ever issued from the press, written at her own express instance, by her intimate friend Campbell, the poet. The work abounds with anecdotes of the most instructive character. To the rising generation, and to all who desire to excel, he clearly demonstrates, that nothing short of unwearied industry, and devotion in the pursuit of their respective callings, can possibly lead to success! The merit of this great work does not consist so much in dates and dry nomenclature, but, as one of our worthy contemporaries justly observes, 'In the many critical disquisitions and pleasing illustrations in which he (Mr. Campbell) has indulged, greatly to our amusement and delight, and much to the honour of his own taste and judgment. The private Memoranda of the accomplished person, too, whose memory the poet has thought it worthy of his talents to embalm, form a very interesting feature in these volumes, which are, we may say, in a few words, an ornament to our literature of a highly pleasing and instructive character.'—Literary Gazette, 5th July.

THE MUSICAL LIBRARY.

This work appears in numbers every Saturday, Price Fourpence; and in monthly parts, containing 36 pages of music, sewed in a wrapper, price 1s. 6d.

The principle which has been so extensively applied in Literature and the Graphic Art, of producing works at the lowest possible point of cheapness without any abandonment of the qualities by which the popular knowledge and taste may be advanced, has yet a wide field for its employment in the department of Music. This most delightful of the arts was never so generally cultivated in this country as at the present moment. The Pianoforte, especially contributes to the recreation and enjoyment of thousands of families throughout the United Kingdom, and in our colonial possessions. And yet the publications by which this taste ought to be kept up and improved, are sold at a price which, in many cases, amounts to a prohibition.

The design of the 'Musical Library' is to afford the same advantage to amateurs in music that the lovers of literature are deriving from the cheap publications for the advancement of real knowledge that are now distributed through every part of the Empire, and are placed within the reach of persons of every condition. It is proposed to publish a Collection of Music, both vocal and instrumental, by the best masters, ancient and modern: the ancient in a state adapted to the improved condition of our musical instruments; and the modern the best, and only the best, that the continent of Europe and our own country can supply. We shall revive and put into an inviting form the compositions of the older classical masters, now only known to a few connoisseurs, keeping in mind the saying of a famous French modiste,—'nothing is so new as that which is forgotten.' At the same time, it will be our further object to naturalise the confessedly good productions of the newest foreign composers, especially of the German masters, by the republication, sometimes with English words, of their best vocal compositions; and also by publishing movements, or extracts, complete in themselves, from such of their instrumental works as are of a length unsuited to the 'Musical Library.' It is also our design, occasionally, to engage composers of the first eminence to supply us with new compositions; and we shall never neglect an opportunity of giving currency to such productions of real genius as may be offered to us by those who have no means of securing extensive circulation to them, and who might be deterred from publishing them on their own account. We thus hope to spread widely a taste for what is excellent in the various departments of the art, and render the best compositions available to the purposes of private society. In the execution of our plan we shall readily keep in view the great principle, that excellence and cheapness are not incompatible. 'The best of civilization is to make good things cheap.'

In the prosecution of these objects, which we may not unjustly consider likely to advance our national enjoyments, a weekly Number containing eight music-folio pages is devoted either to Vocal or Instrumental Music, so that these two classes of compositions may be separately bound. It would involve great practical difficulties to attempt to make every Number complete in itself; but as the intervals of publication between each Number are very short, little inconveniences will be experienced. Each Part, however, will be complete in itself, except under very peculiar circumstances.

Also, price 6d., sewed in a wrapper, to be continued monthly, SUPPLEMENT TO THE MUSICAL LIBRARY, No. 4.

This Supplementary Work may be purchased independently of the Musical Library, which will be complete in itself; but it will form a valuable addition to that publication. It consists of twelve folio pages of letter-press, comprising musical news, foreign and domestic; Reviews of important new musical publications; with memoirs of the Lives, and remarks upon the works, of eminent Composers, and especially of the authors whose productions are published in the 'Musical Library.'

THE PENNY CYCLOPEDIA

Of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge.

Just Published, Part XVII., price 9d.

This work has now been published, with invariable regularity, since Jan. 1833; and the great circulation which it has attained is the best proof of the confidence of the public in the accuracy and completeness of its information. In the commencement of such an undertaking, the Editors, bearing in mind the difficulty of securing at once an efficient body of contributors, recommended to the Committee only to attempt the publication of six numbers in each month. Their present stock of materials, and their reliance upon their numerous coadjutors, founded upon ample experience, have induced them to desire that the work should proceed at a quicker rate. In this they feel satisfied that they only second the wishes of the great body of its purchasers.

The Committee have therefore to announce the following arrangements:—

1. That the First Volume of the Penny Cyclopædia—containing eleven parts—was concluded on the 30th of November; and published on that day, handsomely bound in cloth, lettered at 7s. 6d.
2. That, commencing with December, two numbers of the work will be published regularly every week without supplements, so that sometimes eight, and sometimes ten numbers will appear in each calendar month.
3. That on the 1st of January, 1834, part 12 was published, price 9d. and the monthly parts will be regularly continued at that price.
4. That on the 1st of September, 1834, the second volume, containing eight ninenpenny parts will be published, bound uniformly with vol. I. at 7s. 6d.; and that the future vols. will be completed every eight months.

SUPPLEMENT OF THE LONDON JOURNAL.

As the number of weeks is not always the same in each month, and an irregularity of size, and consequently of price, is thus produced in the monthly sets of a publication like the present, it is proposed in future, that in order to secure five numbers to every set, a Supplement to the London Journal shall appear, whenever requisite. Two numbers of it will be published forthwith, for the purpose of completing the back months of April and June, so that no inequality may be found in the first volume. The Supplement will be written by the Editor; and for some months to come, will consist of a BIOGRAPHICAL AND MISCELLANEOUS HISTORY OF THE STREETS OF LONDON, going through them regularly, and noticing whatever memories they contain, interesting to the lover of Books, of Eminent Men, and of the human species.

ENGLISH MALE COSTUME.

MR. PLANCHÉ'S book, besides being sensibly and amusingly written, in a clear, unaffected style, contains more than would be expected from its title. It narrates the military as well as civil history of British costume, giving us not only the softer vicissitudes of silks and satins, but ringing the changes of helmets, hauberkas, and swords, from the earliest period of the use of armour till the latest; and it will set the public right, for the first time, upon some hitherto mistaken points of character and manners. We have been surprised, for instance, to learn, that our "naked ancestors," (as we supposed them), the ancient Britons, were naked only when they went to battle; and it turns out, that Richard the Third, instead of being one who thought himself was a dandy in his dress, and as particular about his wardrobe, and coronation-gear, as George the Fourth. (See the passage at the end of this Article.) This trait in his character is confirmative, we think, of the traditions respecting his deformity, men who are under that disadvantage being remarkable either for a certain nicety and superiority of taste, moral and personal, if their dispositions are good, or for all sorts of mistakes the other way, under the reverse predicament. Two persons of the greatest natural refinement we ever met with, have had a crook in the shoulder. Richard was an usurper, a man of craft and violence; and his jealousy of the respect of his fellow-men took the unhappier and more glaring turn. He thought to overcome them with his fine clothes and colours, as he had done with his tyranny. Richard partook, it seems, of the effeminate voluptuousness of his brother Edward the Fourth, as Edward partook of Richard's cruelty.

"Not made to court an amorous looking glass,"

Mr. Planché is of opinion, that "the most elegant and picturesque costume ever worn in England," was that of the reign of Charles the First, commonly called the Vandyke dress, from its frequency in the portraits of that artist. The dresses of few periods, we think, in England, surpass those of the Anglo-Saxon times, and of some of the Norman. (See the engravings in the book at pages 22, 103, 121, and 127.) Some of the Anglo-Saxon ladies were dressed with almost as elegant a simplicity as the Greeks. But whatever Mr. Planché may think of the extreme gallantry and picturesqueness of the Vandyke dress, with its large hat and feathers, its cloak and rapier, and its long breeches meeting the tops of the wide boots, its superiority may surely be at least contested by the jewelled and plumed caps, the long locks, the vests, mantles, and hose of the reign of Henry the Seventh; especially if we recollect that they had the broad hats and feathers too, when they chose to wear them, and that they had not the "peaked" beard, nor a steeple crown to the hat. (See the figures at pages 220 and 222; and imagine them put into as gallant bearing, as those in the pictures of Vandyke. See also the portrait of Henry himself, at the beginning of the volume; and the cap, cloak, and vest of the Earl of Surrey, the poet; in the Holbein portrait of him in Lodge's Illustrations.)

It is a curious fact, that good taste in costume has by no means been in proportion to an age's refinement in other respects. Mere utility is a better teacher than mere will and power; and fashions in dress have generally been regulated by those who had power, and nothing else. Shakespeare's age was that of ruffs and puffs; Pope's that of the most execrable of all coats, cocked hats, and waistcoats; lumpy, formal, and useless; a miserable affectation of ease with the most ridiculous buckram. And yet the costume of part of George the Third's reign was perhaps worse, for it had not even the garnish; it was the extreme of mechanical dullness; and the women had preposterous tresses of curls and pomatum on their head, by way of setting off the extremity of dull plainness with that of dull caprice. For the hoop, possibly, something may be said, not as a dress, not as an investment, but as an enclosure. It did not seem so much to disfigure, as to contain, the wearer, —to be not a dress, but a gliding shell. The dancers at Otaheite, in the pictures to Captain Cook's voyages, have some such Lower Houses; and look well in them for the same reason. The body issued from the hoop as out of a sea of flounce and furbelow. It was the next thing to a nymph half hidden in water. The arm and fan reposed upon it, as upon a cloud, or a moving sphere, the fair angel looking serene and superior above it. Thus much we would say in defence of the hoop, properly so called, when it was in its perfection, large and circular, and to be approached like a "hedge of divinity," or the walls of Troy,— not for those masked and minor shapes of the phenomenon, which degenerated into mere appendages, panniers, or side lumps, and reminded you of nothing but their deformity. But it was always a thing fantastic, and fit only for court and ceremony.

Mr. Planché justly cautions one generation against laughing at the fashions of another. He advises such ladies as would "scream" at the dresses of the fourteenth or even eighteenth century, to look into a fashionable pocket-book or magazine for the year 1815 or 20, and then candidly compare notes. Appendages or enclosures are one thing; positive clinging disfigurements another. The ugliest female dress, in our opinion, without exception, was that which we conceive Mr. Planché to allude to, and which confounded all ages and shapes by girdling the gown under the arm-pits! and sticking a little pad at the back almost between the shoulders! It reduced all figures to lumps of absurdity. No well-shaped woman, we may be sure, invented it. A history of the real origin of many fashions would be a curious document. We should find infirmity and unsightliness cheating youth and beauty into an imitation of them, and beaux and belles piquing themselves on resembling the worst points about their cunning elders.

As long as a man wears the modern coat, he has no right to despise any dress. What a thing it is, though so often taken for something "exquisite!" What a horse-collar for a collar! What snips at the collar and lapels! What a mechanical and ridiculous cut about the flaps! What buttons in front that are never meant to button, and yet are no ornament! And what an exquisitely absurd pair of buttons at the back! gravely regarded, nevertheless, and thought as indispensably necessary to every well-conditioned coat, as other bits of metal or bone are to the bodies of savages whom we laugh at. There is absolutely not one iota of sense, grace, or even economy in the modern coat. It is an article as costly as it is ugly, and as ugly as it is useless. In winter it is not enough, and in hot weather it is too much. It is the tailors' remnant and cabbaging of the coats formerly in use, and deserves only to be chucked back to them as an imposition in the bill. It is the old or frock coat cut away in front and at the sides, mounted with a horse-collar, and left with a ridiculous tail. The waistcoat or vest, elongated, and with the addition of sleeves, might supersede it at once, and be quite sufficient in warm weather. A vest reaching to the mid-thigh is a graceful and reasonable habit, and with the addition of a scarf or shawl, would make as handsome, or even brilliant a one, as any body could desire. In winter-time, the same cloaks would do for it, as are used now; and there might be lighter cloaks for summer. But the coat, as it now exists, is a mere nuisance and expense, and disgraces every other part of the dress, except the neck-cloth. Even the hat is too good for it; for a hat is good for something, though there is more chimney-top than beauty in it. It furnishes shade to the eyes, and has not always an ill look, if well-proportioned. The coat is a sheer piece of mechanical ugliness. The frock-coat is another matter, except as to the collar, which, in its present rolled or bolstered shape, is always ugly. As to the great coat, it makes a man look either like a man in a sack, or a shorn bear. It is cloth upon cloth, clumsiness made clumsier, sometimes thrice over,—cloth waistcoat, cloth coat, cloth great coat,—a "three piled hyperbole." It is only proper for travellers, coachmen, and others who require to have no drapery in the way. A cloak is the only handsome over-all.

The neck-cloth is worthy of the coat. What a heaping of monstrosity on monstrosity! The woollen horse collar is bad enough; yet, as if this were not sufficient, a linen one must be superadded. Men must look as if they were twice seized with symbols of apoplexy,—the horse-collar to shorten the neck, and the linen-collar to squeeze it. Some man with a desperately bad throat must have invented the neck-cloth, especially as it had a padding, or pushing in it when it first came up. His neck could not have been fit to be seen. It must have been like a pole, or a withered stalk; or else he was some faded fat dandy, ashamed of his double chin. There can be no objection to people's looking as well as they can contrive, young or old; but it is a little too much to set a fashion, which besides being deformed, is injurious. The man was excusable, because he knew no better; but it is no wonder if painters, and poets, and young Germans, and other romantic personages, have attempted to throw off the nuisance, especially such as have lived in the south. The neck-cloth is ugly, is useless, is dangerous to some, and begets effeminate fear of colds with all. The English, in consequence of their living more in doors than they used, fancy they have too many reasons for muffling themselves up,—not aware that the more they do so, the more they subject themselves to what they dread; and that it is by a general sense of warmth in the person they are to be made comfortable and secure, and not by filling up every crack and cranny of their dress to the very chin.

But some may tell us they cannot feel that general warmth, without thus muffling themselves up. True, if they accustom themselves to it; but it is the custom itself, which is in fault. They can have the warmth without it, if they please; just as well as they can without muffling up their eyes. "How can you go with your body naked?" said a not very wise person to an Indian. "How can you go with your face naked?" said the Indian. "I am used to it," replied the man. "Well, and I am used to the other," rejoined the Indian; "I am all face." Now it will not exactly do to be "all face," in a civilized country;—the police would object;—Piccadilly is not Paradise. But then it is not necessary to be all muffle.

The ladies in the reign of Edward I. once took to wearing a cloth round their throats and ears, in a way which made a poet exclaim, "Par Dieu! I have often thought in my heart, when I have seen a lady so closely tied up, that her neck-cloth was nailed to her chin." There is a figure of her in Mr. Planché's book, p. 115. Now this was the precise appearance of a neck-cloth some years back, when it was worn with a pad or stiffener, and the point of the chin responded in it: nay, it is so at present, with many. The stock looks even more stiff and apoplectic, especially if there is a red face above it. When dandies faint, the neck-cloth is always the first thing loosed, as the saying is with a lady.

By the way, the dandies wear stays too! We have some regard for these gentlemen, because they have reckoned great names among them in times of old, and have some very clever and amiable ones now, and manly withal too. They may err, we grant, from an excess of sympathy with what is admired, as well as from mere folly or effeminacy. But whatever approximates a man's shape to a woman's is a deformity. We have seen some of them with hips, upon which they should have gone carrying pails, and cried "milk!" And who was it that clapped those monstrous protuberances upon the bosoms of our brave life-guards? No masculine dandy may be sure. A man's breast should look as if it would take a hundred blows upon it, like a glorious anvil; and not to be deformed with a frightened wadding; still less resemble the bosom that tenderness peculiarly encircles, and that is so beautiful because it is so different from his own.

RICHARD—THE THIRD A DANDY!

[From Mr. Planché's "British Costume."]'

Richard's wardrobe was at all times magnificently furnished; he and the Duke of Buckingham being notorious for their love of dress and finery. A mandate still exists among the Harleian MSS. sent from York by Richard to the keeper of his wardrobe in London, August 31st, 1483, wherein he specifies the costly habits in which he was desirous of exhibiting himself to his northern subjects, with a descriptive detail, which, as Mr. Sharon Turner justly remarks, we should rather look for from the fop that annoyed Hotspur, than from the stern and warlike Richard III.

Richard writes for his short gowns of crimson cloth of gold; "that one with droppue, and that other with nett, lined with green velvet; gowns of green velvet and green satin; doublets of purple and tawny satin, lined with a galarid cloth and outlined with buskes; "a cloke with a cape of violet ingrained, the both lined with black velvet;" and he had also a long gown of purple cloth of gold, wrought with garters and roses, and lined with white damask, which was the gift of the queen.

The poor young prince, by right King Edward V., received for the ceremony of the coronation of his usurping uncle a short gown, made of two yards and three quarters of crimson cloth of gold, lined with black velvet; a long gown of the same stuff, lined with green damask; a shorter gown, made of two yards and a quarter of purple velvet, lined with green damask; a stomacher and doublet, made of two yards of black satin; besides two footcloths, a bonnet of purple velvet, gilt spurs, and magnificent apparel for his henchmen or pages.

To all the officers of state, and to the principal nobility cloth of gold and silver, scarlet cloth, and silks of various colours were given as liveries and perquisites. To "the Duke of Bucks" (Buckingham), who stands first, eight yards of blue cloth of gold, wrought with "droops," eight yards of black velvet, and twelve yards of crimson velvet were delivered as a special gift from the king.

The henchmen or pages of the king and queen wore doublets of green satin, long gowns of crimson velvet, lined with white scarlet, and black bonnets. The king had also provided for them long gowns of white cloth of gold and doublets of crimson satin.

We might fill pages with similar extracts from this book of the wardrobe, but we have extracted as much as is necessary for our present purpose, and refer the curious reader to the document itself, for the description of the horse-furniture, embroideries for banners, pennons, canopies, &c., and all the pomp and circumstance of the gorgeous ceremony amidst which Richard assumed a crown he had no right to wear, and lost, with his life, in twenty-six months from the date of his usurpation.

THE WEEK,

From Wednesday the 30th July to Tuesday the 5th August.

RAIN.

SAINT SWITHIN began his season this month with a puzzle for the old ladies, for he did not rain. However, the old argument was at hand;—he rained somewhere. Upon the principle of this logic, Saint Swithin's dominion is never at an end, and the punster is no longer so cunning, as he took himself to be, when he told a friend, that he would "lend him his umbrella during the whole of the present reign."

We will extract for our country enjoyments, this week, an excellent description of a Rain-storm from Adam the Gardener, the pleasant children's-book lately written by Mr. Clarke, author of Prose Tales from Chaucer. A children's-book it is; but like all works of that sort, which are well done, is worth a man's perusal. The description before us is full of truth and relief. We will begin at the beginning, because there is also a good description of cattle in hot weather, and some worthy hints about bathing and cleanliness.

"Adam," said his father, "I think it will not be many minutes before we have a thunder-storm; the weather is so close, and what little air there is, comes to one's face as if it passed through a bake-house." Adam said he had been lying on his back under the mulberry-tree, without a coat and waistcoat, and with a wet towel on his face, but that it did not make him any cooler. His father said they would go down the river and bathe. As they walked along, they remarked how very troublesome the flies were, stinging their hands and faces angrily, and as if spitefully. They also noticed how bitterly they tormented some cows, standing half up to their legs in a pond under the shade of some ash-trees. They kept hushing their sides with their long tails to no purpose; the little persecutors returned to the same spot the moment the tail passed to the other side. Sometimes they remarked that the animals made all the skin of their bodies to shiver, and this action might rouse up for an instant one or two timid flies, but the remainder of the swarm stuck fast to the hides of the beasts. Now and then a cow would lift up one foreleg and stamp it down again; then, with a hind leg she would kick her belly. Then she would shake one ear, then the other; toss up her head, wink with her eyes, in the corners of which a dozen tormentors were collected. All was to little purpose. "In the hot country of India," said Mr. Stock, "the buffaloes get into the pools in shady spots, and leave no part above the surface of the water but the nose, to allow them to breathe." "If I were one of these cows I would do so too," said Adam. As they were close by the place that was convenient for their bathing, they undressed: the father plunging in first, and shaking his streaming face and hair, as soon as he arose to the surface.

Adam had been a courageous bather in the sea when an infant; he therefore jumped in very freely, but began to be frightened at first, because the water took away his breath, and he could not speak without sobbing; all this, however, went off in less than a minute, and he played about as happy as a duck, and tried to swim. When they came out, and while they were dressing, his father told him to bear in mind as long as he lived, that if he wished to be a healthy man, it was necessary that he should be a cleanly one. "Next to kind and endearing manners," said he, "nothing is more pleasing in man or woman than a delicate cleanliness of person. And one of the surest means of being so, is to bathe regularly during the summer months, and in the winter ones as regularly to use the warm bath. There are few people who do not spend in wine and other luxuries ten times the sum of money, that it would cost to have a warm bath every day, all the year round." As Mr. Stock finished speaking, they heard a very low rumbling, like the noise of a heavy cart on an iron road. Presently they observed from a dark lead-coloured cloud a bright flash, like a fiery snake, dart down upon a distant hill; after waiting for some time, the thunder followed as if it had been the same heavy cart that had fallen, and was afterwards dragged rattling along; then had stopped, then had fallen again, and ended by rumbling till it was out of hearing. The dark cloud all this time was changing its appearance and shape; sometimes it was very ragged at the edges, like wool, pulled or snatched off. Every thing around was quite silent; not even a little bird was heard to whistle. The sheep in the fields huddled their heads together, and bent them down towards the ground. Presently the wind rose all at once with a great roaring, and whirled up the dust of the road in a cloudy pillar; then ceased again, and all was silent. In a few seconds some large drops fell, and immediately after a broad flash burst out of the cloud, followed almost instantaneously by a crashing and tearing, as if houses were being overturned and dashed to pieces; and every now and then there were great bangs heard, like cannon firing off. At the sudden bursting of this thunder clap, some horses in a neighbouring field snorted, started, and galloped away. For a moment or two after the thunder had ceased, there was a dreadful stillness, and then the rain came down in a torrent, driving up the dust of the road, and making a soft noise, as if it fell upon wool, till it was soaked through and beaten down; when it made a quick splashing, and seemed to be lashing the ground.

They had now to run for it, and did not reach home till they were nearly soaked through. The lightning and thunder still continued, and the rain seemed to smoke along the ground, and upon the thatched roof of a shed opposite to their home. Sometimes the thunder sounded very high in the air, as if above the clouds; at others, as if it were down in the road. That which but a few minutes before had been a lovely day, with a blue sky, and stately clouds like snowy rocks that scarcely moved at all, was now one dull, lead-coloured covering. In about an hour it became lighter, and in another hour they had the pleasure to see that stormy cloud sailing away from them, still looking back, with its edges touched by the light of the golden sun. From time to time they heard that the storm had not ceased, though it was not so loud; at length it was so far off, that the thunder made only a low surly rumbling; and the cloud which had before looked so angry, when over and near them, now shone like a snow-covered mountain, with crags and precipices, and deep hollows and caverns. The family all remarked how pleasantly cool the air had become, and how calm; and admired the fresh glittering appearance of the grass, and the leaves of the trees, and the flowers in the sunshine; and they snuffed up with delight the smell of the earth after the rain.

Adam asked a multitude of questions about thunder and lightning, of which his father told him it would be extremely difficult at his age to make him understand the explanation. He, however, informed him that thunder was the report of the lightning, as the noise after the flash of a gun was the report of that. Then he wished to know, how it was that it was so long after the flash that they heard the thunder. "Because," said the father, "sound occupies some time in coming to our ear from a distance. Do you not remember, when you once saw a man driving an iron wedge into the root of a tree, that you heard the blow just after you saw him strike? It was because you were at a short distance from him, and the sound was that length of time coming to your ear. Some clever person discovered, that sound flies one thousand one hundred and fifty feet in a second of time. Therefore with a watch you can tell how far off a storm is, by counting the number of seconds between the flash of lightning and the hearing of the thunder. Or you may make a rough guess by counting the beatings of your pulse in your wrist. About seven beats of an ordinary pulse are about equal to one mile that sound will travel. If, therefore, the instant you see a flash of lightning you were to put your finger to your wrist, and count fourteen pulsations before you hear the thunder, you may know that the storm is somewhat more or less than two miles distant. You ought to know that rule in arithmetic, Adam, it is very easy."

We will conclude this rain by day, with a bit of rain by night, in the shape of some verses

ON THE RAIN OF THE EVENING OF JUNE 28TH.

By the Editor.

Open the window, and let the air
Freshly blow upon face and hair,
And fill the room, as it fills the night,
With the breath of the rain's sweet might.
Hark! the burthen, swift and prone!
And how the odorous fumes are blown!
Stormy Love's abroad, and keeps Hopeful coil for silver sleeps.

Not a blink shall burn to night
In my chamber, of sordid light;
Nought will I have, not a window-pane,
Twist me and the air and the great good rain,
Which ever shall sing me sharp lullabies;
And God's own darkness shall close mine eyes;
And I will sleep with all things blest,
In the pure earth-shadow of natural rest.

BIRTH-DAYS.

(Omitted in our last.) July 25th, (August 6, O. S.) of an ancient family, in Perigord, Fenelon, Archbishop of Cambray, the author of Telemachus, a marvel of a man,—a courtier yet independent, a teacher of royalty who really did teach, a liberal devotee, a saint in polite life. His Telemachus is not a fine poem, as some call it, but it is a beautiful moral novel. He had the courage to advise Louis XIV. not to marry the bigotted Madame Maintenon: and such was the respect borne to his character by the Duke of Marlborough, and the other allied generals, that they expressly exempted his lands at Cambray from pillage, when in possession of that part of Flanders. The utmost fault that could be found with him was, that perhaps the vanity attributed to Frenchmen found some last means of getting into a corner of his nature, in the shape of an over-studiousness of the feelings of others, and an apostolical humility of submission to the religious censures of the Pope! Charming blights, to be sure, in the character of a Catholic priest! The famous Lord Peterborough said of him, in his lively manner, "He was a delicious creature. I was obliged to get away from him, or he would have made me pious."

July 31st, (12th August, O. S.) 1743, at Paris of opulent parents, Anthony Laurence Lavoisier, the celebrated chemist, famous for his discoveries in the elements of fluids. He had the misfortune to be one of the unpopular body of Farmers-General at the French Revolution, and perished in the general sweep of the storm against them. His widow, who had joined in his studies, and was the engraver of some of his plates, married the English economist, Sir Benjamin Thompson, better known by his German title of Count Rumford; but French science was of a more lively nature than that of our Anglo-German, and the parties separated.

August 3d, (15th O. S.) 1699, at Bridgewater, the son of a merchant, Robert Blake, the famous Republican Admiral. He was a disinterested patriot as well as a great commander, and was the first to set that example of putting daring above prudence, which has been found, in naval affairs, to be the most prudent conduct. The poor people of the court of Charles II. dug up his bones at the Restoration, as if to shew that all the great captains, naval as well as military, had been on the other side.

August 4, 1792, at Mayfield Park, Sussex, of an ancient family, Percy Bysshe Shelley. He was not without his errors, especially at the outset of life (who among the speculative and imaginative are apt to be so!); but they originated in an excess of enthusiasm for what he thought just, and in a tendency, otherwise truly philosophical (we mean setting aside the excess) to recur to first principles. His opinions are to be judged from his riper works, the Revolt of Islam, the noble tragedy of the Cenci, &c. and not from an indifferent poem the Queen Mab, which he publicly expressed his regret at having written. Of all men he was the most misconstrued, in its being supposed that he had no religion! In more than one sense of the word, he was all religion,—all for a sense of duty and of divineness; only he would have enlarged the sphere of the dutiful. So far from supposing that this "universal frame was without a mind," he was much inclined, with the pious Bishop Berkeley, to suppose it all mind. He and a friend of his, at the outset of his riper life, mutually converted one another from material and spiritual belief,—Mr. Shelley remaining ever afterwards on the spiritual side! Nothing need be here said of the merit of his writings, which all the world are now acquainted with. But never can the writer of this notice pass his name without adding, that from the moment he first knew him, never did he know a man so kindly, so generous, so unselfish in every part of his conduct, great and small; so that he gave you the idea of sometimes seraphical, and fit to have adorned the company of the selectest and most refined spirits of the ages of Plato or Milton.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XIV.—A SERIOUS JOKE SERIOUSLY RETURNED.

[From the "Familiar Letters of James Howell, Esq." the first popular writer of that kind in the language. He was the son of a clergyman in Caermarthenshire, was born about 1596, and was in employment under Charles I. and II.]

When the Duke of Alva was in Brussels, about the beginning of the tumults in the Netherlands, he had sat down before Hulst in Flanders; and there was a provost-marshal in his army who was a favourite of his, and this provost had put some to death by secret commission from the Duke. There was one Captain Bolea in the army, who was an intimate friend of the provost's; and one evening late he went to the captain's tent, and brought with him a confessor and an executioner, as it was his custom. He told the captain he was come to execute his excellency's commission and martial law upon him. The captain started up suddenly, his hair standing upright, and being struck with amazement, asked him, "Wherein have I offended the duke?" The provost answered, "Sir, I am not to expostulate the business with you, but to execute my commission, therefore I pray prepare yourself, for there are your ghostly father and executioner." So he fell on his knees before the priest, and having done, and the hangman going to put the halter about his neck, the provost threw it away, and breaking into a laughter, told him, "there was no such thing, and that he had done this to try his courage, how he would bear the terror of death." The captain, looking ghastly at him, said, "then, sir, get you out of my tent, for you have done me a very ill office." The next morning the said captain Bolea, though a young man about thirty, had his hair all turned gray, to the admiration of all the world, and the Duke of Alva himself, who questioned him about it; but he would confess nothing. The next year the duke was recalled, and in his journey to the court of Spain, he was to pass by Saragossa; and this captain Bolea and the provost went along with him, as his domestics. The duke being to repose some days at Saragossa, the young old captain Bolea told him, "that there was a thing in that town worthy to be seen by his excellency, which was a casa de loco, a bedlam-house, such as one as there was not the like in Christendom." "Well," said the Duke, "go and tell the warden I will be there to-morrow in the afternoon." The captain having obtained this, went to the warden, and told him the duke's intention; and that the chief occasion that moved him to it was, that he had an unruly provost about him, who was subject oftentimes to fits of frenzy; and because he wished him well he had tried divers means to cure him, but all would not do, therefore he would try whether keeping him close in Bedlam for some days would do him any good. The next day the duke came with a ruffing train of captains after him, amongst whom was the said provost very shining and fine; being entered into the house about the duke's person, captain Bolea told the warden, pointing at the provost, "that's the man;" the warden took him aside into a dark lobby where he had placed some of his men, who muffled him in his cloak, asked upon his sword, and hurried him into a dungeon. The provost had lain there two nights and a day; and afterwards it happened that a gentleman, coming out of curiosity to see the house, peeped into a small grate where the provost was. The provost conjured him as he was a Christian, to go and tell the Duke of Alva his provost was there confined, nor could he imagine why. The gentleman did his errand; and the duke being astonished, sent for the warden with his prisoner; the warden brought the provost in cuerpo, full of straws and feathers, man-like before the duke; who at the sight of him burst into laughter, asked the warden why he had made him prisoner? "Sir," said the warden, "it was by virtue of your excellency's commission, brought me by captain Bolea, who stepped forth and told the duke, "Sir, you have asked me off how these hairs of mine grew so suddenly gray: I have not revealed it to any soul breathing; but now I'll tell your excellency," and so related the passage in Flanders; and added, "I have been ever since beating my brains to know how to get an equal revenge of him, for making me old before my time." The duke was so well pleased with the story, and the wittiness of the revenge, that he made them both friends; and the gentleman who told me this passage, said that the said captain Bolea is now alive, and could not be less than ninety years of age.

FINE ARTS, MUSIC, &c., GALLERY OF PORTRAITS.

Some correspondents, whom we much desire to gratify, express a wish for the revival of those articles upon the current Fine Arts, Music, &c. which we commenced under the head of London, and which were discontinued, partly because we could not find matter piquant enough for them every week. For ourselves, we have always regretted, that owing to this circumstance, and to the additional obstacle of being obliged to go to press sooner than is convenient for the notice of immediate publications, we have not been able to hit upon any plan that should allow us to indulge our own inclinations in the matter. We will not, however, give up the hope of finding one; and meanwhile we must content ourselves with occasional glances. Perhaps we may be able to get up some brief monthly notice, or catalogue raisonné. There is Mr. Major's Cabinet Gallery, now about to close its beautiful collection in two volumes, the last numbers of which daily reproach us, as we look at them, with not having noticed them publicly. We have also made similar remissive acquaintance with the National Gallery of Messrs. Jones and Co., another singularly cheap publication, possessing the advantage of a definite object, for it is confined to the collection known by its title; so that when it is complete, the purchaser will possess, in engravings, all which the public gallery has to show in paintings. These are things worth knowing.

Then there are tickets admitting us to galleries themselves, public and private,—galleries of paintings and galleries of copies from them,—things we have never seen of Raphael, and Titian, and Correggio, and painted windows (a sort of heaven in our eyes) and a card from Dominic Colnaghi, whose name is hereditary in the annals of good taste and capital print-selling. One of the secret reasons why we do not attend directly to all these attractions is, that we know not how to leave off when we once begin. "Brief notices" are apt to get long; catalogues raisonnés run into a delight beyond reason.

In music too, as if we were compelled to neglect and seem scornful of all we love best, we have works lying by us, that call for notice with every species of sweet voice,—Dixons of Mr. Korkell, and Offerings of Praise, and Barnett's Library of Music, and the Musical Library of Kiffert (making strange discord among musicians by its cheapness), and the Concent Music of Mr. Novello, full of chants and masses and other minglements of heaven and earth, rising out of Gregorian chapels, and surmounted with the winged voices of women.

Positively we must have a monthly notice, glance, or catalogue of some sort,—déraisonné, if it must be so,—unreasonable even for its brevity: for who can say enough in honour of things beautiful? We never, for our parts, can express a twentieth, or a hundredth, or a thousandth part of the love we bear them; and nature will acquit us for the inability, if critics will not. We should be glad if those gentlemen could find out the process by which Mozart made a beautiful trio, or nature herself makes a peach or a sweet cheek or Shakespeare wrote of it, or Guido painted it. Look at the beautiful mystery of a common apple hanging on a tree, and say if any combination of human words can do it justice. If men could describe such things worthily, the next thing would be to become gods, and make them. And truly such poets as Shakespeare go nigh to something like divinity, and are but "a little lower than the angels."

There is another publication, connected with the Fine Arts; which we have long reproached ourselves with not noticing; but we have been silent from any reason rather than one derogatory. It was not merely that we did not think it required notice, (nor do we suppose now that it does) but for similar reasons to those above mentioned,—the dislike to say any thing without doing it justice, and the not knowing where to stop in our extracts; a peril of which we have given abundant proof, now that we have begun! We allude to the Portrait Gallery, which is issued under the superintendence of the Society for the Diffusion of Knowledge, and from which we have taken the following ample and interesting memoir of the Prince of German Literature. This work, as far as we have seen, is really admirable in all its characteristics. Its subjects are selected in a truly philosophical spirit, from all nations and parties; the lives are written with a due mixture of zeal and dispassionateness; there is an attractive diversity in the professions and characters which are brought together; the portraits complete our interest in them by adding the charm of a sort of personal intimacy; and the plates are as well engraved, as the lives are well written. Here is a publication worth laying up a man's money to buy. We read, some time back, in one of the Penny Magazines of a journeyman carver and gilder, who having an understanding worthy of the productions which it was often his good luck to make frames for, took to spending his savings upon the lasting enjoyments of etchings and prints, instead of the fugitive ones of the tap-room; and succeeded in getting together a handsome collection. We can easily believe it, especially as a man, with a taste well directed, may often pick up excellent things of this kind for a comparative nothing. The other day, from among a set of penny scraps, in a print-seller's window, we bought a capital little etching after Guercino; which in these days of denarian elegance, has given us some thoughts of getting up a Penny Gallery! (say of any sums calculated in pence, up to eighteen or twenty pence); and if people knew how much pleasure we have already extracted from our "Guercino," they might admit that it is not every possessor of grander galleries who could beat us in enjoyment, whatever advantages he may have over us in paying more for the reputation of it. One good thing produces a desire for another. We wish it also supplied the means of getting it. Those who began with Penny Galleries, and Magazines, and the Mirror, and Mr. Chambers, should then ascend to Portrait and Cabinet Galleries, to Musical Libraries, and to Convent Music; and at the end of all, they should buy the London Journal or they shall begin with it, if they please (we have no objection), seeing that we have something to tell them about all.

We remember, on the first appearance of the Portrait Gallery, how pleased we were to see three such different, yet such interesting men brought together as Dante, Davy, and Kosciuszko! a great poet, a scientific discoverer, and an heroic patriot. In the number before us the contrast is not so obviously striking, but it is considerable too. With all the merits of Vauban the engineer, and King William the Third, Goethe has enough in him to furnish sufficient contrast to both of them, or to any half dozen men of action, in the ordinary sense of the word. And the number which will be publishing when this notice appears, contains a similar diversity, though the proportion of the active spirit is reversed,—Coreggio, Napoleon, and Linnaeus!—the very spirit of war between two of the most peaceful of mankind.

We proceed to lay before our readers the extract alluded to. It is very long, but we did not know what to leave out; and we trust, for our excuse, to the singular spectacle it presents, for the first time in the history of the world, of a great poet passing a life of prosperity in the circle of a prince. The position was not without its perils, as we have noticed in our remarks in another column; but it had its preferment too, even for the cause of mankind! and for the singularity of it, we might have put it among our Romances of Real Life.

MEMOIR OF GOETHE.*

From the Twenty-sixth Number of the "Gallery of Portraits."

If the opinion of his contemporaries become the judgment of posterity, the name of Goethe is destined to occupy, in future ages, that pre-eminent station in the literary history of Germany which is now undisputedly held in their respective nations; by Shakespeare, Dante, and Cervantes. Until this judgment be pronounced by the final tribunal, we may characterize him as the happiest of great poets. He attained a length of years granted to few; and his long life was spent in successful literary labour, not imposed by necessity, but prompted by the suggestions of his own genius and love of art. Nature had endowed him with the much prized gifts of bodily strength and personal beauty. He indulged freely in the pleasures of society; associated with his superiors in station as their equal; lived in ease and affluence; and, finally, in exception to the general rule, enjoyed during his life,

"The estate that wits inherit after death."

The founders of the new theory of poetics in Germany, the Schlegels, have characterized his genius as universal. Its productions, including posthumous works, will occupy fifty-five volumes of works of imagination and science, and cannot be even named by us individually. A few of these works which have occasioned volumes of criticism, we shall be constrained to designate in brief sentences, and we shall as briefly advert to the main incidents of the author's life.

Johann Wolfgang von Goethe was born of affluent parents, August 28, 1749, at Frankfort on the Main. He attended successively the universities of Leipzig and Strassburg; and, in 1771, took a doctor's degree in jurisprudence; but from his early youth literature was his ruling passion. In his twenty-fourth year, he had already acquired unexampled popularity by his original and daring tragedy of Goetz von Berlichingen, published in 1773. In 1774 he gained a European celebrity by the 'Sorrows of Werter'; and he had already rendered himself an object of admiration to the young, and of terror to the timid, by the publication of several pungent satirical writings, when his good genius guided to the vicinity of Frankfort the young Duke of Saxe Weimar, who was about to assume the government on coming of age. In accepting the friendship, and taking up his residence at the court of this prince, Goethe entered on an unvarying career of prosperity. For a few years the young Duke and his friend led a life of gaiety, of which there are many curious anecdotes current in Germany; but, during a joyous and somewhat wild life, the intellectual singularly prevailed over the sensual. Even during that course of dissipation, the most important of Goethe's works were commenced, though none of them were published until after his return from Italy. That country he visited in 1786, and to the time which he spent in it he ever after recurred with delight. Though Shakespeare was the individual poet he most prized, and Greek the literature which he held up as the rule of all excellence, Italy was the land of his affections. He remained two winters in Rome. Here he cultivated the studies of archaeology and the fine arts, which he had begun to practice in his youth, but now abandoned for poetry and the study of nature.

To these pursuits, on his return to Germany he applied as the chief business of his life; and the insignificance of the patron as a sovereign tended to render the poet more conspicuous, and to increase his power over the minds of the Germans. The duke was a general in the Prussian service, and, as a minor power, followed the course of policy pursued by the head of his house, the Elector of Saxony. He could not indulge in ambition, and spent his small revenue more like a private nobleman than a sovereign prince. He was desirous to collect a library for the use of himself and the students of Weimar. He had mines on one portion of his small territory. With the other dukes of Saxony he was jointly the possessor of a University, Jena. He wished to found a school of drawing; and the creation of a German theatre, and the collecting of eminent men of all kinds at Weimar and Jena, were the especial objects of his ambition. In all these things Goethe was the right hand to execute, if his, in fact, was not the mind to design. In the matters which most governments make their prime concern, such as finances, military affairs, and courts of justice, Goethe had certainly no inclination to take any part; for he was what, in France, would be called a minister of public instruction. Scarcely was he settled in his new office, when the French Revolution broke out. This led to one famous exception to the life he was pursuing. He has recorded it in the volume of his 'Memoirs,' relating his participation in the too famous campaign of 1792, when he, as a non combatant, accompanied the Duke of Saxe Weimar, who served under the Duke of Brunswick in his famous march which did not reach to Paris. The early retirement of Prussia from the league against France restored peace to the north of Germany, and Goethe was at liberty to return to his favourite pursuits. In the prosecution of these he had the happiness soon to connect himself with Schiller, a man ten years younger than himself; of a genius totally opposite to his own, and therefore perhaps best adapted to act in concert with him.

* The pronunciation of the dissyllable Goethe varies even with German scholars in this country, according to the diversity of their organs or provincial speech. Some call it Gayte, others Gheute (with a kind of French u), others Gute at once. The middle seems the nearest. The closest hit of all would be made by a rapid but delicate articulation of the o and e, uniting them into a sort of u, and yet intimating their distinction. The name is sometimes written with two dots over the o (Goëthe), in which case the e is omitted, the dots supplying its place.

Goethe has, with delighted frankness, related how, exceedingly disliking the 'Robbers,' Schiller's first, worst, and most famous play, and feeling a strong aversion towards the Kantian philosophy, to which Schiller was attached, he had conceived an antipathy towards the offending poet, whom he resolutely shunned. But having once met, the passionate zeal of Schiller in pursuit of their common objects was irresistible. Dislike subsided into tolerance, and was at last converted into warm admiration and love. Memorable consequences followed from their union, and their literary correspondence remains an instructive example of what may be effected by the collision of powerful minds of opposite character. Schiller died in 1804. During the time allotted to their joint exertions, Goethe produced many of his greatest works, and Schiller all the best of his. During the same period Goethe pursued his philosophical studies with the eminent men who then filled professor's chairs at Jena. The metaphysical systems of Fichte and afterwards of Schelling, which succeeded that of Kant, met with some favour in his eyes. At least, though he kept aloof from the controversies of the day, he laboured to connect with philosophical speculations his own particular studies in various branches of natural history and science.

It was after Schiller's death and when Goethe was approaching his sixtieth year, that the storm of war unexpectedly burst upon Weimar and Jena. He did not leave Weimar; but aware of the peril to which he with every one was exposed, on the very day of the battle of Jena, he married a lady with whom he had lived for many years, and at the same time legitimated his only child, a son. During the short period of extreme degradation into which Prussia and Saxony sunk, from 1806 till the fall of Buonaparte in 1813, he withdrew, as much as possible, from political life; he would not suffer newspapers to be brought him, or politics to be discussed in his presence, but fled to the arts and sciences as an asylum against the miserable realities of life. Such had always been his practice. He has said of himself that he never had a disease of the mind which he did not cure by turning it into a poem. In his early youth, having lost a mistress through foolish petulance of temper, he, as a penance, made his own folly the subject of a comedy. And, in after life, while Europe was convulsed, he was absorbed in studies independent of the incidents of the day. Thus varying his pursuits, he kept on his serene course with no other interruptions than such as inevitably befall those who attain old age. It was his lot to survive the associates of his youth. In 1827, he lost his early friend, from whom he had never been estranged, the Grand Duke of Saxe Weimar. In 1830, he met with a severer privation in the death of his son, at Rome. It was feared that this calamity would prove fatal to Goethe, whose strength was sensibly declining; but he survived the blow, and enjoyed the best consolation which could be afforded to him in the exemplary care of his amiable and gifted daughter-in-law, and in his two young grand-children, to whom he was tenderly attached. His last years were spent in cheerful retirement. He possessed an elegant and spacious house in Weimar, but he also had a cottage in the park, where he dwelt alone, receiving his friends Mis-à-Mis; and, on particular occasions, going into the town to entertain company. He retained his faculties to the last, and made a very precise disposition of his property. His extensive collections in natural history and art were directed to be preserved as a museum for twenty years. These were among the objects of his latest solicitude. He died, March 24, 1832, in the eighty-third year of his age.

Goethe's figure was commanding, and his countenance severely handsome. He appears to have acquired a great ascendancy over his fellow-students at the universities, and to have kept the professors in awe. In after life he was reproached by Bürger and others with haughtiness, and was accused of making his inferiors in station and in genius too sensible of their inferiority; but his powers of captivation were irresistible when he chose to exert them. His social talents were of the highest order. Such was Goethe for his own generation and country. To posterity he will live chiefly as a poet. Of his most remarkable works we will now speak, not chronologically, but according to the classes which are recognized by systematic writers.

In epic poetry his pretensions will be derided by those who adhere to the theory of M. Bossu, adopted by Pope. According to this, the common opinion, the 'Epos' requires supernatural machinery, illustrious actors, and heroic incident. The German critics, on the contrary, maintain that the essential character of the Hæthoric poetry lies in the epic style, not in the subject of the narrative, a style analogous to that of Herodotus, whom they place at the head of the epic historians, and to be found in a very large portion of our own ancient ballads, such as relate to Robin Hood, Chevy Chase, &c. Goethe, on this idea, began a continuation of the 'Iliad' in his 'Achilles,' and he threw the graces of his own style over the old fable of 'Reynard the Fox.' But it was in 'Herman and Dorothea' that he displayed all his powers: this is both a patriotic and domestic tale; the characters in humble life; the incident, a flight over the Rhine on the invasion of the French. It abounds in maxims of moral wisdom, and in pathos; but it is too national to bear translating.

It is as a lyric poet that Goethe is popular in the fullest sense of the word, and may challenge comparison with the greatest masters of all ages. In the song, he abounds in masterpieces, passionate and gay. His elegy has sometimes the erotic character of Propertius, (as in the famous 'Roman Elegies') and sometimes emulates the refinement and purity of Petrarch: his ballads are as wild and tender as any that Spain or Scotland have produced. His very numerous epigrams bear more resemblance to the Greek Anthology, than to the pointed style of the Latin writers. Besides these, he has produced a number of allegorical and enigmatical poems on art and philosophy, which cannot be placed under any known class.

Goethe's dramatic works are about twenty in number. There is this peculiarity in his career as a dramatic poet, that though the drama is essentially the most popular branch of poetry, he never wrote for the people: his plays are all experiments, and no two resemble each other; he seems to be unaffectedly indifferent to their reception on the stage. His first juvenile play 'Goetz von Berlichingen,' was in prose and unlike anything that had appeared on the German boards. It exhibited in a strong light the manners of the Germans at a romantic period when the petty barons and knights were a sort of privileged freebooters, sometimes generously resisting the oppression of the emperor and the higher nobility, and sometimes plundering the citizens of the free towns. The style was in harmony with the subject, daring in its originality, and all but licentious in its freedom. By audiences accustomed only to pedantic imitations of the French, it was received with tumultuous applause; but the admiration of the more cultivated classes was given to the 'Iphigenia in Tauris,' an echo, as Schlegel expresses it, of the Greek, yet neither a translation nor a copy. Christian purity of morals harmoniously blending with pagan incident, not a line disturbs the exquisite symmetry of this, the most generally admired of Goethe's dramas.

Not less perfect in style is the anomalous 'Torquato Tasso,' which deserves especial notice, though not as a play adapted to the stage: it is rather a didactic poem in dialogue than a drama. Tasso and the warrior statesman Antonio, exhibit in contrast the poetical character and that of the man of the world. It could secure the attention of an audience only when performed on the duke's private theatre, where the members of the ducal family usually represented the princes of the House of Este, and Goethe himself acted the part of Tasso; and when it was performed as a sort of funeral obsequies on the death of the poet himself.

'Egmont' is an historical play in prose, founded on the real tragedy, by the bloody Alva in Belgium. Its most remarkable feature is the unheroic character of Egmont himself. While William of Orange is the common stage hero: patriotic and wise, destined to save his country, Count Egmont is the warm-hearted, sensual, and munificent nobleman, a patriot not from reflexion but impulse, whose love for the humble Clara is much more prominent than his patriotism, and who is therefore doomed to perish. The pathos lies in the dissonance between the man and the necessities of his position. Goethe, in drawing such a character, probably thought of Hamlet, of whom he makes an analogous remark.

We pass over a number of dramas, all original, all experiments in furtherance of his own studies, and name only 'Faustus' the unique, the undefinable. Begun in youth, continued at intervals during a long life, and finally left unfinished, it has been called a grotesque tragedy. Who knows not the popular legend of the learned magician who sold his soul to the devil? This coarse tale of vulgar superstition is here used as a vehicle into which the adventurous poet has cast all that "Perilous stuff that weighs upon the heart."

The erring philosopher is attended on the wrong road by a laughing devil, Mephistopheles, who leads him through scenes of the wildest frolic and the most appalling wretchedness. All that is most deplorable, most frightful in human life, is here displayed with the running comment of the demon whom omnipotence does not confound; and the most awful problems of divinity and moral philosophy are treated with pathetic sadness by the wretched victim, or with infernal satire by his master slave. These repulsive elements are nevertheless combined with the soothing, not to say a sanctifying influence of Margaret, a confiding, loving, innocent woman, whose very destruction works on the heart like an act of grace, and prepares the spectator for the promised salvation of her lover.

In the romance as in the drama, Goethe commenced a career which he immediately abandoned. His Werter breathes a spirit of dissatisfaction with the world and its institutions. But by writing that book which infected the rising generation with the same spirit, he cured himself of the disease; and he then became the declared foe of the sentimental, which he attacked in his romantic comedy 'The Triumph of Sentimentality.'

In latter years, when he was become the meditating philosopher, and, at the same time indulged in more cheerful contemplations of life, he produced 'Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship,' intended to elucidate problems of psychology. The stage being the symbol of life, his hero is thrown among players, and both the real drama and the drama of life are analyzed, with perpetual illustrations of the one by the other. After an interval of some years, Goethe, in a second part, exhibited his pupil advanced on a sort of journey. Conscious that his problem, like that of Faustus, was insoluble, he has not dared to exhibit Faustus in heaven or Wilhelm as a master. Like the Faustus, Wilhelm Meister is still 'caviare to the million.'

In a third romance, 'Elective Affinities,' Goethe treats subtly of that passion to which Lord Bacon says 'the stage is more beholden than the life of man.' As the chemical title suggests, he shews how the felicity of a married couple is marred by the intrusion of other minds, with which each consort has more affinity than the companion previously chosen.

When 'Wilhelm Meister' first appeared, the narrative of Wilhelm's childhood was related with such spirit and air of truth, that it was believed to be the author's own personal history; and, in truth, the resemblance between the real and feigned history was soon made manifest by the appearance of Goethe's own memoir, under the puzzling title 'From my Life: Fiction and Truth,' so entitled to allow for the unconscious illusions to which we are exposed, when, in advanced life, we try to recollect the occurrences of childhood, and unintentionally confound memory with imagination. These memoirs, including his foreign travels, amount already to nine volumes, and others are to follow; but these earlier volumes treat solely of the author's intellectual life. Concerning much that men are inquisitive about he says nothing. Not a hint is dropped concerning the fortune of his father, or the amount of profit which he himself derived from his writings. His being ennobled was an incident which he thought too unimportant for notice; and of honours and distinctions conferred on him he seldom condescends to speak.

Among the studies which partook of Goethe's attention were antiquities and the fine arts. This led to the composition of a masterpiece, his critical characteristic of Winkelmann, and an account of Hackert, the landscape painter. The same course of study led him to translate that delightful work, the autobiography of Benvenuto Cellini, which was first made known to the European public by the Earl of Bristol, late Bishop of Derry, and which is now in the hands of all lovers of the fine arts. On art, in its various branches, Goethe's prose writings are very numerous. As a critic also he has written much, and his criticism is remarkably indulgent and generous.

Such being the variety of works in which he has recorded his speculation on man, his powers, his actions, and his productions, it will be naturally asked what were the main features of his philosophy, and to what results did they lead on those great points which unhappily disunite mankind, religion and politics?

Hume has well designated the great varieties of intellect and moral character by the significant scholastic names of the Platonist, the Stoic, the Epicurean, and the Sceptic. According to the classification, it may be said that Goethe was too devotedly attached to the study of nature and actual life to be a Platonist; he loved contemplation too intensely, and was too indolent and self-indulgent to be a Stoic; he was too intellectual to be a gross sensualist, or, in the worst sense, an Epicurean; and he had too much imagination to be able to tolerate the modern rational philosophy, a mere system of negatives. In so far he was an enemy of vulgar scepticism; yet blended with the refinement which the poetic mind pre-supposes, he had a large portion of Scepticism and Epicureanism in his nature. Towards the positive religion which he found established in his own country he manifested respect, though he never made any distinction of faith upon doctrinal matters; he conformed, however, to the Lutheran church. On two occasions only do we recollect the expression of any strong feeling as to religion. He early betrayed great contempt towards the German Rationalists, whom he rather despised for their shallowness than reproached for their being mischievous. His love of Rome by no means reconciled him to the Church of Rome, against which he would inveigh with a warmth unusual in him.

He maintained that Catholic superstition had deeply injured the poetic character of Calderon, and considered the Protestantism of Shakspeare as a happy accident in the life of that incomparable man. It appears from his memoirs, that Judaism and Christianity had occupied his mind very seriously from his childhood. He delighted in portraying the Christian enthusiast in a tone of kindred enthusiasm, as his 'Confessions of a Beautiful Soul,' of which the original was a Moravian lady, his friend; and it was only in incidental bursts of sarcasm, especially in his gayer poems, that he assumed the timid and the scrupulous; in spite of occasional ebullitions of spleen or rash speculation, he was habitually hostile towards the French anti-religious party. He makes his devil in Faustus describe himself as 'the spirit that always denies, in the same way that Abler scornfully terms Voltaire 'Disinventeur et inventeur di nuia.' It was this negative, this merely destructive character, to which Goethe was in all things most resolutely opposed.

This sentiment extended to politics. Long before the words 'Conservative' and 'Destructive,' Goethe had made frequently use of them. It was the tendency of his mind to look with indulgence, if not with favour, on whatever he found in the exercise of productive power. Laudo momentum might have been his motto. He saw in the French revolutionists, as in their philosophers, the spirit of destruction, and he clung with affection to institutions under which so many fine arts and rapidly advancing sciences had flourished. With reference to public life, Goethe has been severely reproached on two grounds. He has been accused of wanting patriotism; but before a passion can be generated, an object must be presented. What country had Goethe to love in his youth? A walled city which he could run round before breakfast. The first great political event which he witnessed was the Seven Years' War. His native city was in the possession of the French, whom one party considered as allies and the other as enemies. Goethe's father adhered to Frederick, his grandfather was attached to the Imperial house: at the best he could love but half a nation. Hence Wieland said, 'I have no fellow countrymen; I have only speech-mates' (sprach-genossen.) Thus, German patriotism could be but a sort of corporation spirit; like the affections of a livery-man confined to the members of his company. It was not till the close of the last war that the common oppression exercised by Buonaparte generated a common hatred towards France, and with it something like patriotism on a great scale. Yet so anomalous is the condition of Germany, that at this moment this sentiment, or the loud avowal of it, is looked on as akin to disloyalty; and, at the universities, students are forbidden to frequent clubs, or to assume denominations which have reference to one general national character. There are few appeals among Goethe's writing to national feeling, and, in truth, his studies led him to be, in sentiment, the fellow-citizen of the great poets and artists of all nations, the contemporary of the great men of all ages. The other reproach is, that being admitted with familiarity to princes, he lost his love of the people, as such. Now, it must be owned, that in this respect he felt pretty much as Milton did, in whom attachment to the aristocracy of talent was a marked quality. Of the people, as such, he seems to have thought lowly: his affections were exercised on the select few,—the nobles of nature, not of the herald's office. That he had no vulgar reverence for persons in authority or for the privileged orders, is amply proved by all he wrote. It may finally be remarked, as the most characteristic feature of his moral speculation, that he had habitually contemplated mankind, not as a moralist, but as a naturalist. There are some thinkers who never consider men but as objects of praise or blame; others, who only study men with a view of making them different from what they are. Such are reformers, the leaders of institutions, philanthropists, who think only in order to act. To neither of these classes did Goethe belong. He took men as he found them; he was content to take society as he found it, with all its complex institutions. He was disposed to make the best of what he found, but seemed reluctant to waste his powers in the vain attempt to make men materially different from what they were before; hence arose an inert or indolent acquiescence in what he found existing.

He had early in life laboured to catch a new point of view from which nature might be contemplated on all sides; or a law in conformity with which the manifold operations of nature might be seen as if they were one. He first made this idea known in his 'Metamorphosis of Plants.' His botanical studies were continued for many years of his life. He afterwards busied himself with the minute and experimental study of chromatics. He edited a journal of science, and wrote more or less on mineralogy, geology, comparative anatomy, optics and meteorology. A metaphysical spirit runs through all these writings, so alien from the mode of study pursued in other countries, that we do not recollect any notice of them by any English writer, except Professor Lindley, in his 'Introduction to Botany,' who confines his remarks to Goethe's botanical works. The professor represents Goethe as having revived a nearly forgotten doctrine, first promulgated by Linnaeus. But for thirty years after the first appearance of the 'Metamorphosis,' it produced little or no effect even in Germany. Now, indeed, it has come to be considered the basis of all scientific knowledge of vegetable structure! Whether, in the revolutions of opinion, the bold polemical writings of Goethe against the Newtonian theory of light and colours will ever be looked upon as more than the extravagancies of a great genius wandering out of his own sphere, time will shew. For the present this is the view taken of the great poet's scientific writings, both by Italians and Frenchmen. But whatever dreams he may have mixed up with his investigations, Goethe was no mere dreamer: to the last hour of his life, he made it his business to inform himself of the progress of the sciences in foreign countries. All new books were brought to him, even to the end of his life; he composed elaborate poems at the age of seventy; and when beyond sixty years of age, entered with zeal into the study of Oriental poetry, to apply the spirit of which, to Western notion and feeling, he composed his 'West-Eastern Divan.' In this the infinite variety of his pursuits and studies lay that 'all-sidedness' (if we may be pardoned for adopting such a word from the German), for which he was so remarkable. From the same quality proceeded that unusual toleration of novelties which he could reconcile to the love of what is established. He would not permit a clever facon to be acted on the stage, when he was manager, written in derision of Gall's cranioscopy. Instead of joining in the ridicule against animal magnetism, he would shrewdly investigate its pretensions. When a book on the clouds was published by Howard, in England, Goethe instantly wrote an account of it, inventing appropriate German words to designate the forms pointed out. In his hunger and thirst after knowledge, he was omnivorous. This was the ruling passion strong in death. Only the evening before his decease he received some new books from Paris, by which he was greatly excited. It is said that a volume by Salvandy was grasped in his hand when he died; and his last words were singularly appropriate to his temper, and might be received by his admirers as almost prophetic. He ordered the window shutters to be opened, exclaiming, 'More light! More light!'

Passages from his "Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship."³

In attempting to give the English reader as universal a taste as possible of fine writers, we are of necessity compelled now and then to make use of translations; but we only do it when the translations themselves are fine; and even then there are no persons who would be more anxious than those who are capable of making such versions, to bespeak the candour of criticism, and see that the judgment respecting the original be qualified accordingly. We make this remark, however, in the present instance, purely in deference to what we consider might be the feelings of Mr. Carlyle, the translator of the work before us, who with the modesty natural to a mind of extraordinary perceptions, expresses his solicitude to that effect in the preface. For ourselves, though we do not read German, we see in this version so much strength, delicacy, and diversity of masterly feeling, of all sorts, that we take for granted the agreement of its excellence with its reputation; and indeed we believe that the person most concerned in its being good, was one of those who were most pleased with it; for it is well known that Mr. Carlyle was in correspondence with his illustrious original, and that he was held by him in singular regard and respect.†

We have chosen the present week for giving a specimen of Goethe, in order that it might accompany the memoir of him, taken from the Gallery of Portraits. The reader will there see what is thought of this extraordinary writer in Germany. He will here have a taste of the man himself. Should he wish to complete the acquaintance, as far as versions can procure it, he must read that of the domestic epic of Hermann and Dorothea, by Mr. Holcroft, (though not worthy of the translator's natural powers); the well-known circulating-library work, the Sorrows of Werther (a young production, which Goethe is afterwards said to have laughed at); Walter Scott's version of the drama of Goetz von Berlichingen; the late celebrated prose-translation of the drama of Faust (Dr. Faustus) by Mr. Hayward; Mr. Shelley's noble, though less correct specimen of the same work, in his Posthumous Poems; Goethe's Autobiography (an abridgement however, and said to be badly translated from the French) Mr. Taylor's Historic Survey of German Poetry (containing a great deal of information, translations, &c.) Mrs. Austin's Characteristics of Goethe, translated from various accounts of him by his friends (a work of which we should say more,—for it seems very curious and interesting,—but we have only just seen it for the first time, while correcting this article for the press; and lastly, and Mr. Carlyle's own translation of a Sequel to Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship, called his Travels; which is to be found in Specimens of German Romance, in four volumes, with biographical and critical notices,—a collection that deserves to be better known, and that will be so in proportion as people learn to relish a thinking style of writing, and wish to know how the Germans really express themselves.

From these works, particularly the Faust and the Wilhelm Meister, we have, for our own parts, acquired the very highest ideas of Goethe as a poet, and all but the very highest as a philosopher. He appears to us to have a subtle and sovereign imagination, to be a master in criticism, in manners, and almost always in morals too,—humane, universal, reconciling, provident, yet tolerant of the past, a noble casuist, a genuine assessor of first principles, wise in his generation, and yet possessing the wisdom of the children of light, superior to all sordid conventionalities, superior to all other things erroneously conventional, but one,—and there we have a quarrel with him; though with many it will be his greatest recommendation. Certainly, no man daring to think and speculate as he has done, would have been shewn so much indulgence, opposed as he was at first, if worldly power had not taken him under its wing, and had he not shewn too conventional a taste for remaining there, and falling in with one of its most favoured opinions. He maintained that the great point for society to strain at, was not to advance (in the popular sense of that word) but to be content with their existing condition, and to labour contentedly every man in his vocation. We are not going to discuss this question politically, still less in a party manner; nor even to discuss it at all. It is a political question certainly, inasmuch as it is a moral question; but far above any of the questions commonly understood as political, and to be solved easily, we think, with men not in prejudiced circumstances, by reference to the simple fact of the existence of hope and endeavour in the nature of men. If society is determined never to be satisfied, still it will hope to be so; the hope itself may for aught we can affirm to the contrary, be a mere part of the work—of the necessary impulse of action; but there it is—now working harder than ever—and a thousand Goethes could not destroy, though they might daunt it. They must destroy hope itself first, and life, and death too, which is continually renewing the ranks of the hopeful and the young, and above all, the press, which will never stop till it has shaken the world more even.

It was easy for a man in Goethe's position to recommend people to be content with their own. But to be content with some positions, is to be superior to them; and yet Goethe after all, in his own person, was neither superior to, nor content with conventionalities as he found them made for him. He did not marry the lady he lived with, till circumstances, as he thought, compelled him, and late in life. And instead of being superior to his condition, as he recommended the poor and struggling to be, his very acquiescence in other conventionalities shewed how little he was so. If the great universalist proved his superiority by condescension, it was at any rate by contracting his wings and his views into the court circle, and feathering an agreeable nest which he never gave up. Unluckily for the reputation of his impartiality all his worldly advantages were on the side of his theory. It is, therefore, impossible to shew that it was any thing else but a convenient acquiescence. He hazarded nothing to prove it otherwise, though in the instance of his non-marriage, he shewed how willing he was to depart from it where the hazard was not too great. In England he would have married sooner, or departed from his acquiescences more.

Goethe, on account of this opinion of his, and the position which he occupied, is not popular at present in Germany. The partisans of advance there do not like him, perhaps from a secret feeling that they are more theoretical than active themselves, and that in this respect he has represented his native country too well. For honest Germany, perhaps because she is more material than she supposes, and has unwittingly acquired a number of charities and domesticities from a certain sensual bonhomie, which has given her more to say for herself in that matter, than she or her transcendentalists would like, is unquestionably far more contemplative than active in her politics, and willing enough to let other nations play the game of advancement, as long as she can eat, drink, and dream, without any very violent interruption to her self-satisfaction. Pleasant and harmless may she live, with beau ideals (and very respectable ones they are,) in the novels of Augustus La Fontaine; and may no worse fate befall the rest of the world, if it is to get no further. Much of it, we grant, has not got half so far. Her great poet, who partook of the same bonhomie to an extent which he would have thought unbecoming his dignity, even as a partaker of good things, let the cat out of the bag in this matter a little too ingenuously; and for this, and the court airs they thought he gave himself, his countrymen will not forgive him. It is easy for his wholesale admirers, especially for the great understandings among them, (Mr. Carlyle, for instance,) to draw upon all the possibilities of an abstract philosophy, and give a superfine unworldly reason for whatever he did; but we must take even great poets as we find them. Shakspeare himself did not escape the infection of a sort of livery servitude among the great, (for actors were but a little above that condition in his time.) With all his humanity, he finds it difficult to repress a certain tendency to browbeat the people from behind the chairs of his inferiors; and though Goethe, living in a more equal age, seldom indulges in this scornful mood, (for it seems he is not free from it,) yet it is impossible to help giving a little scorn for scorn, or at least smile for smile, when we see the poetical minister of state, with his inexperience of half the ills of life, his birth, his money, his strength, beauty, and prosperity, and a star on each breast of his coat, informing us, with a sort of patriarchal dandyism, or as Bonaparte used to harangue from his throne, that he is contented with the condition of his subjects and his own,—France et moi—and that we have nothing to do but to be good people and cobblers, and content ourselves with a thousandth part of what it would distress him to miss.

So much for the courtier which it was his lot to be, and for the circumstances which more or less influence every body. What was infirm, however, in Goethe, was infirm in others; what was strong in him, was most rare, and will reduce the influence of the infirmity to next or nothing with posterity, with whom he will be immortal as a great poet and a kind man, constantly refuting his own theories, and helping the world forward by the inevitable inspiring of genius. He and his disciples, after all, talk of advancement of some sort, of meliorating this or that point of life, of doing away this or that evil. Where will they stop? Where they desire to stop? Yes; but where is the limit expressed, or how are they to dictate it, so long as the same uneasiness which impels them to the change, exists in other men, and from greater necessities?

We have not left ourselves time to point out the beauties of the following passages. They must speak for themselves. All Goethe's writings, as far as we can gather, abound with such,—runover, in superabundant measure, with the happy author of genial thought and feeling. And the expression, as was natural, is equal to what it contains. If the style of the original is so much superior to the version as Mr. Carlyle says it is, it must indeed surpass all established models of excellence. We can only say, that our reason, our imagination, our tears, have been quite content with what he has given us.

³ Three Vols. 8vo. Whittaker.

† It was Goethe, if we remember rightly, who with a truly German affectionateness and domestic sympathy, sent to Mr. Carlyle for a portrait of his house and its localities, that he might get as well acquainted with him at a distance as he possibly could. And in the same feeling, the picture was engraved for the German version of the translator's Life of Schiller.

Lovers.—When desire and hope had first attracted Wilhelm to Mariana, he already felt as if inspired with new life; felt as if he were beginning to be another man; he was now united to her; the contentment of his wishes had become a delicious habit. His heart strove to enable the object of his passion; his spirit to exalt with it the young creature whom he loved. In the shortest absence, thoughts of her arose within him. If she had once been necessary to him, she had now grown indispensable, now that he was bound to her by all the ties of nature. His pure soul felt that she was the half, more than the half of himself. He was grateful, and devoted without limit.

Mariana, too, succeeded in deceiving herself for a season; she shared with him the feeling of his liveliest blessedness. Alas! if the cold hand of self-reproach had not often come across her heart, she was not secure from it, even in Wilhelm's bosom, even under the wings of his love. And when she was again left alone, again left to sink from the clouds, to which passion had exalted her, into the consciousness of her real condition, then she was indeed to be pitied. So long as she had lived among degrading perplexities, disguising from herself her real situation, or rather never thinking of it, frivolity had helped her through; the incidents she was exposed to had come upon her each by itself; satisfaction and vexation had cancelled one another; humiliation had been compensated by vanity; want by frequent though momentary superfluity; she could plead necessity and custom as a law or an excuse; and hitherto all painful emotions from hour to hour, and from day to day, had by these means been shaken off. But now, for some instants, the poor girl had felt herself transported to a better world; aloft as it were, in the midst of light and joy, she had looked down upon the abject desert of her life, had felt what a miserable creature is the woman, who inspiring desire, does not also inspire reverence and love; she regretted and repented, but found herself outwardly or inwardly no better for regret. She had nothing which she could accomplish or resolve upon. Looking into herself and searching, all was waste and void within her soul; her heart had no place of strength or refuge. But the more sorrowful her state was, the more vehemently did her feelings cling to the man whom she loved; her passion for him even waxed stronger daily, as the danger of losing him came daily nearer.

Wilhelm, on the other hand, soared serenely happy in higher regions; to him also a new world had been disclosed, but a world rich in the most glorious prospects. Scarcely had the first excess of joy subsided, when all that had long been gliding dimly through his soul, stood up in bright distinctness before it. She is thine! She has given herself away to thee! She, the loved, the wished-for, the adored, has given herself away to thee in truth and faith; she shall not find thee ungrateful for the gift. Standing or walking, With a copiousness of splendid words, he uttered to himself the loftiest emotions.

Happy season of youth! Happy times of the first wish of love! A man is then like a child that can for hours delight itself with an echo, can support alone the changes of conversation, and be well contented with its entertainment, if the unseen interlocutor will but repeat the concluding syllables of the words addressed to it.

So was it with Wilhelm in the earlier, and still more in the later period of his passion for Mariana; he transferred the whole wealth of his own emotions to her, and looked upon himself as a beggar that lived upon her alms; and, as a landscape is more delightful, nay, is delightful only, when it is enlightened by the sun, so likewise in his eyes were all things beautiful and glorified which lay around her or related to her.

Often would he stand in the theatre behind the scenes, to which he had obtained the freedom of access from the manager. In such cases, it is true, the perspective magic was away; but the far mightier sorcery of love then first began to act. For hours he could stand by the sooty light-frame, inhaling the vapour of tallow lamps, looking at his mistress; and when she returned, and cast a kindly glance upon him, he could feel himself lost in ecstasy, and though close upon laths and bare spars, he seemed transported into Paradise. The stuff bunches of wool denominated lambs, the waterfalls of tin, the paper roses, and the one-sided huts of straw, awoke in him fair poetic visions of an old pastoral world. Nay, the very dancing girls, ugly as they were when seen at hand, did not always inspire him with disgust; they trod the same floor with Mariana. So true is it, that love which alone can give their full charm to rose-bowers, myrtle-groves, and moonshine, can also communicate, even to shavings of wood and paper clippings, the aspect of animated nature. It is as strong a spice, that tasteless, or even nauseous soups, are by it rendered palatable.

Two Merchants.—Wilhelm's father and Werner's were men of very different modes of thinking, but whose opinions so far coincided that they both regarded commerce as the finest calling, and both were peculiarly attentive to every advantage which any kind of speculation might produce to them. Old Meister, when his father died, had turned into money a valuable collection of pictures, drawings, copper-plates, and antiquities; he had entirely rebuilt and furnished his house in the newest style, and turned his other property to profit in all possible ways. A considerable portion of it he had embarked in trade, under the direction of the elder Werner, a man noted as an active merchant, whose speculations were commonly favoured by fortune. But nothing was so much desired by Meister, as to confer upon his son those qualities of which himself was destitute, and to leave his children advantages which he reckoned it of the highest importance to possess. Withal he felt a peculiar inclination for magnificence, for whatever catches the eye, and possesses at the same time real worth and durability. In his house, he would have all things solid and massive; his stores must be copious and rich, all his plate must be heavy, the furniture of his table must be costly. On the other hand, his guests were seldom invited; for every dinner was a festival, which, both for its expense and inconvenience, could not often be repeated. The economy of his soul went on at a settled uniform rate, and everything that moved or had a place in it was just what yielded no one any real enjoyment.

The elder Werner, in his dark and hampered house led quite another sort of life. The business of the day in his narrow counting room, at his ancient desk, once done, Werner liked to eat well, and if possible, to drink better. Nor could he fully enjoy good things in solitude; with his family, he must always see at his table his friends, and any stranger that had the slightest connexion with his house. His chairs were of unknown age and antic fashion, but he daily invited some to sit on them. The dainty virtues arrested the attention of his guests, and none remarked that they were served up in common ware. His cellar held no great stock of wine, but the emptied niches were usually filled up with more of a superior sort.

The Poet.—What is it that keeps men in continual discontent and agitation? It is, that they cannot make realities correspond with their conceptions, that enjoyment steals away from among their hands, that the wished-for comes too late, and nothing reached and acquired produces on the heart the effect, which their longing for it at a distance led them to anticipate. Now, fate has exalted the poet above all this, as if he were a god. He views the conflicting tumult of the passions; sees families and kingdoms raging in aimless commotion; sees those inexplicable enigmas of misunderstanding, which frequently a single monosyllable would suffice to explain, occasioning convulsions unutterably baneful. He has a fellow feeling of the mournful and the joyful in all human beings. When the man of the world is devoting his days to wasting melancholy, for some deep disappointment, or in the ebullition of joy, is going out to meet his happy destiny, the lightly-moved and all-conceiving spirit of the poet steps forth, like the sun from night to day, and with soft transition tunes his harp to joy or woe. From his heart its native soil, springs up the lovely flower of wisdom; and, if others, while waking dream, are painted with fantastic delusions from their every sense, he passes the dream of life like one awake, and the strangest of incidents is to him a part both of the past and the future. And thus the poet is at once a teacher, a prophet, a friend both of gods and men. How! thou wouldst have him to descend from his height to some paltry occupation? He who is fashioned like the bird to hover round the world, to nestle on the lofty summits, to feed on buds and fruits, exchanging gaily one bough for another, he ought also to work at the plough like an ox; like a dog to train himself up to the harness and draught; or; perhaps, tied up in a chain, to guard a farm-yard by his barking.

Werner, it may be well supposed, had listened with the greatest surprise. 'All true,' he rejoined, 'if men were but made like birds, and though they neither spun nor weaved, could yet spend peaceful days in perpetual enjoyment. If at the approach of winter they could as easily betake themselves to distant regions, could retire before scarcity, and fortify themselves against frost.

'Poets have lived so,' exclaimed Wilhelm, 'in times when true nobleness was better revered; and so should they ever live. Sufficiently provided for within, they had need of little from without; the gift of communicating lofty emotions and glorious images to men, in melodies and words that charmed the ear, and fixed themselves inseparably on whatever objects they referred to, of old enraptured the world, and served the gifted as a rich inheritance. At the courts of kings, at the tables of the great, beneath the windows of the fair, the sound of them was heard; while the ear and the soul were shut from all beside; and men felt, as we do when delight comes over us, and we stop with rapture, if, among the dingles we are crossing, the voice of the nightingale starts, out touching and strong. They found a home in every habitation of the world, and the lowliness of their condition but exalted them the more. The hero listened to their songs; and the conqueror of the earth did reverence to a poet; for he felt that, without poets, his own cold and vast existence would pass away like a whirlwind, and be forgotten for ever. The lover wished that he could feel his longings and his joys so variedly and so harmoniously as the poet's inspired lips had skill to show them forth; and even the rich man could not of himself discern such coolness in his idol grandeur, as when they were presented to him shining in the splendour of the poet's spirit, sensible to all worth, and exalting all.'

Pecuniary Obligations. 'It is singular,' said the baron, 'to see what a world of hesitation people feel about accepting money from their patrons and friends, though ready to receive any other gift with joy and thankfulness. Human nature manifests some other such peculiarities, by which many scruples of a similar kind are produced and carefully cherished.'

'Is it not the same with all points of honour?' said our friend.

'It is so,' replied the baron, 'and with several other prejudices. We must not root them out, lest, in doing so, we tear up noble plants along with them. Yet I am always glad when I meet with men, that feel superior to such objections, when the case requires it; and I think with pleasure on the story of that ingenious poet, which I dare say you have heard of. He had written several plays for the court theatre, which were honoured by the warmest approbation of the monarch. 'I must give him a distinguished recompence,' said the generous prince; 'ask him whether he would choose to have some jewel given him; or if he would disdain to accept a sum of money.' In his humorous way, the poet answered the enquiring courtier: 'I am thankful, with all my heart, for these gracious intentions; and as the emperor is daily taking money from us, I see not wherefore I should feel ashamed of taking some from him.'

Self-love exaggerates our faults as well as our virtues. (That is to say, partly that you may contradict them, partly that you may admire the candour, and chiefly because the talk is of the person's self, and vanity thinks its own vices as good as other people's virtues.)

The one thing hopeless. Your blockhead is the only person that can never be improved, whether it be self-conceit, stupidity, or hypochondria, that renders him unpliant and ungrateful.

A good Daily Memorandum. Men are so inclined to content themselves with what is commonest; the spirit and the senses so easily grow dead to the impression of the beautiful and the perfect; that every one should study to nourish in his mind the faculty of feeling these things by every method in his power. For no man can bear to be entirely deprived of such enjoyment; it is only because they are not used to taste of what is excellent, that the generality of people take delight in silly and insipid things, provided they be new. For this reason, one ought every day at least to hear a little song, read a good poem, see a fine picture, and if it were possible, to speak a few reasonable words.

Love of Power.—Every man desires to gather all things round him, to make and manage them according to his pleasure; the money, which himself does not expend, he seldom reckons well expended.

Generosity not always generous.—My brother-in-law, you see, is giving up his fortune, in so far as this is in his power, to the community of Herrnhuth: he reckons that by doing so, he is advancing the salvation of his soul. Had he sacrificed a slender portion of his revenue, he might have rendered many people happy, might have made for them and for himself a heaven upon earth. Our sacrifices are but rarely of an active kind; we, as it were, abandon what we give away. It is not from resolution but despair, that we renounce our property.

The dread of dreariness.—The herd of people dread sound understanding more than anything; they ought to dread stupidity, if they had any notion what was really dreadful.

A hint to violent and selfish teachers.—Lydia returned; my mother had been harsh enough to cast the poor girl off, after having harboured her. Lydia had learned with her mistress to consider professions as her occupation: she was wont to curb herself in nothing.

A mirror for the censorious.—No man should cast a stone at his brother: when one composes long speeches with a view to shame his neighbours, he should speak them to a looking glass.

Do what you lament is not done.—I have often heard people who themselves kept silence in regard to works of merit, complaining and lamenting that silence was kept:

* She had been unworthily trained, and was not exactly what he took her for in point of life; though more than worthy of him by nature and aspiration. Her story is one of the most beautifully touching we ever read.—Ed. L. J.

* He means, enable it, and renders it fitting; not a light acceptance of obligations that can be reasonably avoided, or from any body.—Ed. L. J.

The useful and the beautiful.—Every gift is valuable, and ought to be unfolded. When one encourages the beautiful alone, and another encourages the useful alone, it takes them both to form a man. The useful encourages itself; for the multitude produce it, and no one can dispense with it; the beautiful must be encouraged; for few can set it forth, and many need it.

MR. WALSH AND MRS. BENN.

To the Editor of the London Journal

SIR,

I beg leave to refer you to an article in No. 6, May 7th of your London Journal, in which supposed facts so startling are detailed, that in justice to the memory of my late father, I have taken the liberty of addressing you, hoping that from your well known liberality as an editor, you will rectify what has appeared in your interesting little Journal.

The first paragraph is substantially correct; viz: that Mr. Walsh left all his property to his niece Mrs. Benn, to the prejudice of his nephew, my deceased parent; who was the brother, and not the cousin of the lady in question, as related in your article; but the will was so tied down, that Mrs. Benn could not act in the manner described in your Journal. Besides, an impediment lay in the way. Her husband, Mr. Benn, afterwards Sir J. B. Walsh, was alive at the time alluded to, and consequently must have, or been supposed to have, a voice, if not a casting vote in the affair.

I do not exactly understand what is meant by a "little villa;" but the magnificent estate called Warfield Park, in Berkshire, devised by Mr. Walsh, is still the seat of the present Sir John B. Walsh, son of the one above alluded to.

This contradiction to your "shortest and sweetest of all stories," will much oblige, Sir,

Your most obedient servant,

SUNDERLAND C. FOWLE.

Ferry Side in Carmarthen,
July 20th, 1834

*. The points of the story in question were, that Mrs. Benn had had an estate of four thousand a year left her, to the prejudice of her "cousin" the male heir, and that she gave it all up to him, reserving only to herself a little villa in Berkshire. The little Berkshire villa, it seems, turns out to be a large mansion, and what is worse, Mrs. Benn did not give up the estate. Our feelings of disappointment, however, are relieved by finding that she could not. We are sorry to have been the medium of any misrepresentation. The story was taken from a work, generally held to be veracious as well as curious.—The Loungers' Common-Place Book.—Ed. L. J.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Our friend T. R.'s communication is laughable; but in this our urbane paper, we propose to correct errors solely by the gradual substitution of better knowledge. He will see that we are trying to meet his wishes in the other respect. The paper is left for him at the publisher's.

JUVENIS is a worthy reader of poetry, and shews occasional evidences of looking at nature with his own eyes. His only "fault," (to answer his question) is, that he does not in general do so; or if he does, is too content to repeat what has been said before him.

We shall give a passage out of the lines on "Hope" next week, among other pickings, to which we are compelled to confine ourselves, from our numerous poetical correspondents.

The author of Hints to Young Students, has our best thanks and respect, though we do not insert his paper. Articles that redound to the writer's credit, may yet not always be suitable to a Journal that has so many calls upon its attention.

Dr. B.'s letter gratified us much.

We will make the enquires requested by G. F. and inform him of the result.

"These beautiful miniature volumes claim our unqualified praise. LE CAMÉLEON;

A Magazine of French Literature, &c.
Compiled in Paris by A. P. Barbienx, and Stereotyped at the Printing-Office of Monsieur Didot.

The object of Le Caméleon will be to initiate the inhabitant of England into the tone, the forms, and the language of the higher classes of society in France; to make him familiar with their purest idioms and modes of expression; to advance him towards a perfect knowledge of the French people by the variety with which it will be stored; in short, to forward his studies by the most pleasing and efficacious means, and to assist his progress by examples which will enable him to arrive in a comparatively short time at as perfect a knowledge of the French language as he has of his own, and to speak it with fluency and elegance.

Le Caméleon will consist of everything which can instruct interest, or amuse. Scientific, literary, and entertaining publications will furnish us with subjects. We shall be careful to qualify them; that the Journal may breathe the utmost purity of taste and morality. Nothing shall be wanting to render it worthy of the approbation of the public, and we trust that, in this respect, it will leave nothing to be desired; for it will be compiled with that zeal and care which can only be inspired by an ardent desire for the benefit of youth, and the hope of contributing to their instruction and amusement. We shall thus be enabled to obviate many difficulties; and not only to lessen the fatigue of both professors and pupils, but to diminish the expense, (at all times considerable) to those parents who, either from inclination or necessity, undertake the education of their own children. Le Caméleon is therefore addressed to both sexes, to all ages, and to every class; its cheapness placing it within the reach of all.

"We are delighted to see any French periodical divested of politics. Our young friends will find Le Caméleon pleasant reading, and well adapted for cultivating their acquaintance with the language."—Litt. Gids. June 22.

"Should it continue as it has commenced, it may safely be admitted into those families where the fear of the promiscuous literature of France has hitherto prevailed. The selections are judicious, and afford favourable specimens of the style of the best modern writers."—Spectator, July 5.

SOME FURTHER REMARKS UPON GOETHE, WITH ANOTHER SPECIMEN OF HIM.

SINCE writing the remarks upon Goethe in our last number, we have become acquainted, not only with the "Characteristics," but with a variety of criticisms upon him, and upon other German authors, written in reviews and magazines by Mr. Carlyle. It shall be our business to become thoroughly intimate with these criticisms, and we hope the reader, as well as ourselves, shall be the wiser for them. Meantime we revert to the main point in our last week's observations for the purpose of shewing the extent of our views on the subject, and the reasons why we venture to differ upon it with so great a man.

Goethe was for taking no notice of the politics and public events of his time, nor for busying himself with what is understood in the language of the present day by the "hopes of the world," and the "advancement of society." The great business of man, he thought, was to be working cheerfully and manfully in the sphere in which he found himself, without troubling his head with the affairs of government or the species, but at the same time to know and enjoy as much as possible of the world of Nature, for the purpose of assisting that cheerfulness and developing the faculties of that manhood. His enemies said, that he thought in this manner for expedience' sake, and because he happened to be comfortably situated, and therefore had no personal interest in change. His friends said, that his position was nothing but an accident which he could not help, and which he was not bound to alter; that he was too great a man to sacrifice the universality of his views to the narrowness of a court circle, or any circle; and that to suppose otherwise, only argued an inability to comprehend him. They charge his enemies with mere "Radicalism" or political narrowness of one sort, just as his enemies charge him with political or personal narrowness of another.

It would ill become us while noticing what appears to us to be a defect in a great man, to pretend that our belief in it may not arise from one of the numerous defects in our own mode of thinking or measure of understanding. We have been subjected strongly, in the course of our life, to the influence of political circumstances; and with all our desire to be impartial, and to see the truth for its own sake, cannot assert, that we are able to divest ourselves of that influence at will, and stand apart from it, while contemplating the character of a fellow-creature. It appears to us however, from all we have hitherto seen, that the advocates of Goethe in this matter, with an instinctive misgiving, confound the wholesomeness of his opinion respecting the advancement of the world, with his right of objection to the immediate movement in its behalf. Granting that he might reasonably differ with those movements, like any other privy-councillor of a German sovereign, without being influenced by the same motives, it does not follow that he was bound to differ with the abstract theory of advancement; nor indeed do we believe that they would argue that it did. But we cannot help thinking, by the way in which the two ideas always co-exist in their arguments at present, that they feel as if such had been the case; nor can we help fearing, that for an analogous reason, such was really the case with the illustrious poet. We must add, from what we have seen of the weaknesses of other leading spirits (Burke for one, not to make invidious instances of the living) that what it did not fall to his lot to head, at the right juncture for the reputation of his foresight and for the convenience or hopes of his fortune, he would not like to see headed, or fought for, by others. The French Revolution did not break out till after Goethe's connexion with the Duke of Saxe Weimar. Suppose, instead of the Duke's coming to him and asking him to live in his court, it had fallen to his lot to have mixed with the Americans, and to have had the same honours paid him there, on an intellectual score, as were paid to La Fayette on a military. Might not he have been a far greater and more influential man in politics than ever La Fayette was, or rather than he himself was, (for there is no comparison between the powers of these two admirable men) and been the new star of the advancement of his species in every respect, instead of the attempt to reconcile it to acquiescence in any?

Before we go further, let it clearly be understood what we mean by advancement and acquiescence. We do not mean,—far are we from intending any such absurdity or injustice,—that people in their senses are violently to throw down any obstacle in the way of a better state of society; but that all are to advance, quietly, and with a good understanding, for the sake of all; so that each may give up what is found wrong, or be gifted with what is right, according as experience shall determine, to the better distribution of labour and leisure, and the gradual elevation of the whole species.

We had written thus far, when having become further acquainted with the Characteristics in the intervals of our writing, our feelings of respect and admiration for Goethe have been so increased, that we must plainly confess we cannot proceed in the same strain of objection to him. If our opinion on one point has not been done away, it has at least become mixed up and coloured with so much that is reverent and beautiful (struck from the many-coloured radiance of his greatness) and we have found ourselves so forcibly thrown upon a sense of what is doubtful and possible in all questions relating to the rights and perceptions of a mind of the first order, and consequently upon a feeling of what is due to common modesty on our own part, that we gladly drop our eyelids under the effulgence of his beams, and should as soon think of objecting any more to his politics, as of questioning the sun for shining on "the just and the unjust." The reader shall see, from time to time, in many a beautiful extract, the reasons we have for thus feeling; and not the least of these reasons will be (what indeed we should have added, had we gone on, though not to the same extent) that a man like Goethe, loving nature thoroughly, believing the best of her, making it the business of his life to study and act with her, cannot, whatever his opinion may be on passing events, or his errors, real or supposed, do any thing but assist the grand possibilities of advancement, let their bounds be as he may think them or not. Either the attainment of one mountain-top must produce the view of another, or when nothing further is to be seen, the limits of our pilgrimage must be ascertained, and humanity be content, as he desired it to be, with the capabilities of what is round about it. All that we ever quarrelled with him for, was out of a notion that he wished to stop short unnecessarily, and mistook his own ample ground of contentment too easily for the mill-horse round of others. We now care less if he did so, seeing what it was in the nature of his genius inevitably to do for all men.

For ourselves, who venture to give our personal opinion on the matter, solely by reason of no ordinary experience both of suffering and enjoyment, we should be more than content to take the world as it is, provided that all classes could get the pleasure out of it that Goethe supposes, whether under the more received notions of pleasure or not; for like him, we are far from confining the pleasurable to the limits of its ordinary acceptation; nay, to oblige those who have a suspicious grudge against the word, we could give up the word itself to a great extent, and change it for the word "action,"—action, we allow, being a good half of the business of life, or the whole of it, if they please, including mental action; and the face wearing a shew neither of pleasure nor pain in the general course of it. But it appears to us, that society must first put itself into a condition fitter for dividing this pleasure, or something better than pleasure, reasonably among its members; and that if the politics of the German States had had their way, uninfluenced by the old revolutions of England and France, the day of that better division would have been retarded; nay, Goethe's and the Duke of Weimar's own improvements had been retarded; and Germany itself would have been less able to turn round upon the abuses of liberty, and read a new lesson of freedom to its corrupted teachers. We must not quarrel with the throes and agonies of mankind, merely because it is our good fortune not to be forced to partake of them. They have broken up the ground for our luckier cultivation.

That the reader may be excited to make haste and admire Goethe as much as we do, we shall conclude this article with an exquisite specimen (beautifully translated by Mrs. Austen,) of the way in which he could describe a friend's character. A more lovely, full, delicate, and potent bit of writing we never met with. The softer aspect of his soul,—the gentlest and loveliest of all his Muses, must have been in her happiest state of sympathetic self-complacency, when he wrote it, saturated to the heart with the balm of belief in good, with the realization of a beautiful vision of humanity. Herder was one of the leading spirits of the modern German literature. The reader shall know more of him. We have not been able to hinder ourselves from marking and carving passages with Italics, just as our gratitude might have imprinted kisses on the eyelids of the sweetly-seeing Muse herself, had she become visible and tangible out of the head of this Teutonic Jupiter.

"Few minds have been learned upon the same grand scale as Herder. The major part pursue only what is most rare and least familiar in science; he, on the contrary, could receive only the great and catholic streams of every science into the mighty depths of his own heaven-reflecting ocean, that impressed upon them all its own motion and fluctuation. Others are fastened upon by their own learning as by a withering and strangling ivy: but his hung about him as gracefully as the tendrils of a vine, and adorned him with fruit as with clusters of grapes. How magnificently, how irreconcilably did he blaze into indignation against the creeping and crawling vermin of the times—against German coarseness of taste—against all sceptres in brutal paws—and against the snakes of the age. But would you hear the sweetest of voices, it was his voice in the utterance of love—whether for a little child, or for poetry, or music, or in the tones of mercy and forbearance towards the weak. In general he has been little weighed or appraised, and in parts only, never as a whole. His due valuation he will first find in the diamond scales of posterity; into which scales will assuredly not be admitted the pebbles with which he was pelted by the coarse critics of his days, and the still coarser disciples of Kant. Two sayings of his survive which may seem trifling to others; me they never fail to impress profoundly; one was, that on some occasion, whilst listening to choral music that streamed from a neighbouring church as from the bosom of some distant century, he wished, with a sorrowful allusion to the cold frosty spirit of these times, that he had been born in the middle ages. The other, and a far different, sentiment was—that he would gladly communicate with an apparition from the spiritual world, and that he neither felt nor foreboded anything of the usual awe connected with such a communication. Oh the pure soul that already held commerce with spirits! To such a soul this was possible, poetical as that soul was; and though it be true that just such souls it is that shudder with the deepest awe before the noiseless and inaudible mysteries that dwell and walk on the other side of death, to his soul it was possible; for the soul of Herder was itself an apparition upon this earth, and never forgot its native world. At this moment, I think I see him; and, potent as death is otherwise to glorify the images of men with saintly transfiguration—yet, methinks, that from the abyss of distance and sunless elevation, he appears not more radiant and divine than he did here below; and I think of him, far aloft in the heavens and behind the stars, as in his natural place, and as of one but little altered from what he was, except by the blotting out of his earthly sorrows."

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 6th to Tuesday the 12th August.

BEAUTY OF THE YEAR. ITS RICHES TO POETS AND POETICAL READERS.

To know a little of a great man, is to wish to know more of him; and if we have any enthusiasm, to wish to know it instantly. As we take it for granted that our readers sympathize with us on this point, and as the year is now in a state of ripe and golden perfection, worthy to have the sound of a true poet's deep and melodious memory murmuring over it like a divine bee, we shall indulge ourselves with giving another passage from the "Characteristics of Goethe," descriptive of the successive influence of the seasons upon a poetically constituted mind. It is part of a criticism written by him upon the lyrics of another German poet, Voss; and is particularly suited to our Journal, from the recommendation it contains of a regard for every-day objects, and a developement of the riches they possess for all who chuse to seek them: Mrs. Austen speaks of the "beauty" of it. It is difficult at any time to read this lady's translations, without speaking of the beauty of them; and still less so, when she is giving praise to her originals. She thus puts the last degree of sympathy into her echoes of them, and perfects our delight by making us sure of her own. In the preface to her version of the "Tour of a German Prince," we thought her cold towards her author. We grant she was not bound to be so enthusiastic, as in the present instance. We doubt even whether her enthusiasm has not allowed her to admit some contributions to the "Characteristics," which had been better omitted; but if she is chary of expressing her approbation, she at least does not bestow it in the wrong places.

Every author, in some degree, portrays-himself in his works, even be it against his will. In this case, he is present to us, and designedly; nay, with a friendly alacrity sets before us his inward and outward modes of thinking and feeling; and disdains not to give us confidential explanations of circumstances, thoughts, views, and expressions, by means of appended notes.

And now, encouraged by so friendly an invitation, we draw nearer to him; we seek him by himself; we attach ourselves to him, and promise ourselves rich enjoyment, and manifold instruction and improvement.

In a level northern landscape we find him rejoicing in his existence, in a latitude in which the ancients hardly expected to find a living thing.

And truly, Winter there manifests his whole might and sovereignty. Storm-borne from the Pole, he covers the wood with hoar-frost, the streams with ice; a drifting whirlwind eddies around the high gables, while the poet rejoices in the shelter and comfort of his home, and cheerily bids defiance to the raging elements. Furred and frost-covered friends arrive, and are heartily welcomed under the protecting roof; and soon they form a cordial, confiding circle, enliven the household meal by the clang of glasses, the joyous song, and thus create for themselves a moral summer.

We then find him abroad, and braving the inclemencies of the wintry heavens. When the axe-tree creaks heavily under the load of fire-wood—when the footsteps of the wanderer ring along the ground—we see him now walking briskly through the snow to the distant dwelling of a friend; now joining a sledge party, gliding, with tinkling bells, over the boundless plain. At length a cheerful inn receives the half-frozen travellers; a bright flickering fire greets them as they crowd around the chimney; dance, choral song and merry a warm viand, are reviving and grateful to youth and age. But when the snow melts under the returning sun, when the warmed earth frees itself somewhat from its thick covering, the poet hastens with his friends into the free air, to refresh himself with the first living breath of the new year, and to seek the earliest flowers. The bright golden clover is gathered, bound into bunches, and brought home in triumph, where this herald of the future beauty and bounty of the year is destined to crown a family festival of Hope.

And when Spring herself advances, no more is heard of roof and hearth; the poet is always abroad, wandering on the soft pathways around his peaceful lake. Every bush unfolds itself with an individual character, every blossom bursts with an individual life, in his presence. As in a fully worked out picture, we see, in the sun-light around him, grass and herb, as distinctly as oak and beech-tree; and on the margin of the still waters there is wanting neither the reed nor any succulent plant.

Here his companions are not those transforming fantasies, by whose impatient power the rock fashions itself into the divine maiden, the tree puts off its branches, and appears to allure the hunter with its soft, lovely arms. Rather wanders the poet solitary, like a priest of nature; touches each plant, each bush, with gentle hand; and hallows them members of a loving harmonious family.

Around him, like a dweller in Eden sport harmless, fearless creatures—the lamb on the meadows, the roe in the forest. Around him assemble the whole choir of birds, and drown the busy hum of day with their varied accents.

Then, at evening, towards night, when the moon climbs the heaven in serene splendour, and sends her flickering image curling to his feet on the surface of the lightly ruffled waters; when the boat rocks softly, and the oar gives its measured cadence, and every stroke calls up sparkles of reflected light; when the nightingale pours forth her divine song from the shore, and softens every heart; then do affection and passion manifest themselves in happy tenderness; from the first touch of a sympathy awakened by the Highest himself, to that quiet, graceful, timid desire, which flourishes within the narrow enclosure of domestic life. An heaving breast, an ardent glance, a pressure of the hand, a stolen kiss, give life to his song. But it is ever the affianced lover that is emboldened; it is ever the betrothed bride that yields; and thus does all that is ventured, and all that is granted bend to a lawful standard; though within that limit he permits himself much freedom.

Soon, however, he leads us again under the free heavens; into the green; to bower and bush; and there is he most cheerfully, cordially, and fondly at home.

The Summer has come again; a genial warmth breathes through the poet's song. Thunders roll; clouds drop showers; rainbows appear; lightnings gleam; and a blessed coolness overspreads the plain. Every thing ripens; the poet overlooks none of the varied harvests; he hallows all by his presence.

And here is the place to remark what an influence our poets might exercise on the civilization of our German people—in some places, perhaps, have exercised.

His poems on the various incidents of rural life, indeed, do represent rather the reflexions of a refined intellect than the feelings of the common people; but if we could picture to ourselves that a harper were present at the hay, corn, and potatoe harvests; if we recollected how he might make the men around him observant of that which recurs to them as ordinary and familiar; if, by his manner of regarding it, by his poetical expression, he elevated the common, and heightened the enjoyment of every gift of God and nature by his dignified representation of it, we may truly say he would be a real benefactor to his country. For the first stage of a true enlightenment is, that man should reflect upon his condition and circumstances, and be brought to regard them in the most agreeable light. Let the song of the potatoe be sung in the field, where the wondrous mode of increase, which calls even the man of science to high and curious meditation, after the long and silent working and interweaving of vegetable powers, comes to view, and a quite unintelligible blessing springs out of the earth; and then first will be felt the merit of this and similar poems, in which the poet essays to awaken the rude, reckless, unobservant man, who takes every thing for granted, to an attentive observation of the high wonders of all nourishing Nature, by which he is constantly surrounded.

But scarcely are all these bounties brought under man's notice, when Autumn glides in and our poet takes an affecting leave of nature, decaying, at least in outward appearance. Yet he abandoned not his beloved vegetation wholly to the unkind winter. The elegant vine receives many a plant, many a bulb, wherewith to create a mimic summer in the hard seclusion of winter, and even at that season, to have no festival, without its flowers and wreaths. Care is taken that even the household birds belonging to the family should not want a green, fresh roof to their bowery cage.

Now is the loveliest time for short rambles,—for friendly converse in the chilly evening. Every domestic feeling becomes active; longings for social pleasures encrease; the want of music is more sensibly felt, and now, even the sick man willingly joins the friendly circle, and a departing friend seems to clothe himself in the colours of the departing year.

For, as certainly as Spring will return after the lapse of Winter, so certainly will friends, lovers, kindred, meet again; they will meet again in the presence of the all-loving Father; and then first will they form a Whole with each other, and with every thing good, after which they sought and strove in vain in this piece-meal world. And thus does the felicity of the poet, even here, rest on the persuasion that all have to rejoice in the care of a wise God, whose power extends unto all, and whose light lightens upon all. Thus does the adoration of such a Being create in the poet the highest clearness and reasonableness; and, at the same time, an assurance that the thoughts, the words, with which he comprehends and describes infinite qualities, are not empty dreams and sounds; and thence arises a rapturous feeling of his own and other's happiness, in which every thing conflicting, peculiar, discordant, is resolved and dissipated.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XXVI.—A RECLUSE IN THE THICK OF LONDON.

THIS simple and affecting account of a human being so constituted as to be driven from society by a single shock to his feelings, is taken from the notes to the excellent edition of the "Tatler," published in 1789. Mr. Welby's resolution probably originated in a variety of motives. He was shocked by the strangeness as well as inhumanity of his brother's attempt; it gave him a horror of the very faces of his fellow-creatures, perhaps also something of a personal fear of them; and very likely a hypochondriacal dread even of himself, and of the blood of which his veins partook. We see that he lived in the most sparing manner, eating little else than gruel and sallads. But great was the proportion of beauty mixed up with his character, and even of strength, though it retreated into this timid shape. He was a blighted human fruit of the most noble and delicate order; and one wishes that instead of the old servant, he could have had some affectionate companion to live with and love him, and repay him for the large sympathies he retained with his species. But he had his consolation. He was a reader; and the same romantic turn of mind, which put him into his solitude, as well as the temperance which enabled him to grow old in it, probably secured him a child-like delight in his books to the last.

The noble and virtuous Henry Welby, Esq. was a native of Lincolnshire, and inherited a clear estate of more than £1000. a year. He was regularly bred at the university, studied for some time at one of the inns of court, and in the course of his travels, spent several years abroad. On his return, this very accomplished gentleman settled on his paternal estate, lived with great hospitality, matched to his liking, and had a beautiful and virtuous daughter who was wedded with his entire approbation, to a Sir Christopher Hilliard, in Yorkshire. He had now lived to the age of forty, respected by the rich, prayed for by the poor, honoured and beloved by all; when one day a younger brother, with whom he had some difference in opinion, meeting him in the field, snapped a pistol at him which happily flashed in the pan. Thinking that this was done only to fright him, he coolly disarmed the ruffian, and putting the weapon carelessly into his pocket, thoughtfully returned home; but on after examination, the discovery of bullets in the pistol had such an effect upon his mind, that he instantly conceived an extraordinary resolution, of retiring entirely from the world, in which he persisted inflexibly, till the end of his life. He took a very fair house in the lower end of Grub Street, near Cripplegate; and contracting a numerous retinue into a small family, having the house prepared for his purpose, he selected three chambers for himself, the one for his diet, the second for his lodging, and the third for his study. As they were one within another, while his diet was set on table by an old maid, he retired into his lodging-room, and when his bed was making into his study, still doing so till all was clear. Out of these chambers, from the time of his first entry into them, he never issued, till he was carried thence, forty-four years after, on men's shoulders; neither in all that time did his son-in-law, daughter, or grandchild, brother, sister, or kinsman, young, or old, rich or poor, of what degree or condition soever, look upon his face, save the ancient maid, whose name was Elizabeth. She only made his fire, prepared his bed, provided his diet, and dressed his chambers. She saw him but seldom, never but in cases of extraordinary necessity, and died not above six days before him. In all the time of his retirement he never tasted fish or flesh; his chief food was oatmeal gruel; now and then, in summer, he had a salad of some choice cool herbs; and for dainties, when he would feast himself upon a high day, he would eat the yoke of a hen's egg, but no part of the white; what bread he did eat, he cut out of the middle of the loaf, but the crust he never tasted; his constant drink was four shilling beer, and no other, for he never tasted wine, or strong water. Now and then, when his stomach served, he did eat some kind of suckets; and now and then drank red cow's milk which his maid Elizabeth fetched him out of the fields, hot from the cow. Nevertheless, he kept a bountiful table for his servants, and sufficient entertainment for any stranger or tenant who had occasion of business at his house. Every book that was printed was bought for him, and conveyed to him; but such as related to controversy he always laid aside, and never read. In Christmas holidays, at Easter, and other festivals, he had great cheer provided; with all dishes in season, served into his own chamber, with store of wine, which his maid brought in. Then, after thanks to God for his good benefits, he would pin a clean napkin before him, and putting on a pair of white Holland sleeves, which reached to his elbows, cutting up dish after dish in order, he would send one to one poor neighbour, the next to another, whether it were brawn, beef, capon, goose, &c. till he had left the table quite empty; when, giving thanks again, he laid by his linen, and caused the cloth to be taken away; and this would he do, dinner and supper, upon these days, without tasting one morsel of anything whatsoever. When any clamoured impudently at his gate, they were not, therefore, immediately relieved; but when, from his private chamber, which had a prospect into the street, he spied any sick, weak, or lame, he would presently send after them to comfort, cherish, and strengthen them; and not a trifle to serve them for the present, but so much as would relieve them many days after. He would moreover inquire what neighbours were industrious in their callings, and who had great charge of children; and withal, if their labour and industry could not sufficiently supply their families, to such he would liberally send, and relieve them according to their necessities. He died at his house in Grub Street, after an anchorical confinement of forty-four years, Oct. 29, 1636, aged eighty-four. At his death his hair and beard were so overgrown, that he appeared rather like a hermit of the wilderness, than the inhabitant of one of the first cities of the world.

SPECIMENS OF CELEBRATED AUTHORS.

JEAN PAUL RICHTER.

Ludicrous description of a "timid gentleman's" journey by coach.

JEAN PAUL RICHTER, one of the worthies of German literature, died not long ago. Samples of his genius, and a masterly criticism upon it, (which we have read twice over for the mere pleasure received from the force and abundance of the thinking) are given in the third volume of Mr. Carlyle's Specimens of German Romances, from which the following passage is taken. We are much mistaken if we are hazarding the usual perils of an overweening introducer of a jest, when we candidly express our anticipations of the reader's hearty laughter. There is caricature enough, but like all Richter's caricatures, it is grounded on the deepest and kindest knowledge of real character, kindness and depth being indeed necessary accompaniments in a man's knowledge of his fellow-creatures. But how he can go heaping one extravagance upon another, in this successful way, is amazing, (for there is a whole seventy pages full of it). We think, every instant, that nothing further can be piled upon the joke, like children seeing a tower of cards threatening to topple over; when lo! another story, and another yet is achieved, to their delighted astonishment, and hand-clapping bursts of laughter. Perhaps, from what little we have been enabled to see of the genius of Jean Paul (for the Germans love to designate him by his Christian names, as the French do Rousseau) a general idea of it may be given by supposing him a sort of prose Shakspeare, acting the part of one his own Fools. In the book before us he unites Rabelais with the author of the Anatomy of Melancholy.

The twenty-second of July, on Wednesday, about five in the afternoon, (quoth the "magnanimous mouse" Schmelzle,—for he relates his own exploit) was now, by the way-bill of the regular post-coach, irrevocably fixed for my departure. I had still half a day to order my house; from which, for two nights and two days and a half, my breast, its breast work and palisado, was now, along with myself, to be withdrawn. Besides this, my good wife Bergelchen, as I call my Teutoberga, was immediately to travel after me on Friday the twenty-fourth, in order to see and make purchases at the yearly fair; nay, she was ready to have gone along with me, the faithful spouse. I therefore assembled my little knot of domestics, and promulgated to them the household law and valedictory rescript, which after my departure, in the first place before the outset of my wife, and in the second place after this outset, they had rigorously to obey; explaining to them, especially, whatever, in case of conflagrations, house-breakings, thunder-storms, or transit of troops, it would behoove them to do. To my wife I delivered an inventory of the best goods in our little register ship; which goods, she, in case the house took fire, had in the first place to secure. I ordered her on stormy nights (the peculiar thief-weather), to put our Eolian harp in the window, that so any villainous prowler might imagine I was fantasizing on my instrument, and therefore awake; for like reasons also, to take the house-dog in doors by day, that he might sleep then, and so be livelier by night. I further counselled her to have an eye on the focus of every knot in the panes of the stable window, nay, on every glass of water she might set down in the house, as I had already often recounted to her examples of such incidental burning glasses having set whole buildings in flames. I then appointed her the hour when she was to set out on Friday morning to follow me; and recapitulated more emphatically the household precepts, which, prior to her departure, she must afresh inculcate on her domestics. My dear heart-sound, blooming Berga, answered her faithful lord, as it seemed, very seriously: "Go thy ways, little old one; it shall be done all as smooth as velvet. Wert thou but away! There is no end of thee!" Her brother, my brother-in-law, the dragoon, for whom, out of complaisance, I had paid the coach-fare, in order to have in the vehicle along with me a stout swordsman and hector, as spiritual relative and bully-rock, so to speak; the dragoon I say, on hearing these my regulations, puckered up (which I easily forgave the wild soldier and bachelor) his sun-burnt face considerably into ridicule, and said, "Were I in thy place, sister, I should do what I liked, and then afterwards take a peep into these regulation papers of his."

"Oh!" answered I: "misfortune may conceal itself like a scorpion in any corner. I might say that we are like children, who looking at their gaily-painted toy-box, soon pull off the lid, and, pop! out springs a mouse who has young ones."

"Mouse, mouse!" said he, stepping up and down. "But, good brother, it is five o'clock; and you will find when you return that all looks exactly as it does to day; the dog like the dog, and my sister like a pretty woman; allos donc!" It was purely his whim, that I, fearing his misconception, had not previously made a sort of testament.

I now packed in two different sorts of medicines, heating as well as cooling, against two different possibilities; also my old splints for arm or leg breakages, in case the coach overset; and (out of foresight) two times the money I was likely to need. Only here I could have wished, so uncertain is the stowage of such things, that I had been an ape with cheek-pouches, or some sort of opossum with a natural bag, that so I might have deposited these necessities of existence in pockets which were sensitive. Shaving is a task I always go through before setting out on journeys; having a rational mistrust against stranger blood-thirsty barbers; but on this occasion, I retained my beard; since, however close shaved, it would have grown again by the road to such a length, that I could have fronted no minister and general with it.

With a vehement emotion, I threw myself on the pith-heart of my Berga, and, with a still more vehement one, tore myself away: in her, however, this our first marriage separation, seemed to produce less lamentation than triumph, less consternation than rejoicing; simply because she turned her eye not half so much on the parting as on the meeting, and the journey after me, and the wonder of the Fair. Yet she threw and hung herself on my somewhat long and thin neck, almost painfully, being indeed a too fleshy and weighty load, and said to me, "Whisk thee off quick my charming Attel (Attila), and trouble thy head with no cares by the way, thou singular man. A whiff or two of ill luck we can stand, by God's help, so long as my father is no beggar. And for thee, Franz," continued she, turning with some heat to her brother, "I leave my Attel on thy soul; thou well-knowest, thou wild fly, what I will do, if thou play the fool, and leave him any where in the lurch." Her meaning here was good, and I could not take it ill: to you also, my friends, her wealth and her open-heartedness are nothing new.

* Melted into sensibility, I said, "Now Berga, if there be a reunion appointed for us, surely it is either in Heaven or in Flaetz, and, I hope in God, the latter." With these words we whirled stoutly away. I looked round through the back windows of my coach at my good little village of Neussattel, and it seemed to me, in my melting mood, as if steeples were rising aloft like an epitaphium over my life, or over my body, perhaps to return a lifeless corpse. "How will it all be," thought I, "when thou at last, after two or three days, comest back?" And now I noticed my Bergelchen! looking after us from the garret window. I leaned far out of the coach-door, and her falcon eye instantly distinguished my head; kiss on kiss she threw with both hands after the carriage, as it rolled down into the valley. "Thou true-hearted wife!" thought I, "how is thy lowly birth by thy spiritual new birth, made forgettable, nay remarkable!"

I must confess the assemblage and conversational picnic of the stage-coach was much less to my taste; the whole of them suspicious, unknown rabble, whom (as markets usually do) the Flätz cattle market was alluring by its scent. I dislike becoming acquainted with strangers; not so my brother-in-law, the dragoon; who now, as he always does, had in a few minutes elbowed himself into close quarter with the whole raggamuffin posse of them. Beside me sat a person, who, in all human probability, was a harlot; on her breast, a Dwarf, intending to exhibit himself at the fair; on the other side was a Ratcatcher gazing at me; and a Blind Passenger, in a red mantle, had joined us down in the valley. No one of them, except my brother-in-law, pleased me. That rascals among these people would not study me and my properties and accidents, to entangle me in their snares, no man could be my surety. In strange places, I even, out of prudence, avoid looking up at any jail-window; because some losel, sitting behind the bars, may in a moment call down out of mere malice, "How goes it, comrade Schmelzle?" or further, because any lurking catchpole may fancy I am planning a rescue for some confederate above. From another sort of prudence, a little different from this, I also make a point of never turning round when any body calls "Thief!" after me.

As to the Dwarf himself, I had no objection to his travelling with me, whithersoever he pleased; but he thought to raise a particular delectation in our minds, by promising that his Pollux and Brother in Trade, who was also making for the Fair to exhibit himself, would by midnight with his elephantine face, infallibly overtake the coach, and plant himself among us, or behind, on the outside. Both these noodles, it appeared, are in the habit of going in company to fairs, as reciprocal exaggerators of opposite magnitudes. The Dwarf is the convex magnifying glass of the Giant, the Giant the concave diminishing glass of the Dwarf. Nobody expressed much joy at the prospective arrival of this Anti-Dwarf, except my brother-in-law, who, (if I may venture on a play of words), seems made, like a clock, solely for the purpose of striking, and once actually said to me: "That if in the upper world he could not get a soul to curry and toulze by a time, he would rather go to the under, where most probably there would be plenty of cuffing, and to spare." The Ratcatcher, besides the circumstance that no man can prepossess us much in his favour, who lives solely by poisoning, like this Destroying Angel of Rats, this Mouse-Atropos—and also, which is still worse, that such a fellow bids fair to become an increaser of the vermin of the kingdom, the moment he may cease to be a lessener of it—besides all this, I say, the present Ratcatcher had many baneful features about him; first, his stabbing look, piercing you like a stiletto; then, the lean sharp bony visage, conjoined with his enumeration of [his considerable stock of poisons; then (for I hated him more and more), his sly stillness, his sly smile, as if in some corner he noticed a mouse, as he would notice a man! To me, I declare, though usually I take not the slightest exception against people's looks, it seemed at last as if his throat were a Dog-grotto, a Grotta del Cane, his cheek bones cliffs and breakers, his hot breath, the wind of a calining furnace, and his black hairy breast a kiln for parching and roasting.

Nor was I far wrong, I believe; for soon after this, he began quite coolly to inform the company, in which were a dwarf and a female, that in his time he had, not without enjoyment, run ten men through the body; had with great convenience hewn off a dozen men's arms; slowly split four heads, torn out two hearts, and more of the like sort; while none of them, otherwise persons of spirit, had in the least resisted: "but why?" added he, with a poisonous smile, and taking the hat from his odious bald pate; "I am invulnerable. Let any of the company that chuses lay as much fire on my crown as he likes; I shall not mind it."

My brother-in-law, the dragoon, directly kindled his tinder-box, and put a heap of the burning matter on the ratcatcher's pole; but the fellow stood it as if it had been a mere picture of fire, and the two looked expectantly at one another; and the former smiled very foolishly, saying, "It was simply pleasant to him, like a good warming plaster; for this was always the wintry region of his body."

Here the dragoon groped a little on the naked skull, and cried with amazement, that "it was as cold as a kneecap."

But now the fellow to our horror, after some preparations, actually lifted off the quarter skull, and held it out to us saying: "He had sawed it off a murderer, his own having accidentally been broken;" and withal explained that the stabbing and arm cutting he had talked of was to be understood as a jest, seeing that he had merely done it in the character of Famulus at an Anatomical Theatre. However, the jester seemed to rise little in favour with any of us; and for my part, as he put his brain-lid and sham skull on again, I thought to myself: "This dunged-bell has changed its place, but not the hemlock it was made to cover."

Further, I could not but reckon it a suspicious circumstance that he as well as all the company, (the blind Passenger too), were making for this very Flätz, to which I myself was bound: much good I could not expect of this; and, in truth, turning home again would have been as pleasant to me as going on, had I not rather felt a pleasure in defying the future.

I come now to the Red-mantled Blind Passenger; most probably an Emigré or Refugée; for he speaks German not worse than he does French; and his name, I think, was Jean Pierre or Jean Paul, or some such thing, if indeed he had any name. His red cloak, notwithstanding this his identity of colour with the hangman, would, in itself, have remained heartily indifferent to me; had it not been for this singular circumstance, that he had already five times, contrary to all expectation, come upon me in different towns (in Great Berlin, in Little Hof, in Coburg, Meiningen, and Bayreuth), and each of these times had looked at me significantly enough and then gone his way. Whether this Jean Pierre is dogging me with hostile intent or not I cannot say; but to our fancy, at any rate, no object can be gratifying that thus, with corps of observation or out of loop holes, holds and aims at us with muskets, which for year after year it shall move to this side and that, without our knowing on whom it is to fire. Still more offensive did Red-cloak become to me, when he began to talk about his soft mildness of soul; a thing which seemed either to betoken pumping you or undermining you.

I replied, "Sir, I am just come with my brother-in-law here, from the field of battle, (the last affair was at Pimpelstadt), and so perhaps am too much of a humour for fire, pluck, and war-fury; and to many a one, who happens to have a roaring waterspout of a heart, it may be well if his clerical character (which is mine) rather enjoins on him mildness than wildness. However, all mildness has its iron limit. If any thoughtless dog chance to anger me, in the first heat of rage I kick my foot through him; and after me, my good brother here will perhaps drive matters twice as far, for he is the man to do it. Perhaps it may be singular; but I confess, I regret to this day, that once when a boy I received three blows from another, without tightly returning them; and I often feel as if I must still pay them to his descendants. In sooth, if I but chance to see a child running off like a dastard from the weak attack of a child like himself, I cannot for my life understand his running, and can scarcely keep from interfering to save him by a decisive knock."

The Passenger in the meanwhile was smiling, not in the best fashion. He gave himself out for a Legations-Rath, and seemed fox enough for such a post; but a mad fox will, in the long run, bite me as rabidly as a mad wolf will. For the rest, I calmly went on with my eulogy on courage; only that, instead of ludicrous gasconading, which directly betrays the coward, I purposely expressed myself in words at once cool, clear, and firm.

"I am altogether for Montaigne's advice," said I; "Fear nothing but fear."

"I again," replied the Legations-man, with useless wire-drawing, "I should fear again that I did not sufficiently fear fear, but continued too dastardly."

"To this fear also," replied I coldly, "I set limits. A man, for instance, may not in the least believe in, or be afraid of ghosts; and yet by night may bathe himself in cold sweat, and this purely out of terror at the dreadful fright he should be in, (especially with what whiff of epileptics, falling-sicknesses, and so forth, he might be visited) in case, simply, his own too vivid fancy should create any wild fever image, and hang up in the air before him."

"One should not, therefore," added my brother-in-law, the dragoon, contrary to his custom moralizing a little, "one should not bamboozle the poor sheep, man, with any ghost tricks; the hen heart may die on the spot."

A loud storm of thunder overtaking the stage-coach altered the discourse. You, my friends, knowing me as a man not quite destitute of some tincture of natural philosophy, will easily guess my precautions against thunder. I place myself on a chair in the middle of the room (often, when suspicious clouds are out, I stay whole nights upon it), and by careful removal of all conductors, rings, buckles, and so forth, I here sit thunder-proof, and listen with a cool spirit to this elementary music of the cloud kettle-drum. These precautions have never harmed me, for I am still alive at this date; and to the present hour

I congratulate myself on once hurrying out of church, though I had confessed but the day previous; and running without more ceremony, and before I had received the sacrament, into the charnel-house, because a heavy thunder-cloud (which did, in fact, strike the church-yard linden tree) was hovering over it. So soon as the cloud had dislodged itself, I returned from the charnel-house into the church, and was happy enough to come in after the hangman, (usually the last), and so still participate in the Feast of Love.

Such, for my own part, is my manner of proceeding; but in the full stage-coach I met with men to whom natural philosophy was no philosophy at all. For, when the clouds gathered dreadfully together over our coach canopy, and sparkling, began to play through the air, like so many fire-flies, and I at last could not but request that the sweating coach-conclave would at least bring out their watches, rings, money, and such like, and put them all into one of the carriage-pockets, that none of us might have a conductor on his body, not only would no one of them do it, but my own brother-in-law, the dragoon, even sprang out, with naked drawn sword, and swore that he would conduct the thunder all away himself. Nor do I know whether this desperate mortal was not acting prudently; for our position within was frightful, and any one of us might every moment be a dead man. At last, to crown all, I got into a half altercation with two of the rude members of our leathern household, the Poisoner and the Harlot; seeing by their questions, they almost gave me to understand, that, in our conversational pic-nic, especially with the Blind Passenger, I had not always come off with the best share. Such an imputation wounds your honour to the quick, and in my breast there was a thunder louder than that above us; however, I was obliged to carry on the needful exchange of sharp words as quietly and slowly as possible; and I quarrelled softly and in a low tone, lest in the end a whole coachful of people, set in arms against each other, might get into heat and perspiration; and so, by vapour steaming through the coach-roof, conduct the too near thunderbolt down into the midst of us. At last I laid before the company the whole theory of electricity, in clear words, but low and slow, (striving to avoid all emission of vapour); and especially endeavoured to frighten them away from fear. For, indeed, through fear, the stroke—nay, two strokes, the electric or the apoplectic—might hit any one of us; since in Exleben and Reimarus, it is sufficiently proved, that violent fear, by the transpiration it causes, may attract the lightning. I accordingly, in some fear of my own, and other people's fear, represented to the passengers that how in a coach so hot and crowded, with a drawn sword on the coach-box piercing the very lightning, with the thunder cloud hanging over us, and even with so many transpirations from incipient fear; in short, with such visible danger on every hand, they must absolutely fear nothing, if they would not, all and sundry, be smitten to death in a few minutes.

"O heaven!" cried I, "Courage! only courage! No fear, not even fear of fear! Would you have Providence to shoot you here sitting, like so many hares hunted into a pinfold? Fear, if you like, when you are out of the coach; fear to your heart's content in other places, where there is less to be afraid of; only not here, not here!"

I shall not determine, since among millions scarcely one man dies by thunder-clouds, but millions perhaps by snow-clouds, and rain-clouds, and thin mist—whether my coach-sermon would have made any claim to a prize for man-saving; however, at last, all uninjured, and driving towards a rain-bow, we entered the town of Vierstadt, where dwelt a post-master, in the street which the place had.

The Postmaster was a churl and a striker; a class of mortals whom I inexpressibly detest, as my fancy always whispers to me, in their presence, that by accident or dislike, I might happen to put on a scornful or impertinent look, and hound these mastiffs on my throat. Happily, in this case, (supposing I had even made a wrong face), I could have shielded myself with the dragoon; for whose giant force such matters are a tidbit. This brother-in-law of mine, for example, cannot pass any tavern where he hears a sound of battle, without entering, and, as he crosses the threshold, shouting, "Peace, dogs!"—and therewith, under show of a peace-deputation, he directly snatches up the first chair leg in his hand, as if it were an American peace columet, and cuts to the right and left among the belligerent powers, or he gnashes the hard heads of the parties together (he himself takes no side), catching each by the hind lock; in such cases, the rogue is in heaven.

I, for my part, rather avoid discrepant circles, than seek them; as I likewise avoid all dead or killed people: the prudent man easily foresees what is to be got by them; either vexation or injurious witnessing, or often even (when circumstances conspire) painful investigation, and suspicion of your being an accomplice.

In Vierstadt nothing of importance presented itself, except to my horror, a dog without a tail, which came running along the town or street. In the first fire of passion at this sight I pointed it out to the passengers, and then put the question, whether they could reckon a system of Medical Police well arranged, which, like this of Vierstadt, allowed dogs openly to scour about, when their tails were wanting? "What am I to do," said I, "when this member is cut away, and any such beast comes running towards me, and I cannot, either by the tail being cocked up or drawn in, since the whole is snipt off, come to any conclusion whether the vermin is mad or not? In this way, the most prudent man may be bit, and become rabid, and so make shipwreck purely for want of a tail compass."

The blind passenger (he now got himself inscribed as a seeing one, God knows for what objects) had heard my observation; which he now spun out in my presence almost into ridicule, and at last awakened in me the suspicion, that by an overdone flattery in imitating my style of speech, he meant to banter me: "The dog-tail," said he, "is, in truth, an alarm-beacon and finger post for us, that we come not even into the outmost precincts of madness; cut away from comets their tails, from Bashaws their's, from crabs their's (outstretched it denotes that they are burst); and in the most dangerous predicaments of life we are left without clew, without indicator, without hand in margin; and we perish not so much as knowing how."

For the rest, this stage passed over without quarrelling or peril. About ten o'clock, the whole party, including even the postillion, myself excepted, fell asleep. I indeed pretended to be sleeping, that I might observe whether some one, for his own good reasons, might not also be pretending it; but all continued snoring; the moon threw its brightening beams on nothing but down-pressed eyelids.

I had now a glorious opportunity of following Lavater's counsel, to apply the physiognomical ellwand especially to sleepers, since sleep, like death, expresses the genuine form in coarser lines. Other sleepers, not in stage-coaches, I think it less advisable to mete with this ellwand; having always an apprehension lest some fellow, but pretending to be asleep, may, the instant I am near enough, start up as in a dream, and deceitfully plant such a knock on the physiognomical mensurator's own facial structure, as to exclude it for ever from appearing in any Physiognomical Fragments (itself being reduced to one) either in the stippled or line style. Nay, might not the most honest sleeper in the world, just while you are in hand with his physiognomical dissection, lay about him, spurred on by honour, in some cudgelling scene he may be dreaming; and in a few instants of clapperclawing and kicking, and trampling, lull you into a much more lasting sleep than that out of which he was awakened?

In my Adumbrating Magic Lantern, as I have named the work, the whole physiognomical contents of this same sleeping stage-coach will be given to the world: there I shall explain to you at large how the poisoner with the murder-cupola, appeared to me devil-like; the dwarf old child-like; the harlot languidly shameless; my brother-in-law peacefully satisfied, with revenge or food; and the legations-rath, Jean Pierre, heaven only knows why, like a half angel,—though, perhaps it might be because only the fair body, not the other half, the soul, which had passed away in sleep, was affecting me.

I had almost forgotten to mention that in a little village, while my brother-in-law and the postillion were sitting at their liquor, I happily fronted a small terror, Destiny having twice been on my side. Not far from a hunting-box, beside a pretty clump of trees, I noticed a white tablet, with a black inscription on it. This gave me hopes that perhaps some little monumental piece, some pillar of honour, some battle memento,* might here be awaiting me. Ovee an untrodden flowery tangle, I reach the black on white; and to my horror and amazement, I decypher in the moonshine; Beware of Spring guns! Thus was I standing, perhaps half a pail's breadth from the trigger, with which, if I but stirred my heel, I should shoot myself off like a forgotten ramrod into the other world, beyond the verge of time!

The first thing I did was to clutch down my toenails, to bite, and, as it were, eat myself into the ground with them; since I might at least continue in warm life so long as I pegged my body firmly beside the atropos-scissors and hangman's block, which lay beside me; then I endeavoured to recollect by what steps the fiend had led me hither unshot, but in my agony I had perspired the whole of it, and could recollect nothing. In the devil's village close at hand there was no dog to be seen and called to, who might have plucked me from the water; and my brother-in-law and the postillion were both carousing with full can. However, I summoned my courage and determination; wrote down on a leaf of my pocket-book my last will, the accidental manner of my death, and my dying remembrance of Berga, and then, with full sail, flew helter-skelter through the midst of it the shortest way; expecting at every step to awaken the murderous engine, and thus to clap over my still long candle of life the bonsoir, or extinguisher, with my own hand. However, I got off without shot. In the tavern, indeed, there was more then one fool to laugh at me; because, forsooth, what none but a fool could know, this notice had stood there for the last ten years, without any gun, as guns often do without any notice. But so it is, my friends, with our game police, which warns against all things, only not against warnings.

VENTRILLOQUISM.

SOME people (saith our authority, an old magazine) possess the art of speaking inwardly, having the power of forming speech by drawing the air into their lungs, and of modifying the voice in such a manner as to make it seem to proceed from any distance, or in any direction. This art of vocal deception is called Ventriloquism. The public of late years have had their acquaintance with it renewed by means of the admirable Entertainments of Mr. Mathews; but never, we believe, were such triumphant exhibitions of it as are related in the following anecdote, furnished about fifty years since by the Abbe de la Chapelle, of the French Academy.

This gentleman having heard many surprising circumstances related concerning one M. St. Gille, a grocer at St. Germain-en-Laye, near Paris, whose astonishing powers as a ventriloquist had given occasion to many singular and diverting scenes, formed the resolution to see him. Struck by the many marvellous anecdotes related concerning him, the Abbe judged it necessary to ascertain the truth by the testimony of his own senses, and then to inquire into the cause and manner by which the phenomena were produced.

The Abbe having waited upon M. St. Gille and informed him of his design, was very cordially received. He was conducted into a parlour on the ground floor, and M. St. Gille and himself sate on the opposite sides of a small fire, with only a table between them, the author keeping his eyes fixed on M. St. Gille all the time. Half-an-hour had passed, during which that gentleman diverted the Abbe with many comic scenes to which he had given occasion by his talents, when all of a sudden the Abbe heard himself called by his name and title, in a voice that seemed to come from the roof of a house at a distance. He was almost petrified with astonishment; but recollecting himself, and asking M. St. Gille whether he had not given him a specimen of his art, he was answered only by a smile. But while the Abbe was pointing to the house from which the voice had appeared to him to proceed, his surprise was increased on hearing himself answered, "it was not from that quarter," apparently in the same kind of voice as before, but which now seemed to issue from the earth, at one of the corners of the room. In short, this fictitious voice played, as it were, every where about him, and seemed to proceed from any quarter or distance from which the ventriloquist chose to transmit it to him. The illusion was so very strong, that prepared as the Abbe was for this kind of conversation, his senses were incapable of undeceiving him; though conscious that the voice proceeded from the mouth of M. St. Gille, that gentleman appeared absolutely mute while exercising his talent, nor could the author perceive any change in his countenance. He observed, however, at this first visit, that M. St. Gille contrived, but without any affectation, to present only the profile of his face to him while he was speaking as a ventriloquist.

The next experiment of this ventriloquist was no less curious. M. St. Gille being on his way home from a place to which he had been on business, sought shelter from an approaching thunder storm in a neighbouring convent. Finding the whole community in mourning, he inquired the cause, and was told that one of their body had lately died who was the ornament and delight of the society. To pass away the time, he walked into the church attended by some of the monks, who shewed him the tomb of their deceased brother; and spoke freely of the scanty honours bestowed on his memory. Suddenly a voice is heard, apparently proceeding from the roof of the choir, lamenting the situation of the deceased in purgatory, and reproaching the brotherhood with their lukewarmness and want of zeal on his account. The friars, as soon as their astonishment gave them power to speak, consulted together, and agreed to acquaint the rest of the community with this singular event, so interesting to the whole society.

M. St. Gille, who wished to carry on the joke still further, dissuaded them from taking this step, telling them that they would be treated by their absent brethren as a set of fools or visionaries. He, however, advised them to call the whole community immediately into the church; where the ghost of their departed brother might probably repeat his complaints. Accordingly, all the friars, novices, lay-brothers, and even the domestics of the convent were summoned and collected together. In a short time, the voice from the roof renewed its lamentations and reproaches, and the whole convent fell on their faces and vowed a solemn reparation. As a preliminary step, they chaunted a de profundis, in full choir, during the intervals of which the ghost occasionally expressed the comfort he received from their pious exercises and ejaculations in his behalf. When all was over, the prior entered into a serious conversation with M. St. Gille, and on the strength of what had just passed inveighed against the absurd incredulity of modern sceptics and pretended philosophers in regard to ghosts or apparitions. M. St. Gille thought it now time to undeceive the good fathers. This, however, he found it very difficult to effect till he prevailed upon them to return with them into the church, and there be witnesses of the manner in which he had conducted this ludicrous deception.

In consequence of three memoirs presented by the author to the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris, in which he communicated to them the observations he had collected upon the subject of ventriloquism in general, and those he had made on M. St. Gille in particular, that learned body deputed two of its members, M. de Fouchy and M. le Roi, to accompany him to St. Germain-en-Laye, in order to verify the facts, and make observation on the nature and causes of this extraordinary faculty. In the course of this inquiry a very singular plan was laid and executed, to put M. St. Gille's powers of deception to the trial, by engaging him to exert them in the presence of a large party, consisting of the commissioners of the Academy, and some persons of the first quality, who were to dine in the open forest near St. Germain-en-Laye, on a particular day. All the members of this party were in the secret, except a certain countess, who was pitched upon as a proper victim to M. St. Gille's delusive powers, as she knew nothing even of M. St. Gille or of ventriloquism; and we may imagine, perhaps, for another reason, which the Abbe, through politeness, suppresses. She had been told in general that this party had been formed in consequence of a report that an aerial spirit had lately established itself in the forest of St. Germain-en-Laye, and that a grand deputation from the Academy of Sciences were to pass the day there, to enquire into the reality of the fact.

M. St. Gille, it may be readily conceived, was one of this select party. Previously to his joining the company in the forest he completely deceived even one of the commissioners of the Academy who was then walking from them, and whom he accidentally met. Just as he was abreast of him, prepared and guarded as he was against a deception of this kind, he verily believed that he heard his associate, M. de Fouchy, who was then with the company above one hundred yards distance, calling after him to return as expeditiously as possible. His valet too, after repeating to his master the purport of M. de Fouchy's supposed exclamation, turned about towards the company, and with the greatest simplicity imaginable, bawled out as loud as he could in answer to him, "Yes, sir!"

After this successful beginning the company sate down to dinner, and the aerial spirit, who had been previously furnished with proper anecdotes respecting company, soon began to address the countess, in a voice that seemed to be in the air over their heads; sometimes it spoke to her from the tops of the trees around them, or from the surface of the ground at a pretty large distance; and at other times, seemed to speak from a considerable distance under her feet. During dinner the spirit seemed to be absolutely inexhaustible in the gallantries he addressed to her, though he sometimes said civil things to another lady. This kind of conversation lasted about two hours, and the countess was firmly persuaded, as the rest of the company affected to be, that this was the voice of an aerial spirit. Nor would she, as the author affirms, have been undeceived, had not the rest of the company, by their unguarded behaviour, at length excited in her some suspicions. The little plot against her was then owned, and she acknowledged herself to be mortified only in being waked from a delicious delusion.

Several other instances of M. St. Gille's talents are related. The author, in his course of inquiries on this subject, was informed that the Baron de Mengen, a German nobleman, possessed the same art in a very high degree. The baron constructed a little puppet or doll, the lower jaw of which he moved by a particular contrivance: with this doll he used to hold a spirited kind of dialogue, in the course of which the little virago became so impertinent, that he was at last obliged to thrust her into his pocket, where she seemed, to those present, to grumble and complain of her hard treatment.

The baron, being at the court of Bareuth, along with the Prince of Deux Ponts, and other noblemen, amused himself with this scene. An Irish officer, then present, was so firmly persuaded that the baron's doll was a living animal previously taught by him to repeat these responses, that he watched an opportunity at the close of the dialogue, and suddenly made an attempt to snatch it from his pocket. The little doll, as if in danger of being suffocated during the struggle occasioned by this attempt, called out for help and screamed incessantly from the pocket, till the officer desisted. She then became silent, and the baron was obliged to take her out, to convince him by handling, that she was a mere piece of wood.

THE GERMAN PRINCE'S ACCOUNT OF HIS VOYAGE IN A BALLOON.

THE "German Prince," with whom the public became so agreeably acquainted under that title by means of his "Tour," and who was supposed to be dead at one time, and "somebody else" at another, (some said an Irish officer) is now known to be Prince Pückler-Muskau, a Silesian nobleman, whose ancestors were among the petty feudatories of the German empire. He is a man of lively and even great talents, a little too much used by the world, and spoilt by the combination of all sorts of advantages, for want of a necessity of bestirring himself, and from being a prince, and handsome. He can think, write, and act; and has killed his man in single combat between two armies, like a hero of chivalry; but then he must needs intimate to us his conquests among the ladies; and being an universalist, he thinks it incumbent upon him (as well as pleasant) to be a gourmand, and to imitate the narrowness as well as the enlargement of any idol of the day, who thought his perfections required, or warranted, a set off of infirmity. So, at least, we may gather from his writings; and such, and more, his enemies aver him to be, probably without reason; for it is plain, even from his self-committals, from his cultivation of a natural piety, and the good which he does to the people on his estate, that a great deal of goodheartedness, and real fineness of nature, is mixed up with a doubtful shewiness; and his "Tour" has a power of reflection in it, as well as a brilliance of manner, rarely to be met with in books of travels, or in any books.

In the following account we see the restless man of pleasure, eager for enjoyment in any shape, especially that which shall help him to cut a figure. But we see also the gallant spirit, and the observer worthy of nature. The passage is taken from the two volumes of miscellanies, or short pieces, by him, a translation of which appeared the other day under the title of Tutti Frutti (all Fruits)—so called from a Neapolitan ice of that name.

I had scarcely recovered from a severe illness, when Mr. Richard, the aeronaut, came to Berlin, and paid me a visit, for the purpose of receiving introductory letters. He is a sensible, well-informed man, and his interesting narrative awakened in me an irresistible desire to soar once in my life to the empire of the eagle.

He interposed no obstacle to the gratification of my wishes, and we decided that he should construct a balloon at my expense. Truly the sum was no bagatelle, as the different items amounted to 600 rix dollars. But, even at this rate, the pleasure I enjoyed was cheaply purchased.

The day which we selected was one of the most heavenly that could be imagined; scarcely a cloud was to be seen in the firmament; half the population of Berlin were assembled in the streets, squares, and on the roofs of the houses.

We entered the car, and out of the centre of this motley multitude ascended majestically towards the heavens. Our frail aerial bark, not much larger than a child's cradle, was surrounded by a net work, as a protection against any giddiness that might ensue; but notwithstanding the weakness which remained after my indisposition, I did not experience the slightest disagreeable sensation.

As we gently and slowly ascended, I had sufficient time to salute and receive in return the farewell salutations of my friends below. No imagination can paint anything more beautiful than the magnificent scene now disclosed to our enraptured senses. The multitude of human beings, the houses, the squares and streets, the highest towers gradually diminishing; while the deafening tumult became a gentle murmur, and finally melted into a death-like silence. The earth which we had recently left, lay extended in miniature relief beneath us; the majestic linden trees appeared like green furrows; the river Spree like a silver thread; and the gigantic poplars of the Potsdam Allée, which is several leagues in length, threw their shade over the immense plain.

We had probably ascended by this time some thousand feet, and lay softly floating in the air, when a new and more superb spectacle burst upon our delighted view. As far as the eye could compass the horizon, masses of threatening clouds were chasing each other to the immeasurable heights above; and, unlike the level appearance which they wear when seen from the earth, their entire altitude was visible in profile, expanded into the most monstrous dimensions: chains of snow-white mountains wrought into fantastic forms, seemed as if they were tumbling headlong upon us.

One colossal mass pressed upon another, encompassing us on every side, till we began to ascend more rapidly, and soared high above them, while they now lay beneath us, rolling over one another like the billows of the sea when agitated by the violence of the storm, and obscuring the earth from our view. At intervals the fathomless abyss was occasionally illumined by the beams of the sun, and resembled for a moment the burning crater of a volcano; then new volumes rushed forward and closed up the chasm: all was strife and tumult. Here we beheld them piled on each other, white as the drifted snow, there in fearful heaps of a dark watery black; at one instant rearing towers upon towers, in the next creating a gulf at the sight of which the brain became giddy, dashing eternally onward, onward, in wild confusion. I never before witnessed anything comparable to this scene, even from the summit of the highest mountains; besides, from them the continuing chain is generally a great obstruction to the view, which, after all, is only partial; but here there was nothing to prevent the eye from ranging over the boundless expanse.

The feeling of absolute solitude is rarely experienced upon the earth; but in these regions, separated from all human associations, the soul might almost fancy it had passed the confines of the grave. Nature was entirely noiseless—even the wind was silent; therefore, receiving no opposition, we gently floated along, and the lonely stillness was only interrupted by the progress of the car and its colossal ball, which, self-propelled, seemed like the roc-bird fluttering in the blue ether.

Enraptured with the novel scene, I stood up, in order to enjoy more completely the superb prospect, when Mr. Richard, with great sang froid, told me I must be seated, for that, owing to the great haste with which it had been constructed, the car was merely glued, and therefore might easily come asunder, unless we were careful.

It may readily be supposed that after receiving this intimation I remained perfectly quiet. We now commenced descending, and were several times obliged to throw out some of the ballast in order to rise again. In the meantime we dipped insensibly into the sea of clouds which enveloped us like a thick veil, and through which the sun appeared like the moon in Ossian. This illumination produced a singular effect, and continued for some time till the clouds separated, and we remained swimming about beneath the once more clear azure heavens.

Shortly after, we beheld, to our great astonishment, a species of "Fata Morgana" seated upon an immense mountain of clouds, the colossal picture of the balloon and ourselves, surrounded by myriads of variegated rainbow tints. A full half-hour the spectral reflected picture hovered constantly by our side. Each slender thread of the net work appeared distended to the size of a ship's cable, and we ourselves like two tremendous giants enthroned on the clouds.

Towards evening it again became a little hazy; our ballast was exhausted, and we fell with alarming rapidity, which my companion ascertained with his barometer, although it was not apparent to the senses.

We were now surrounded for some time by a thick fog; and as we rapidly sunk through it, we beheld in a few minutes the earth beneath glowing in the most brilliant sunshine: and the towers of Potsdam, which we distinctly beheld, saluted us with a joyful carillon.

Our situation however was not so full of festivity as our reception. We had already thrown out our mantles, a roasted pheasant, and a couple of bottles of Champagne, which we had taken with us for the purpose of supping in the clouds, laughing heartily at the consternation which this proceeding would cause in any of the inhabitants of the earth who happened to be sleeping upon the turf, in case the pheasant should fall into his mouth and the wine at his feet; but we could not forbear hoping that it would not descend upon his head, as, instead of an agreeable excitement to his brain, it would act the part of a destroying thunderbolt.

We were ourselves, like the other articles, tumbling, but to our great consternation, we saw nothing beneath us but water (the various arms and lakes of the river Havel), only here and there intermixed with wood, to which we directed our course as much as possible. We approached the latter with great velocity, which appeared to me from the height like an insignificant thicket. In a few seconds we were actually hanging on one of the branches of the shrubs, for such I really believed them to be; in consequence of which I commenced making the necessary arrangements to descend, when Richard called out, "In God's name, stir not; we are entangled on the top of an immense pine!"

I could hardly believe my eyes, and it required the lapse of several seconds to convince me that what he asserted was really true, having entirely lost, in a few hours, the capacity of measuring distance.

We were most certainly perched on the highest branches of an enormous tree, and the means to descend set our inventive powers at defiance; we called, or rather shouted for help,—first in solo, then in duetto, till we began to fear that we should be obliged to support our character of birds by roosting in the tree, for night was fast approaching. At length we saw an officer riding along the high road, which caused us to renew our cries with doubled vigour; he paused, but thinking it might be robbers, who were endeavouring to inveigle him into the wood, galloped off with the rapidity of lightning; but as we continued vociferating, he gave a heaven-directed glance, discovered us, raised himself in the saddle, reined in his horse, and with outstretched neck and distended eyes, endeavoured to ascertain, if possible, the nature of the singular nest he beheld in the gigantic pine. At length, having satisfied himself that we were really not of the winged creation, he procured men, ladders, and a carriage from the neighbouring town.

But as all this consumed no inconsiderable space of time, we remained perched in mid air; and it was quite dark when we arrived at Potsdam with our balloon, which, by the way, was very little injured. We took up our abode at the Hermit Hotel, at that time badly conducted, where we, alas! had ample reason to regret the loss of our supper.

* Eight days afterwards, a peasant brought me my mantle, which I still preserve; and fifteen years later as I entered a Prussian post-house with the intention of sharply reprimanding the post-master for detaining me, as I wanted a relay of horses, he came forward, good-humouredly looked at me, smiled, and then suddenly exclaimed, "Good Heavens! certainly you must be the gentleman I delivered out of the balloon," adding, "at present you must wait still longer." I instantly remembered his countenance and voice, and after conversing with him for some time, I found he was an old comrade, who had fought with me in various battles, which had been the means of delivering our country from foreign dominion; tales upon tales rapidly succeeded each other, until at length the impatient and repeated blasts of the post-boy's horn compelled me to press the veteran's hand, and take, what will probably prove, a last adieu.

CORREGGIO, JULIO ROMANO, AND AN- NIBAL CARACCI.

The following extract from Mr. Landseer's Catalogue, just published, chiefly concerns the first of these great painters; but the other two are so pleasantly brought in, under circumstances of so much moral beauty, and so honourably withal to Correggio as well as themselves, that we delight in the opportunity of linking the names of all three. There are some names and words which it is as pleasant to repeat as the most golden lines of poetry.

Mr. Landseer's book (for a book it is, and a good sized one,) is entitled A Descriptive, Explanatory, and Critical Catalogue of Fifty of the Earliest Pictures contained in the National Gallery of Great Britain.* It is to be followed by another volume. We have not yet read a third of it, but we shall go through it, every bit, being almost as great devourers of works on painting as those on poetry, and almost tasting the colours, &c., as we go, as if they were so much golden jelly, or ambrosia dipped in rainbows. All we require in the critic is, that he should have some relish himself, and be in earnest; and Mr. Landseer has a good deal of relish, and is unquestionably zealous for the real interests of art. We do not agree hitherto, with all his conclusions, still less in his thinking that love and hate are identified in this or any other zeal, (a figment trumped up by some splenetic men of genius to excuse their pugnacity; for nobody hates what he thoroughly understands; he sees too much reason to excuse and pity it, and too much necessity for the exercise of charity towards himself.) There are also some inaccuracies of expression in the book, especially on the scholarly side; and too many words, perhaps, altogether. But it is very clever; has some excellent passages, we dare say, many (the following is one of them;) and it is calculated to excite much conversation among artists and critics, and to do a great deal of good. Such works ought to be bought by the National Gallery and laid on its tables, for the sake of furthering the love and knowledge of the pictures around them. Mr. Hazlitt's beautiful book on the Picture Galleries of England, itself a set of paintings, ought to be there; (we are glad to see it quoted so much by Mr. Landseer:) Mr. Patmore's (under a similar title,) should accompany it; and the criticisms in Jones's National Gallery, should not be wanting; nor those in the Cabinet Gallery by Mr. Landseer's friend, or foe, Mr. Cunningham. In short, we would have all, of any cleverness, allowed to come together by the Directors in a large, unlearning spirit of liberality, anxious only to have the Arts talked about and encouraged, according to the powers of the speakers, and the various degrees of understanding to which they address themselves.

But to our beautiful names, and Mr. Landseer's very agreeable specimen.

Of the Holy Families, treasured (says he) in our National Gallery, that from the pencil of Correggio is the finest; and perhaps it would have been esteemed still finer as a work of art, had it not been entitled a Holy Family, since there is nothing in the external pretension or shew of Divinity about it, save and except its superlative merits as a picture, and that single and quite subordinate circumstance which we shall proceed to mention.

As a young, innocent, and smiling nurse attentive to her charge; or a delighted mother attiring her infant son, it is of transcendental excellence: but since there is a carpenter at work in the back ground, its pretensions to be esteemed the Holy Family must be regarded as indisputable, and we shall presently treat of it accordingly. It has already been treated of by Raphael Mengs, in his own account of the paintings in the Royal collection at Madrid, of which it was formerly esteemed to be one of the chief ornaments. His opinions we have not had the pleasure of perusing, but in all probability the reader who wishes to form a critical estimate of the merits of Correggio's Holy Family, will find the remarks of such an artist as Mengs well worthy of being consulted.

After being acquainted with this work only through the medium of engravings, we were both surprised and delighted at sight of the original; not that the engravings were not good; but that there is so much of the celestial purity of painting (technically speaking), and so much of that kind of peculiarity withal, which can no more be translated or rendered into another language of art—or at least which has not yet been rendered—than words can express it. So much is there of these extraordinary qualities, that it came upon us like a heavenly vision, or a picture from another planet. The Athenians of old possessed a statue of their tutelary deity which was fabled to have fallen from heaven, and was much venerated. It had a primitive air, yet was crude, archaic, and graceless. Could they have shewn such a work of art as this of Correggio, their fable had been rendered credible, and their veneration been justified upon internal evidence. Yet these high claims reside not in anything celestial, superlative, or ineffable, in the character either of the Madonna, or infant Saviour; and if, in what shall follow, these terms or any of them, shall fall from our pen, they must be understood as being intended to be applied to the peculiar felicity with which the painter has employed the instruments of his art—not to indicate the unspeakable beauty of the characters he has produced—but we must develope and explain.

The Madonna has come forth into the genial summer air of Nazareth, as if to sit with her celestial charge, and inhale the freshness of its breezes: her little basket of nursery implements is beside her, and at a short distance in the back ground, Joseph the Carpenter is sedately at work, which (as is observed above) is the chief signal of a holy family being here intended by the artist. Intent upon his occupation among unfinished evidences, and quite detached from the fore-ground objects, he seems introduced as a denoting sign and no more, and the Madonna and Bambino to be the things signified: as if Correggio had preferred this to the having recourse to such conventional circlets of sanctitude, as, in the works of his predecessors and contemporaries, betokened holiness; and had resolved by the potency of his art, and without factitious aid, to raise what was earthly into heavenly importance, as Adam is recorded to have been created out of clay.

And this is what he has accomplished. Of the infant Christ, the purity of its innocence alone, seems to elevate it almost sufficiently towards divinity. There is no dawn of the incipient consciousness of his sublime destiny. We speak here of what is expressed in his countenance and action. In character it has somewhat the air and peculiarity of being the portrait of a handsome and fair-headed English child; his complexion too is exquisitely fair. The placidly smiling maternal tenderness of the young Madonna, as she enrobes her infant, is also beautifully expressed. An excellent critic thinks we may observe in this female a certain innocent girlish pride arising from the consciousness of the perfections of the infant entrusted to her; which perhaps no painter, except Correggio, ever conceived. But this girlish pride is scarcely compatible with the lofty dignity which the religion of Italy attached to the character of the mother of our Saviour; nor could it probably have co-existed with that due consciousness of the perfections of the Holy Infant, which in some of Raphael's Madonnas is so profound as to absorb every other sentiment.

* A landscape phenomenon, so called on the coast of Naples, supposed to be the work of the Fata, or Fairy Morgana. The nature of it is intimated by what follows.

* By John Landseer, Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, Member of the London Royal Academy of Arts and Sciences, &c. pp. 424. Glyn.

To our view the group appears to beam with domestic affection, but it does not go beyond select nature. Although the fine art with which it is rendered be quite marvellous, there is nothing about it of the ideal or deific being intended to be superinduced on the terrestrial, otherwise than by the beauty of the internal blandishments of art.

In these respects, Julio Romano's Holy group (which we dismissed a few pages back) and the present, are wide as the poles apart: and may therefore serve to teach us how various and vast are the scope of excellence and the pleasure to be derived from pictures. Both artists are justly admired, although the one be deficient in every requisite in which the other shines and abounds.

Wide as the poles apart although Julio Romano and Correggio were, upon an important professional principle; there is pleasure in perceiving that the sphere of their art revolved in an orbit of urbanity; and that if the envy and professional jealousies of some painters, have been held up to public ridicule and dislike, others are liberal—pre-eminent amongst whom was Julio Romano. Yes: amid the professional envy and uncharitableness, which literary commentators have been a little too prone perhaps to select and report; it is but fair to mention that Julio candidly and liberally affirmed Correggio's colouring to be "altogether the best he had ever seen; nor was he averse to the Duke of Mantua giving the preference to Correggio above himself, when about to make a presentation of pictures to the Emperor Charles." [Roscoe's Lanzi].

Let the reader call to mind here how tempting and how flattering to an artist's ambition was this occasion. And when we reflect too that decision of style in art proceeds from vigour and peculiarity of thought—such liberality as is here implied* is worthy of being placed upon record, as equally honorable to Julio Romano, and to Correggio.

To return to Correggio's Holy Family. There is nothing at all about the group, of its author having intended in the delineation of his component forms, to superinduce the ideal or deific, on the terrestrial; or (in other words,) of superseding "Nature as it is" by "Nature as it ought to be"—otherwise than by the beautiful blandishments of light shade and colour. There is not the least indication that such a thought had, at this period of life, entered into the mind of Correggio.

The child is accordingly in playful action, as if something at a little distance and out of the picture—a passing butterfly perhaps—had caught its attention, and occasioned some small temporary impediment as the benevolent mother puts on his outer dress of light purple;—a sort of thing that happens to almost every mother, almost every day. Her hands, and those of the child, are most delightfully drawn and painted, and perhaps are all the better for the artists' avoidance of that factitious gracefulness of lengthening out the extremities far beyond Nature's average, in which Parmegiano about this time, or soon afterward, began to indulge.

The draperies throughout are cast in a masterly style; broad, and but little divided over the larger forms; more divided and subdivided where it is of finer texture; but everywhere characterized by a certain squareness* which is in agreeable opposition to the roundness of the limbs and other nudities.

The robe of the Madonna is red, but the artist has contrived that enough of white shall approach the carnations both of the mother and the child, to shew to the greatest advantage those flesh tints, which of themselves would be exquisite and admirable! In the works of no other master do we find the cool pearly greys worked into the warmer hues with such magical and exemplary skill. It is really a thing to stand before with wonder and amazement! The infant limbs are beautifully moulded; the head is immaculate, and all are rounded and blended into the most perfect harmony! The effect seems to have resulted from the dexterous and exemplary management of light, shade, and colour; lines are scarcely recognised, and there is little of distinct specification. The right knee and leg of the Saviour come forward, and on the right side these are pronounced with distinctness against the red robe of the Madonna—and so of his face: but everywhere else, his figure is melting and mellifluous blandishment, like the concert of sweet sounds. It far transcends all painting of the kind that had preceded it; and through the three centuries that have since elapsed, panting art has "toiled after it in vain."

The whole performance seems to owe its divinity

* But, in truth, the instances of such liberal emulation and appreciation—at least among modern painters—are much more numerous than the world has given them credit for. He who goes much into their society cannot have failed to witness instances of respectful deference for, and as high and just appreciation of, each other's talents, as you will find among any numerous body of fellow practitioners of the same profession (even the clergy themselves). To be sure, they also occasionally blame heartily; but the same sincerity gives birth to both.

in great part, at least, to the absence of all effort to make it appear divine. It is as if the author felt quite certain that there was no other art addressable to mortal, but through terrestrial and intrinsic means. It sets the sophistry of art at an immense distance, and reduces to nothingness those meretricious and fantastic tricks that are sometimes played before the high heaven of painting, "which make the angels weep."

To be able to appreciate and enjoy such works as this divine mother and child, is no trivial attainment of taste, and the less experienced reader will not regret if he sympathetically catch a portion, at least, of this pleasure and this power from Annibal Carracci, who writes of the finer qualities of Correggio,—"This kind of delicacy and purity, which is rather truth itself than verisimilitude, pleases me greatly. It is neither artificial nor forced, but quite natural." And in another place, treating of the youthful heads of Correggio, the same distinguished painter writes, (what is very pertinent to the present performance) "The faces beam with so much nature and simplicity, as to enchant, and compel us, as it were, to smile as they smile." This is charming. The ascribing to Correggio of this power of exacting involuntary sympathy by his productions, is an exquisite compliment, proceeding, as it does, from an artist of Annibal's high attainments: yet who feels not something of this as he gazes at the present Madonna and infant, or in the words of Milton,—

— "Hangs over it enamour'd"

That the Emperor Charles V. received the little picture which is the subject of our present essay, as a present from the Duke of Mantua; and that it is the very work, (or one of the works,) alluded to by the historian of Italian art, and by Julio Romano, in the passage which we have quoted above, is by no means improbable, since it was imported into England within these few years, from the Spanish metropolis, and we believe from the Escorial, by Mr. Wallis (an English artist, since deceased,) who either gave or received for it two thousand guineas.

TWO LEGENDS OF THE WARDROBE.

(From Mr. Planche's "British Costume.")

A FRENCH writer, of the "olden time," to deter his daughters from extravagance and superfluity in dress, recounts the legend of a knight, who having lost his wife, applied to a hermit to ascertain if her soul had taken an upward or a downward direction. The good man, after long praying, fell asleep in his chapel, and dreamed that he saw the soul of the fair lady weighed in a balance, with St. Michael on one side, and the devil on the other. In the scale which contained her soul were placed the good deeds of her life, and in the opposite one her evil actions, and beside the scale lay her fine costly clothing in the care of a friend. The devil then said to St. Michael; "This woman had ten divers gowns and as many coats, and you well know that a smaller number would have been sufficient for every thing necessary, according to the law of God, and that with the value of one of these gowns or coats, no less than forty poor men might have been clothed and kept from the cold, and that the mere waste cloth in them would have saved two or three from perishing;" so saying, the foul fiend gathered up all her gay garments, rings, and jewels, and flung them into the scale with her evil actions, which instantly preponderated, and Saint Michael immediately left the lady and her wardrobe at the devil's disposal.

The eldest of two sisters was promised by her father to a young knight, possessed of a large estate. The day was appointed for the gentleman to make his visit, he not having as yet seen either of them, and the ladies were informed of his coming, that they might be prepared to receive him. The affianced bride, who was the handsomest of the two, being desirous to shew her elegant shape and slender waist to the best advantage, clothed herself in a cote-hardie, which sat very straight and close upon her, without any lining or facing of fur, though it was in winter, and exceedingly cold. The consequence was that she appeared pale and miserable like one perishing with the severity of the weather; while her sister, who, regardless of her shape, had attired herself rationally with thick garments lined with fur, looked warm and healthy, and ruddy as a rose. The young knight was fascinated by her who had the most health and the most prudence, and having obtained the father's consent to the change, left the mortified sister to shiver in single blessedness.

TABLE-TALK.

The Game of Morra.—The Morra of the Italians, the Munke of the Germans, and the Mourre of the French, is also met with in Spain, and is well known in Greece. Indeed a celebrated modern Greek poet, Solomos of Zante, has made an allusion to it in one of his compositions. It is played in Scotland, and also in Ireland, and is not, I believe, wholly unknown in our own country, though less so than in those above named; on which account I shall endeavour to give an idea of the manner in which it is played, and in what it consists.

The Mourre of the French may be considered as two distinct games, the one (micatio digitorum) consists in one of the parties quickly holding up one or more of his fingers, and calling out a higher number than those make which he holds up; the other party must instantly and without consideration hold up as many of his, the number of which added to that indicated by the fingers of his opponent will amount to the numbers called by the latter. Thus if the one hold up two and call out five, the second must instantly hold up three of his to complete the number named; in the event of an error the party failing has to pay a fine. This game is very common in the South of France and in Italy, where men and women may be repeatedly seen playing at it.

The other division of the Mourre is that played by young girls on the petals of flowers when seeking for sweethearts, and it is at this game the fair Chinese are supposed to be playing. A margaret or chrysanthemum is the flower usually selected: the little one begins by plucking off one of the petals, saying at the same time, Il m'aime un peu; for the second, beaucoup, for the third passionnement, and for the fourth, pas du tout. She then commences again with the same words and in the same order, until she arrives at the last petal, and according as the corresponding word, happens to be much or little, &c., so is she beloved by the object of her researches. The Morra of the Italians and Munke of the Germans correspond exactly to both these different games. In Greece, the latter seems to be chiefly known, though I have met with some Greeks who were not wholly unacquainted with the former. The Spanish girls have also a mode of divining with grapes after the same manner. In Germany the young ladies pursue their investigations somewhat further than their fair neighbours the French: plucking the petals in the same way they pronounce the words, Edelmänn, Bettelmann, Pfaff, Soldat, Student, nobelman, beggar, parson, soldier, student, thus learning the quality of their lover; they then take another of the same kind of flowers, and repeat the following words, plucking off a petal for each: Er liebt mich von Herzen—mit Schmerzen—Klein wenig—kein ger nicht. He loves me with his heart—with smart,—very little,—not at all. Sometimes, however, they only repeat the words, he loves me, he loves me not, in succession, and indeed Goethe, in his original and extraordinary composition, Faust, makes Margaret pluck an ester when in the garden with Faust, and repeat these words to see if she is loved by him. The Grecian ladies chiefly employ the latter words, but repeat their operations on three flowers; it therefore results that they must have the same word twice out of thrice, and this of course is very decisive.

The Chinese, it appears, are acquainted with both these games, the one with the flowers and that with the fingers: the latter is much used by the Manderins; they may be seen sitting together amusing themselves playing at it, and not unfrequently in the absence of others, with their servants. In Italy, France, and Germany, the micatio digitorum, however, is confined exclusively to the vulgar.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

G. H. L. shall be considered.

D. L.'s lines do him singular credit as a foreigner but are not thoroughly correct in their English.

An answer shall be given to PHILLO.

J. S. the first opportunity.

Our numerous poetical correspondents shall receive a notice shortly from a very illustrious and apparently impossible quarter; to wit, Goethe himself; for an Address which he wrote to "Young German Poets" is singularly applicable to all young poetical personages who correspond with periodicals. Perhaps we shall give it next week.

We shall pay due attention to "Old Boy" in a new paper on the subject. It is that upon which G. H. writes to us.

Many thanks to our fair correspondent CECILIA. We will see the observations she speaks of.

ZETA has an eye for truth and nature, and cannot do better than cultivate his faculty as a grace and a recreation. We do not recommend him, or anybody, let his faculties be what they may, to make writing the business of his life; nor, indeed, do we understand him as implying a wish to do so; but it may be as well to touch upon this point. If authorship must be a man's task, it will come; and his lot may have its pains or its pleasures, as may happen; but nobody can reckon upon its being sufficient for him in a worldly point of view, apart from other means of success.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY,

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES OF EMINENT ARTISTS:

Comprising Painters, Sculptors, Engravers, and Architects, from the earliest period to the present time, interspersed with Original Anecdotes. To which is added an Introduction, containing a Brief Account of the various Schools of Art.

By JOHN GOULD.

NOTICES OF THE WORK.

"It is seldom that we meet with a work upon the arts and artists that is not written in a style so completely professional as to render it unpleasing and tedious to the unprofessional reader. The excellent book before us is one of those few which afford gratification to every one. Mr. Gould appears to be one of those 'active and sensible minds' whom Gesner speaks of, in laying down what is necessary to constitute a great artist, who, possessing a true feeling of the sublime parts of art, appear to join an inflexible labour to an habitual meditation. His book is a delightful one to read; the introduction, nervously and elegantly written, explains the natures and characteristics of the various schools of painting, and gives a concise view of each, from the time of Cimabue, and the founding of the school of Florence, to the present time. To this department of the work are prefixed some valuable lessons in painting, which young artists with aspiring minds would do well to study. * * * * In conclusion we recommend this useful, instructive, and entertaining work to our readers: as a book of reference it is invaluable, and the general reader will find in its pages much and profitable amusement."—Bell's New Weekly Messenger.

"This volume contains a well arranged selection of sketches of all the eminent painters, sculptors, engravers, and architects, that have adorned the world from its earliest periods: with the brief sketches are interspersed original anecdotes, and much useful information in reference to various schools of art. The work, from its brevity and judicious arrangement, forms a more intelligent and amusing book of reference than has yet appeared on the subject."—Satirist.

"A little work which, amongst lovers of art, will be received with welcome, has just been published by Edinham Wilson, under the above title, and contains the essence of the voluminous publications, not only in our own, but in foreign languages, which have been dedicated to the biography of celebrated painters, sculptors, architects, and engravers. It is, in fact, an abridged and condensed dictionary of artists, occupying the space of a small sized but thick octavo, very convenient in point of dimensions, and, at the same time, abounding in information. Mr. Gould, its compiler, has acquitted himself of his task with much judgment; we should remark that he has brought his English notices down to the present day."—Morning Herald.

"This is a well-arranged, intelligent, and highly useful work. It forms one bulky but handsomely printed volume, and may be described as a biographical dictionary of painters, sculptors, engravers, and architects, from the earliest ages to the present time. 'The lives are preceded by a well-written essay on art, in which the origin of decorative architecture, painting, &c., is traced, the splendid triumphs of Greece and Rome are accurately described, and the revival of the fine arts is cleverly detailed.' The whole work is interspersed with valuable and skilful critical remarks and amusing anecdotes. To the amateur and the artist this work may be recommended as a serviceable guide and a safe authority."—Weekly Dispatch.

"This is one of the most useful and most acceptable vols. that could have been produced. All previous Dictionaries of Painters, &c., have been too voluminous, and, though voluminous, incomplete and unsatisfactory; but Mr. Gould has here contrived to present us, in a portable form, with all that is really desirable for common purposes of reference and information. He is fairly entitled to the motto, multum in parvo; for, though his space is confined, his views are extensive. In an 'Introduction,' of nearly a hundred pages, we have a general view of the arts of painting, sculpture, and engraving, with an account of the different schools of painting, and of their most distinguished masters; to which is subjoined, 'an explanation of the technical terms, used either by artists or authors, on the subject of painting.' The body of the work is closely, but clearly, printed in double columns, the respective biographical sketches succeeding in alphabetical order, and to each sketch is annexed a reference to its authorities. The quantity of information thus displayed is truly surprising. Nor is the quality inferior to the quantity. We have carefully examined many of the articles, and found them to be ably executed, distinguished by purity of taste, soundness and liberality of criticism. To every lover of the fine arts, Mr. Gould's volume is indispensable as a book of reference."—Court Journal.

"This work has long been a desideratum. The various galleries and auctions of paintings continually brought under the public eye, the increasing numbers of collectors of paintings, and the spread of a more pure taste in all that concerns the appreciation of the higher department of art, render the above arrangement of all the information necessary to collectors, in the form of a pocket volume, a very advantageous addition to our modern list of publications. Any person visiting galleries for the purpose of purchasing, or of criticism, will find, by taking this volume in his pocket, an easy means of reference to the distinctive merits of the various artists, as well as to the nicer shades of distinction which characterise the various schools, either in colouring, design, or execution; and consequently will be enabled to form a tolerably correct estimate of the pecuniary value of the subject which he is to decide upon. The biographies of the various artists appear to be very carefully and skilfully digested. Many of them are interesting, in point of mere amusement. They are preceded by a clever introductory treatise on the founders and characteristics of the various schools of painting, with a condensed disquisition on the progress of sculpture and architecture. With a view to the main object of this volume, as a guide to criticism or to purchase, the author has greatly contributed to its efficacy and utility, by adding an explanation of the technical terms used either by artists or authors, on the subject of painting; terms which, we fear, are too often used by cognoscenti as a means of mystifying the judgment of the uninitiated, and of monopolising the profitable secrets of virtuosity to their exclusive class."—Morning Advertiser.

This day is published, Part I., containing six numbers, price 1s., of

LE CAMELÉON;

A Magazine of French Literature, &c. Compiled in Paris by A. P. Barbicux, and Stereotyped at the Printing-Office of Monsieur Didot.

The object of Le Caméléon will be to initiate the inhabitant of England into the tone, the forms, and the language of the higher classes of society in France; to make him familiar with their purest idioms and modes of expression; to advance him towards a perfect knowledge of the French people by the variety with which it will be stored; in short, to forward his studies by the most pleasing and efficacious means, and to assist his progress by examples which will enable him to arrive in a comparatively short time at as perfect a knowledge of the French language as he has of his own, and to speak it with fluency and elegance.

Le Caméléon will consist of everything which can instruct, interest, or amuse. Scientific, literary, and entertaining publications will furnish us with subjects. We shall be careful to purify them; that the Journal may breathe the utmost purity of taste and morality. Nothing shall be wanting to render it worthy of the approbation of the public, and we trust that, in this respect, it will leave nothing to be desired; for it will be compiled with that zeal and care which can only be inspired by an ardent desire for the benefit of youth, and the hope of contributing to their instruction and amusement. We shall thus be enabled to obviate many difficulties; and not only to lessen the fatigue of both professors and pupils, but to diminish the expense (at all times considerable) to those parents who, either from inclination or necessity, undertake the education of their own children. Le Caméléon is therefore addressed to both sexes, to all ages, and to every class; its cheapness placing it within the reach of all.

"We are delighted to see any French periodical divested of politics. Our young friends will find Le Caméléon pleasant reading, and well adapted for cultivating their acquaintance with the language."—Lit. Gaz. June 28.

"Should it continue as it has commenced, it may safely be admitted into those families where the fear of the promiscuous literature of France has hitherto prevailed. The selections are judicious, and afford favourable specimens of the style of the best modern writers."—Spectator, July 5.

TO OUR READERS.

Since the publication of the first number of our Journal, we have had a succession of letters from different quarters, recommending us to give up our page of Advertisements, as tending to do it less good than harm, and defacing the future volume. The reasons which existed for declining this advice, exist no longer; and we are accordingly happy to gratify our friends by giving up the page, and chatting with them to the last drop of our ink.

ENGLISH WOMEN VINDICATED.

SLENDER, complaining of the masquerade trick that had been put on him at the close of the comedy, says that he had "married Anne Page" and "she was a great lubberly boy." Far better were a surprise of the reverse order, which should betray itself in some tone of voice, or sentiment, or other unlooked for emanation of womanhood, while we were thinking ourselves quietly receiving the visit of lubberly himself, or rather some ingenuous cousin of his; and of some such pleasure we have had a taste, if not in the shape of any Viola, or Julia, or other such flattering palpability, yet in that of a fair correspondent; for we recollect well our Indicator friend "Old Boy," who sends us the following letter; but what if we have discovered meanwhile that "Old Boy" is no boy at all, nor man neither, but a pretty woman, and one that we think this a pretty occasion for unmasking; since in the hearts of the male sex, English women will find defenders enough; but few of themselves have the courage to come forward. Even our would-be "Old Boy" cannot do it but in disguise; which though a thing very well for her to assume, it is no less becoming in us, we think, on such an occasion, to take off, seeing that it gives the right, touching effect to that pretty petulance in her letter, and that half-laughing tone of ill-treatment, which some how has such a feminine breath in it, and must double the wish to be on her side.

Wonderful is the effect produced in a letter by the tone in which we read it or suppose it written, and by the knowledge of its being male or female. The one before us would be a good "defiance" to Old Crony, were its signature true; but to know that it is written by a woman, gives it a new interest, and quite another sort of music. Cannot we see the face glow, and the dimples playing with a frown; and hear the light, breathing voice bespeaking the question in its favour? Does it not make "Old Crony" himself glad to be "defied to the uttermost?"

Dear old Friend with a new Face,

Your correspondent "Old Crony," seems as deficient in temper as in judgment, in his brusque remarks upon the dress and gait of our fair countrywomen; nor can it be allowed him that he has chosen the best place to study the finest specimens of English women, either as regards refinement in dress or bearing. The women who most frequent Bazaars and fashionable drapers, are generally the most vacant-minded and petty creatures in existence; who wander from one lounge to another, seeking to dispel the ennui which torments them, by any frivolous kill-time. I really loathe the sight of such places, and think they have done much mischief among the idle and ignorant part of my countrywomen. But to return to the subject, I maintain, in opposition to "Old Crony," that in no other country, can we see assembled together so much beauty and grace, good dressing, and elegance of carriage, as in our fashionable promenades, our brilliant assemblies, and still more in those delightful home parties, where sprightliness and intelligence combine, to give grace and fascination:—nothing parallel, I am sure, is to be found, in the celebrated Longchamps, or the gardens of the Tuilleries at Paris, or in the Graben at Vienna, or "under the Lindens" of Berlin, or in any of the numerous public gardens on the continent, wherever I have been; and I call upon all my brother and sister tourists to bear testimony with me on this mighty question; and furthermore, like a good and faithful champion in the cause of the fair dames and damsels of old England, I do defy "Old Crony" to the uttermost, more especially for his inhuman wish of screwing English faces on to French figures, which would be a fearful "dovetailing" of lovely faces, upon parchment skeletons; seeing, that the generality of French females are terribly deficient in that plumpness and roundness, which are usually considered desirable in womanhood.

I agree with you, dear Ci-devant Indicator, that French women are generally more respected, and are on more equal terms with the male sex than our countrywomen; but I must differ as to their reading more, or being better informed. It is true that in society they will bear their part well in general or political conversation; but when alone with a French woman, she would be grievously offended, if you chose any other subject than her own personal attractions, and did not conclude by making a tender "declaration." These are the eternal themes by which alone you can please the young and the old, the ugly and the pretty; and of this truth, many will assure you, besides your old friend, admirer, and correspondent,

July the 23d.

OLD BOY.

P. S.—In defending the dress of my countrywomen, I except the poorer and working orders. Every other nation has a peculiar and picturesque costume for theirs; ours is remarkable only for its sluttish, draggie-tailed appearance, at least in London: in country-places the peasant's dress is comfortable, if not very piquant.

We suspect that in this as in most controversies, there is less real difference of opinion between the fair and unfair parties, than might be thought. Our fair correspondent gives up the bazaar and shop-hunting people, and those too, whose dresses are of the "poorer sort; and betwixt these classes, or rather including them, are to be found, we conceive, all the dresses and the walks, to which Old Crony would find himself objecting. The residue might prove its claims to a participation in the general refinement of Europe, without giving up a certain colouring of manners, as natural to it as the colour to its sky. And as to what is "delightful" and "fascinating," do not all people make that for themselves, more or less, out of the amount of their own sympathy and imagination? and does not each nation, as we said before, think the élite of its own charmers the most charming? No parties are so delightful to our fair correspondent, as those in her own country. Is not this precisely what would be said by a cordial Frenchwoman, of French parties; by an Italian, of Italian; and so on? Custom itself is a good thing, if it is an innocent one. We feel easy in it, as in a form and mould to which we have grown; but when in addition to this easiness, we think of all the feelings with which we have coloured it, all the pleasure we have given and received, all our joys, sorrows, friendships, loves, and religions, we may conceive how difficult it is to give up the smallest and most superficial forms in which they appear, or to learn how to admit the superiority of any thing which is foreign to them.

Brusque attacks—sharp and loud outcries—may sometimes be desirable in order to beget notice to a question; but undoubtedly, the way to persuade is to approve as much as one can; to maintain, by loving means, a loving attention. If we do not, we run a chance, instead of mending the mistakes of other people, of having our own cast in our teeth. See for instance what Old Crony has done for himself and his fair Frenchwomen with our correspondent, who does not deny perhaps that the French "middle classes" walk better "generally" speaking, than the English—at least we find this no where surely stated or implied—but she avails herself of his error in using the word "figures" instead of "carriage," to taunt him with the want of plumpness and womanhood in the composition of his favourites, and accuse the universal French femininity of being "parchment skeletons!" Here is the comparative French thinness, and want of red and white, made the very worst of, because its panegyrist made the worst of the appearance of the other parties. For as to his compliment to their handsome faces, this, it seems, is not enough in these intellectual days.

"Mind, mind alone, (bear witness, earth and heaven!)
The living fountain in itself contains
Of beauteous and sublime!"

There must be soul from head to foot—evidence of thorough gracefulness and understanding; otherwise the ladies will have none of his good word. Well: here is the principle admitted on both sides. Let those who wish to see it thoroughly in action, set lovingly about the task. The loving will soonest persuade, and soonest become perfect. Had Crony, instead of exposing his "inhuman wish of screwing English faces on to French figures," observed, that the latter are better in spirit than in substance, and shown his anxiety to consult the feelings and enumerate the merits of his countrywomen, we suspect that no body would have been readier than his fair antagonist to do justice to what is attractive in her French sisterhood.

That there are, and have always been, numbers of beautiful women in France as well as in England, and beautiful in figure too, and plump withal, no Antipathetic, the most pious that ever existed, could take upon him to deny; though the praise conveyed by their word embonpoint (in good case,) which means "fleshy and fattish," (as the poet has it,) would imply, that the beauty is not apt to be of that order. The country of Diana de Poitiers, of Agnes Sorel, and of all the charmers of the reigns of Valois and the Bourbons, is not likely to lose its reputation in a hurry for "beves of bright dames." Charming they were, that is certain, whether plump or not; at least in the eyes of the princes and wits that admired them; and French admiration must go for something, and have at least a geographical voice in the world, whatever Germany or Goethe himself may think of the matter. On the other hand, far are we from abusing all or any of the dear plump Germans, who have had graceful and loving souls, whether fifteen, like poor Margaret, or "fat, fair, and forty," like Madame Schroeder Devrient. We have been in love with them, time out of mind, in the novels of the good village pastor, the reverend and most amatory Augustus La Fontaine. The Peninsular and South American ladies, albeit beautiful walkers, and well-grounded in shape, are understood not to abound in plump figures; yet who shall doubt the abundance of their fascinations, that has read what Cervantes and Camoens have said of them, and what is said of their eyes and gait by all enamoured travellers? Is not Dorothea for ever sitting by the brook-side, beautiful, and bathing her feet, in the pages of the immortal Spaniard? And was not Inez de Castro taken out of the tomb, in order to have her very coffin crowned with a diadem; so triumphant was the memory of her love and beauty over death itself? Italian beauties are almost another word for Italian paintings, and for the muses of Ariosto and of song. And yet, admiring all these as we do, are we for that reason traitors to the beauties of our own country, or do we not rather the more admire the charmers that are nearest to us, and that perpetuate the train of living images of grace and affection, which runs through the whole existence of any loving observer, like a frieze across the temple of a cheerful religion.

And yet all this does not hinder us from wishing, that the generality of our countrywomen walked better and dressed better, and even looked a little less reserved and misgiving. A Frenchman is not bound to wish the generality of his countrywomen plumper, because he admires them for other beauties, or sees plumpness enough in his friends. A Spaniard may reasonably wish his a little more red and white, if it be only for the sake of their health; and if a jovial table-loving Viennese desired, after all, a little less plumpness in his adorable for the same reason (and in himself too), we should not quarrel with his theory, however it might object to his practice.

The handsomest female we ever beheld was at Turin; she was a maid-servant crossing a square. The most lady-like looking female in humble life was a French girl, the daughter of a small innkeeper. We heard one of her humble admirers speak of her as having the air d'une petite duchesse (of a little duchess). But the most charming face that ever furnished us with a vision for life, (and we have seen many) was one that suddenly turned round in a concert-room in England,—an English girl's, radiant with truth and goodness. All expressions of that kind make us love them, and here was the height of material charmingness added. And we thought the figure equal to the face. We know not whether we could have loved it for ever, as some faces can be loved without being so perfect. Habit, and loving-kindness, and the knowledge of the heart and soul, could alone determine that. But if not, it was the divinest imposition we ever met with.

THE WEEK

From Wednesday the 13th to Tuesday the 19th of August.

THE word August deserves to have the accent taken off the first syllable, and thrown upon the second (August), not because the month was named after Augustus, (and yet he had a good deal of poetry in him too, considering he was a man of the world; his friend Virgil gives him even a redeeming link with the seasons) but because the month is truly an august month, increasing in splendour till it fills its orb,—majestic, ample, of princely beneficence,—clothed with harvest as with a garment, full-faced in heaven with its moon.

Spenser in his procession of the months, has painted him from a thick and lustrous palette:—

The sixth was August, being rich arrayed
In garment all of gold, downe to the ground.

(How true the garment is made by the familiar words "all of gold," and with what a masterly feeling of power, luxuriance, and music, the accent is thrown on the word "down!" Let nobody read a great poet's verses either in a trivial or affected manner, but with earnest yet deliberate love, dwelling on every beauty as he goes—and pray let him very much respect his stops—

In garment all of gold,—downe to the ground).

Yet rode he not, but led a lovely maid
Forth by the lily hand, the which was crowned
With ears of corn,—and full her hand was found.

Here is a presentation for you, beyond all the presentations at court, August, in his magnificent drapery of cloth of gold, issuing forth, and presenting to earth and skies his Maiden with the lily hand, the highest bred of all the daughters of Heaven,—Justice. For so the poet continues:—

That was the righteous Virgin, which of old
Liv'd here on earth, and plenty made abound;
But after Wrong was lov'd, and Justice sold,
She left th' unrighteous earth, and was to heav'n extoll'd.

Extolled; that is, in the learned literal sense, raised out of; taken away out of a sphere unworthy of her. (Ex, out of; and tollo, to lift. Readers of taste, to whom these etymologies are familiar as their alphabets, will know how to excuse them, for the sake of their less educated brethren). Many of Spenser's quaintest words are full of this learned beauty, triumphing over the difficulty of rhyme: nay, forcing the obstacle to yield it a double measure of significance, as we see in the instance before us; for the praise given to Justice is here implied, as well as the fact of her apotheosis (being placed among the gods). She is, by means of one word extolled in the literal sense, raised up; and she is extolled in the metaphorical, praised and hymned.

And this word praised, reminds us by the way of one of the manuscript notes with which another learned poet, whose acquaintance we had the honor of making at Florence, (Mr. Landor) was kind enough to enrich our volumes of Spenser (for we get our friends to do such things for us, that we may read our books for ever in their company). Speaking of a poem by Sir Phillip Sidney on a lady, whom he was writing upon himself, Spenser says—

No less praise-worthy Stella do I read (esteem)
Though nought my praises of her needed are,
Whom verse of noblest shepherd, lately dead,
Hath prais'd and rais'd above each other starre.

Upon which says Mr. Landor's note,—“Spenser seems not to have known, that praise and raise are the same—praise—upraise—extollere.”

One good thing reminds of another. In a little while, as our Journal proceeds, and we feel the first hurry and business part of it subside into a richer power of attending to it leisurely and luxuriously, we shall bring forth, to the reader's delight, stores of extracts from poems both of the living and the dead, which are too beautiful to have attained their full measure of popularity, it being necessary that readers themselves should increase both in number and knowledge, before the refinements intelligible to the few can be partaken by any thing like a multitude. But such a period is coming; and great names among us are kind enough to tell the London Journal that its pages are doing something towards hastening it. By and by, therefore, it will not be to a few scholars only that the charming Latin Idylls of Mr. Landor are known; for the English reader must be informed, that out of an early passion for the ancient languages and their poets, this gentleman has written much in Latin as well as English, having pitched himself both into the vales of Ovid and Theocritus, and actually lived in past ages with a present feeling, or in present ages with a past,—just as the reader chooses to understand the word present. Pan and the Nymphs are palpable, in his hearty verses:—Cupid hovers and threatens around him, with arch eyes, and honey in his sting. Delightful would it be to us, if we could immediately bring the reader acquainted with one of these Idylls, a combat between Pan and Cupid, in which the bearded god gets terribly the worst of it, the little rogue mounting and laughing on his wings. We think we must try if we cannot give him some notion of it in a translation. But first we must get our copy of the volume back, and it is at a distance. Can any body lend us one? We will undertake to be as careful of it as if it were a Phidian Venus, and return it in a few days to the owner.

Fortunately, meanwhile, we have Mr. Landor's English volume of Poems, and among these is an Idyll of an exquisite kind, which as we have touched upon the subject, and the poem has a fullness of beauty in it, congenial with that of the month,—at least an English August is in some respects hardly riper than the beginning of a southern summer,—we will here extract, for the reader's enjoyment. Never more beautifully met together the most luxuriant, material sympathy and a delicacy the most thoughtful and loving. To ourselves the poem possesses the additional charm of relating to a spot we know well, our daily walk during many months, along paths and among sights consecrated by the loving memory of Boccaccio, his Valley of Ladies being beneath us, and Milton's "Top of Fiesole" over our heads. Mr. Landor himself has for some years resided at Fiesole, and the poem was doubtless written on an actual occasion,—one of the secrets of most true poems.

FIESOLAN IDYL.*

Here, where precipitate Spring, with one light bound,
Into hot Summer's lusty arms expires;
And where go forth at morn, at eve, at night,
Soft airs, that want the lute to play with them,
And softer sighs, that know not what they want;
Under a wall, beneath an orange tree
Whose tallest flowers could tell the lowlier ones
Of sights in Fiesole right up above,
While I was gazing a few paces off,
At what they seem'd to shew me with their nods,
Their frequent whispers and their pointing shoots,
A gentle maid came down the garden steps
And gather'd the pure treasure in her lap.
I heard the branches rustle, and stept forth
To drive the ox away, or mule, or goat,
(Such I believed it must be); for sweet accents
Are the swift vehicles of still sweeter thoughts,
And nurse and pillow the dull memory,
That would let drop without them her best stores.
They bring me tales of youth and tones of love,
And 'tis and ever was my wish and way
To let all flowers live freely, and all die,
Whene'er their genius bids their souls depart,
Among their kindred in their native place.
I never plucked the rose; the violet's head
Hath shaken with my breath upon its bank
And not reproached me; the ever-sacred cup
Of the pure lily hath between my hands
Felt safe, unsoil'd, nor lost one grain of gold.
I saw the light that made the glossy leaves
Most glossy; the fair arm, the fairer cheek
Warm'd by the eye intent on its pursuit;
I saw the foot, that, altho' half-erect
From its grey slipper, could not lift her up
To what she wanted: I held down a branch
And gathered her some blossoms, since their hour
Was come, and bees had wounded them, and flies
Of harder wing were working their way thro',
And scattering them in fragments under foot.
So crisp were some, they rattled unrevolved:
Others, ere broken off, fell into shells,
For such appear the petals when detached,
Unbending, brittle, lucid, white like snow,
And like snow not seen-thro', by eye or sun:
Yet every one her gown received from me
Was fairer than the first—I thought not so,
But so she praised them to reward my care.
I said: you find the largest.

This indeed,
Cried she, is large and sweet.

She held one forth,
Whether for me to look at or to take
She knew not, nor did I; but taking it
Would best have solved (and this she felt) her doubts.
I dared not touch it, for it seem'd a part
Of her own self; fresh, full, the most mature
Of blossoms, yet a blossom; with a touch
To fall, and yet-unfallen.

She drew back
The boon she tendered, and then, finding not
The ribbon at her waist to fix it in,
Dropt it, as loth to drop it, on the rest.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

THREE STORIES OF HUMAN VIRTUE.

WE have put these interesting narratives together, because they are short, and because they strike the same harmonious note,—consideration for others. The second and third in particular (and we have attended to the rights of climax, and put the noblest last) are among the best instances of virtue, properly so called; that is to say, of moral force,—strength of purpose beneficently exercised. We make no apology for the homeliness of the scene in which the heroine makes her appearance. Rather ought we to apologise to her memory for thinking of apology; but sophistications are sometimes forced upon the mind of a journalist. Virtue can no more be sullied than the sunbeams, let her descend where she may. And as the divine poet says, in one of his variations upon a favourite sentiment,

"Entire affection scorneth nicer hands."

The stories are taken from the work to which we have been so often indebted, and which has long been out of print,—the Lowenger's Common Place Book.

XXVII.—SCHOOL-FRIENDSHIP REMEMBERED.

Sir Austin Nicholas, was a judge under the protectorate of Cromwell, concerning whom the following circumstances are related. Having, while a boy at school, committed an offence, for which, as soon as it was known, flogging would be the inevitable punishment, his agitation, from a strong sense of shame or a peculiar delicacy of constitution, was so violent, that his schoolfellow, Wake, an intimate associate, and father of the Archbishop, remarked it with concern. Possessing stronger nerves and sensibility less exquisite, he told him that the discipline of the rod was a mere trifle, and insisted on taking on himself the fault, for which after a mutual struggle of friendship and generosity, he suffered a severe whipping.

A fortuitous chain of events which often disperses school intimates and college chums into opposite quarters of the globe, guided Nicholas through politics and law, to a seat in the Court of Common Pleas, and confirmed him a friend to the powers that are. Wake, on the contrary, was a firm royalist and cavalier, whose zeal and activity rendering him highly obnoxious to his opponents, he was seized, tried for his life, and condemned at Salisbury, by his old acquaintance, Nicholas, who after a separation of six-and-twenty years, did not recollect Mr. Wake till he came to pass the fatal sentence; when the name catching his eye, a sudden conviction strengthened by a few leading questions, flashed on his mind, that the prisoner at the bar, whom he had just sentenced to an ignominious death, was no other than the fond friend of his juvenile hours, those hours which, whatever be the colours of our fate, we always contemplate with a sacred, a serious, and interesting pleasure. I need not describe the state of mind in which civil discord had not wholly obliterated gratitude and sympathy: he beheld with the most poignant emotion the forlorn situation of that faithful firm associate of his youth, who had undergone for him disgrace and stripes; he saw, on every side, the hell bounds of war, and the mastiffs of the law, waiting, with eager impatience, to drag the man he once loved to untimely death; he hurried from the bench precipitately, to conceal his feelings, and burst into tears.

But friendship, like other virtues, required the speedy and effectual proof of exertion, or it would have been counteracted by the din of arms or the malevolence of party fury. After much opposition from the round-heads, whom Mr. Wake's behaviour had exasperated, a respite was granted, and Nicholas unwilling to risk a life he highly valued to the uncertainty of letters, and the dilatory tardiness of messengers, hurried immediately to London. He rushed to the Protector, and would not quit him, till sorely against Oliver's will, he had obtained a pardon for his friend, against whom, from personal enmity or misrepresentation, Cromwell was peculiarly inveterate.

The fortunate Royalist, from inattention, a magnanimous or an affected contempt of death, was a stranger to the name and person of his judge, and knew not the powerful interposition in his favour. Nicholas, also, had reserved the precious, the important secret, in his own breast, till certain of success; least, by vainly exciting hope, he should only add new pains to misfortune. Returning without delay to Salisbury, he flew to the prison, gradually disclosed his name and office to Wake, and producing a pardon, the friends sunk into each other's arms.—Nicholas overpowered by the bias of conferring life and comfort on one, for whom he had early experienced the most disinteresting friendship,—Wake unexpectedly snatched from death by discovering, perhaps, the first friend he ever loved, in a party whom he had always considered as usurpers of lawful authority, as the wolves and tigers of his country.

XXVIII.—THE DUTCHMAN AND HIS HORSE.

Cornelius Voltemad, a Dutchman, and an inhabitant of the Cape of Good Hope, had an intrepid philanthropy which impelled him to risk, and (as it unfortunately proved) to lose his own life in consequence of heroic efforts to save the lives of others. This generous purpose in a great degree he effected in the year 1773, when a Dutch ship was driven on shore in a storm near Table Bay, not far from the South River fort. Returning from a ride, the state of the vessel, and the cries of the crew, strongly interested him in their behalf. Though unable to swim, he provided himself with a rope, and being mounted on a powerful horse remarkably muscular in its form, plunged with the noble animal into the sea, which rolled in waves sufficiently tremendous to daunt a man of common fortitude. This worthy man, with his spirited horse, approached the ship's side, near enough to enable the sailors to lay hold of the end of a cord, which he threw out to them; by this method, and their grasping the horse's tail, he was happy enough, after returning several times, to convey fourteen persons on shore.

But in the warmth of his benevolence, he appears not to have sufficiently attended to the prodigious and exhausting efforts of his horse, who in combating with the boisterous billows, and his accumulated burthens, was almost spent with fatigue, and debilitated by the quantity of sea-water, which in its present agitated state, could not be prevented from rushing in great quantities down his throat. In swimming with a heavy load, the appearance of a horse is singular; his forehead and nostrils are the only parts to be seen; in this perilous state the least check in his mouth is generally considered as fatal; and it was supposed that some of the half-drowned sailors, in the ardour of self-preservation, pulled the bridle inadvertently, for the noble creature, far superior to the majority of bipeds who harass and torment his species, suddenly disappeared with his master, sunk, and rose no more.

This affecting circumstance induced the Dutch East India Company to erect a monument to Voltemad's memory. They likewise ordered that such descendants or relations as he left, should be speedily provided for. Before this intelligence reached the Cape, his nephew, a corporal in the service, had solicited to succeed him in a little employment he held in the menagerie, but being refused, retired in chagrin to a distant settlement, where he died, before news of the Directors' recommendations could reach him. While we lament Voltemad's fate, and the ungrateful treatment his relation experienced from the people at the Cape, a circumstance arises in our minds, which tends to render this misfortune still more aggravating. In his bold and successful attempt to reach the ship, if this benevolent man, instead of embarrassing himself with a hazardous burthen fatal to them all, had only brought the end of a long rope with him on shore, it might have been fixed to a cable, which with proper help might have been dragged on shore, and the whole ship's company saved without involving their benefactor and a noble animal in destruction.

XXIX.—HEROISM OF A MAID-SERVANT.

Catherine Vassent, the daughter of a French peasant, exhibited at the age of seventeen, and in the humble capacity of a menial, a proof of intrepid, persevering sympathy, which ranks her with the noblest of her sex.

A common sewer of considerable depth having been opened at Noyon for the purpose of repair, four men passing by, late in the evening, unfortunately fell in, no precautions having been taken to prevent so probable an accident. It was almost midnight before their situation was known, and besides the difficulty of procuring assistance at that unseasonable hour, every one present was intimidated from exposing himself to similar danger, by attempting to rescue these unfortunate wretches, who appeared already in a state of suffocation from the mephitic vapour.

Fearless or ignorant of danger, and irresistibly impelled by the cries of their wives and children who surrounded the spot, Catherine Vassent, a servant of the town, insisted on being lowered without delay into the noxious opening, and fastening a chord with which she had furnished herself previous to her descent, round two of their bodies assisted by those above, she restored them to life and their families; but, in descending a second time, her breath began to fail, and after effectually securing a chord to the body of a third man, she had sufficient presence of mind enough, in a fainting condition, to fix the rope firmly to her own hair, which hung in long and luxuriant curls round a full but well formed neck. Her neighbours, who felt no inclination to imitate her heroism, had willingly contributed such assistance as they could afford compatible with safety, and in pulling up as they thought the third man's body, were equally concerned and surprised to see the almost lifeless body of Catherine suspended by her hair, and swinging on the same cord. Fresh air with eau-de-vie soon restored this excellent girl; and I know not whether most to admire her generous fortitude in a third time exploring the pestilential cavern, which had almost proved fatal to her, or to execrate the dastardly meanness and selfish cowardice of the bystanders, for not sharing the glorious danger. In consequence of the delay produced by her indisposition, the fourth man was drawn up a lifeless and irrecoverable corpse.

Such conduct did not pass unnoticed; a procession of the corporation, and a solemn Te Deum were celebrated on the occasion; Catherine received the public thanks of the Duke of Orleans, the Bishop of Noyon, the town magistrates, and an emblematic medal, with considerable pecuniary contributions, and a civic crown: to these were added the congratulations of her own heart, that inestimable reward of a benevolent mind.

SPECIMENS OF CELEBRATED AUTHORS.

ST. EVREMOND.

'His Portrait of the Duchess of Mazarin.'

MADAME DE MAZARIN was a niece of the Cardinal of that name, was separated from her husband, came over to England, and had a pension from Charles the Second, whom she had once hoped to marry. Most people have described her, as the reader might naturally suppose she would be described under these circumstances. The Marquis de St. Evremond, on the other hand, a brother refugee and pensioner, who "fell in love" with her in his old age, gives the following portrait of her perfections. Which side is to be believed? Both, we suspect; that is to say, the lady was not without qualities, either natural or acquired, which in a better state of society would have done her honour, but which would have little satisfied, at that or any other time, the enquiries of patriots into pension-lists. Her perfections were most likely the product of St. Evremond's lively fancy.

He was a Frenchman, exiled for speaking too freely of the court of Louis the Fourteenth, and was what was understood in those days by the term philosophical epicurean.

The passage is taken from the translation of his works published by Des Maizeaux.

"I return you again by a messenger the memoirs you were pleased to send me, fearing, lest if I should send them by the post, they might run the same hazard, and fall into the like inconveniences, which at first brought them to your hands. If things so curious and well worth the intercepting, were to be found every time the ministers of state think fit to open the paquets, I should not much pity the clerks' trouble in executing their orders. You had reason to believe that after the manner I had spoken to you of Mad. Mazarin, I should be extremely glad to see her history. It speaks of her own genius, and is like herself all over. I have particularly observed twenty things in this relation, that none but herself could think, or express in the manner they are penned.

"Since you say you never saw her, I will satisfy your curiosity by endeavouring to give you a rough draught of her face, and shape of body.

"She is one of those lofty Roman beauties, no way like our baby-visaged and puppet-like faces of France; in whose composition nature alone triumphs over all the artificers of the coquets.

"The colour of her eyes has no name: it is neither blue nor grey, nor altogether black; but a mixture of all three, which participates of all the excellence which is found in them. They have the sweetness of the blue, the briskness of the grey, and, above all, the fire of the black. But what is more wonderful, you never saw any one more lovely, and generally more pleasant, and more apt to inflame, and yet more serious, more severe and steady, when her thoughts are taken up with any grave subject. They are so lively and so quick, that when she looks steadfastly upon any one, which she seldom does, they think she pierces their very souls, and sees into the very bottom of their hearts. They are large, and well slit, and even with the face; full of sprightly life and fire; and yet, with all these beauties, they have nothing of languishing or passionate; as if nature had maliciously contrived them only to give love and veneration, and be susceptible of none.

"Her mouth is neither wide nor very little; but the motion of her lips is very graceful and charming; and the strangest mouths and grimaces wonderfully become her, when she imitates those that make them. Her smiles would soften the hardest of hearts, and ease the heaviest sadness of mind. They do almost change the air of her face, which naturally is sublime and grave; and spreads over it a certain tincture of mildness and sweetness that cheers up those hearts which her charms had alarmed, and inspires them with that kind of unquiet gladness, which is next of kin to a tender inclination.

"So much for her mouth and eyes, which are the two chief parts of her face most expressive, and principally important to kindle a flame and create love. But the rest are nothing less to be admired and adored.

"Her nose, which, without doubt, is incomparably well turned, and of a just bigness, gives the rest of her countenance a curious, noble, and lofty air, which is infinitely taking. The tone of her voice is so harmonious and agreeable, that none can hear her speak without being insensibly moved. Her complexion is naturally most lively, and so delicately clear, that I cannot believe that any man who views it, can find fault with its not being somewhat whiter.

"The colour of her hair is shining black, but has nothing of harsh. To see how naturally the locks curl and into what fine buckles they twist themselves, as soon as they are let loose, would make us think, without much help of poetry, that they swell with pride, and, as it were, take a glory in the honour they have to shade so lovely a head. She has the finest turned face that ever limner fancied, or drew with pencil.

"Her careless carriage is the cause that the proportion of her body, though straight and well framed, is nothing in comparison to what it has been in delicacy of shape. I say in comparison, for many would fancy themselves slender enough that were no bigger than she is. This makes her appear lower than she is, though, in truth, she is of as becoming a height as any woman can well be without being ridiculous.

"You shall see her for fifteen days together, in as many several head-dresses, without being able to distinguish which of them suits her face the best; and those dresses which would make other women look like witches, wonderfully become her; so that no kind of head-gear is unbecoming when she wears it. The same thing is remarkable in her clothes and attire. You must see her lapped in a night-gown to judge with more exactness of it. And it is in this person alone that one truly may say, that Art, though never so cunningly used, can never equal Nature.

"I had almost forgot to speak of her neck, her arms, and hands; but, let it suffice, that they appear to have been made and fitted for the face. And, if we may judge by what we see of what we do not see, we may certainly conclude that her husband, after having been the happiest man, is now the unhappiest in the world. Thus she is made as to her body; and of her mind you may judge by what I am going to say.

"Being some time since at Rome, it was my chance to be speaking of her after the manner I heard her talked of at Paris, that she was a fine young lady, extremely handsome, but extravagantly giddy and inconsiderate, and goodnatured even to folly. An Italian that knew her, hearing me give her such a character, laughed at me after such a manner that I was much surprised at it, but would never let me know why, though I had very earnestly urged him to tell me his reason. As these people dive further into men's natures to learn their true and proper character than we do in France, so this adventure gave me a great curiosity to see her as I passed in my return from Rome to Chambery; though I had never much spoken to her in Paris, but by accident, yet she knew me by sight and by name.

"I was at first surprised not to perceive in her at my coming that eagerness and excessive desire to hear news, which is ordinary to those that live at a distance from court, when they see any that comes from thence. She received me as unconcerned as the most indifferent woman of the country could do; and instead of breaking my head with questions about the people and affairs, which concerned herself, she entertained me only upon the account of my journey, and other like things, wherein none but myself was concerned. I thought myself bound in civility, to put her upon the discourse of her friends and relations in Rome and Paris, since she herself would not start the question. I found that subject was not displeasing, by the attention she gave to what I said upon it. She spoke civilly of all people, and with a great deal of respect of her husband; but this discourse held no longer than I continued it. She rarely asked any questions, and those only which civility seemed to oblige her to.

"Neither could I mark in her either curiosity or inquisitiveness. Wondering at her cold indifference, I had the mind to put her upon the discourse of things I thought most sensible to her, but with the respect that was convenient, touching her fame and her fortune. But I could never hear from her the least complaint. Methought I read something of sadness in her countenance when her reputation was in debate; but of all other matters she seemed to think that blind goddess Fortune a fitter object of her contempt than of her anger. Several persons of quality, of both sexes, came in while I was there; and others, two or three gentlemen, who showed a great deal of wit.

"The ladies began to talk of the news of the town; though the Duchess took neither side's part, she discoursed with the same heat as others did. The subject of their conversation was a dispute that was betwixt two eminent men, which had divided the country in two parties. She entered upon all the particularities which were told of the causes of their division, and weighed every little circumstance with such nicety and insight, as if she had not had twenty millions for her portion. The gentlemen whom I before mentioned, turned the discourse upon another subject, whether she would or not, and talked of state affairs, as most worthy of her attention and contemplation. After every body had passed their verdict, she was obliged in complaisance to speak her's. Those that differed in opinion from her, vigorously urged their reasons: the dispute grew hot. She never defended her opinion but with reasons of which she made those that had not declared themselves against her, her judges. And I assure you, I never heard any speak so well and with so much submission. This is what I remarked in this my first visit; and what I have observed since is as followeth.

"It is not to be discerned of what humour she is; and to speak properly, she has none at all: for every individual person that converses with her has cause to believe she is of his. She is not obstinately bent upon any thing, and it is astonishing to see her quit even those diversions she seems the most pleased with, as freely as if she were weary of them; whence it clearly appears that she is eagerly carried to no one thing, and shews, that this easiness of her temper and manners, does not proceed from levity or fickleness, but rather from a profound indifference for all those various fancies which trouble and disquiet the minds of most people.

"That sweetness and humanity, which, above all, adorn and grace her sex, appear even in her tumultuous pastimes. She is as much mistress of her temper upon the road, or a hunting, as in her closet.

The calmness and equality of her soul is proof against all those occasions which do unsettle and transport all others. She laughs at all those foolery amusements to which others abandon themselves. Some other women have done the same things that she does: but she does them another way.

"All people converse in her house with a familiarity full of ease and respect, the which nevertheless would be to her very incommode and troublesome, if she were less good or less obliging. Though she be naturally very reserved and loves to be retired, yet most of all hours of the day are public hours with her. The most private recesses of her house are as open to those who frequent it, as the most common; and therefore it often happens, that people come even to her very closet-door, when she least expects any. Her domestics, who see none come that are not as much devoted to her as themselves, have insensibly used themselves to let all come in and go out with this kind of frankness and liberty.

"It is to be supposed she would have it so since they permit it, for she is the life and soul of her family; and her understanding, her civility, and her obliging ways are infused into those that compose it, proportionably as each one's capacity is fitted to imitate them. There is no convent where they lead a more regular life than in her women's apartments, whither a page dare not approach upon pain of my lady's displeasure, which is something more terrible than the rod. And for the men, they live together with that peace and union, so much the more commendable, as it is the most rare, and seldom to be found in great men's houses.

"She alone, of all women, can play with her servants without lessening herself. Her presence doth banish their presumption without taking away their freedom; and it is not to be comprehended how she can give them so much awe, using them with so much familiarity, unless it be because she has so much grandeur in her carriage and all her ways. Some wonder she should delight in such sort of pastimes; but whoever will take the pains to look a little nearer will find, that they are not the delight of her heart, and that those she uses, are but so many several ways of dispelling those afflicting thoughts, which the present state of her fortune crowds upon her.

"There is no private gentleman's house more orderly and regular than her's; and as her pension is very inconsiderable to make her subsist, with that honour she does, she must needs be admirably skilled in economy; and her acts of liberality and magnificence shew that her good management proceeds from extraordinary strength of reason. She neither much admires nor despises anything. She never shewed the least disgust against the country nor anything that is in it. She loves the recreations and ceremonies that are in use, as much as if she had been born and bred there. Others would assist at them with marks of complaisance, constraint, and distraction, which would easily distinguish them from the rest of the company; but she comes to them with that familiarity, with that presence and freedom of mind, so unconstrained, so constant, and so agreeable, that a stranger who should chance to see her there, without knowing who she was, would esteem Savoy most happy in the product of so charming a person.

"She avoids speaking of her own greatness and riches with the same care and industry as others seek out occasions to make people sensible of theirs. It depends not on her way of living amongst them, but that the people of that country that see her, may think themselves as great as she; and may think Chambery as noble and as pleasant to live in as Rome or Paris; and her conversation there as agreeable as ever she enjoyed elsewhere. Never did great lady take less care to make her inferiors see the difference that is betwixt her and them; and if they do not forget it, she is the more beholding to their discretion and respect; for she takes little pains to put them in mind of it. One goeth always beyond the idea or opinion she has of herself, even in the most serious applications that are made to her, and she as often takes just and due commendations for gross flattery, as other women take apparent and hypocritical adulations for true and deserved praises.

"It is a great sign that her moderation is sincere, because it is never overstrained, and being urged, will acknowledge truly whatsoever is good or fair in her. She is nothing more unjust than in not allowing what she has of admirable and excellent to be more than passable and ordinary. Though by sad experience she found that there is but very little truth or honesty in the world, and that she has just cause to think ill of all mankind; yet such is her natural goodness that she never applies this her bad opinion to any one in particular; she first excepts from the general rule all those in whom she perceives any appearance of virtue; and is still much surprised when she has reason to believe that they did not deserve that exception.

"When she is obliged to say something she thinks may displease, in order to sweeten and take away the sharpness of the sense, she speaks it so as if she had let it fall by chance; but no one will think he wrongs her, to believe that she says nothing but what she would say. It is more natural to her to be secret, than to other women not to be so; she is equally skilled both in well speaking and in holding her tongue; though it be a great truth that those who know how to speak well, know not how to hold their tongues; and those that can be silent, can seldom speak very well.

"A gentleman of very good parts and understanding that hath seen her and known her a great while, assured me that she is very much altered from what she has been formerly, inasmuch that you would hardly know her again; but it is very hard to conceive that she should be so changed, without allowing that she must always have had a prodigious stock of the choicest, the rarest, and most lasting natural beauty that ever woman had; and if her misfortunes have contributed anything to her merit, never bad cause produced so good an effect.

A GOOD PRINCE.

LORD Bacon, in the exordium of his Advancement of Learning, has expressed so much astonishment at the talents of King James the First, considering that he was "not only a king, but a king born," that the panegyric has been suspected to be a "bold irony." We are inclined to think otherwise, when we reflect that Bacon was a born courtier, as well as a philosopher, and that even his philosophy, especially in a man of his turn of mind, might have found subtle reasons for venerating a being who was in possession of a good portion of the power of this earth. Be this as it may, it is pretty generally felt on all hands, without being a party matter, that, considering the flatteries and other perils that beset a royal education, it is very fortunate for the world when sovereigns turn out well; and therefore, as we profess ourselves, in this Journal, and indeed everywhere else, to be of no party but that of mankind, especially of those who mean well, and shew that they mean it, in whatever ranks of life they are to be found, we shall make no apology to any well-meaners for introducing the following account of a prince who has made himself immortal by his treatment of great poets, and who really appears to have no less deserved his immortality by his treatment of all his fellow-creatures. The account is an avowed panegyric; but from all we have read of the Duke of Weimar, it is really a panegyric from the heart, and such as was echoed by all his countrymen.

To the Illustrious Memory of his Royal Highness the Most Noble Prince and Lord, Karl August, Grand Duke of Sachsen-Weimar Eisenach.

When a great and glorious life is closed, it becomes at once our sacred duty and consolation to make its high significancy and its beneficent effects distinctly present to our minds. Thankfully to mark how God's grace bestowed them, and with pious care to engrave such a picture of the departed on our souls as may abide there for ever.

How much more when it was the life of our prince; the father of his land and ours; a life that, from its earliest dawn, lightened upon us like a genial sun, sending forth light and warmth in all directions through long years of activity, diffusing blessings, far beyond the boundaries of his own country;—when it was the life of a prince who conceived as justly as he conscientiously fulfilled the duties of his high calling;—at once intrepid and indefatigable, mild and wise;—who did good to countless multitudes;—of whom it is impossible to decide whether he was greater as a man or as a ruler.

A short and simple statement of his actions, will suffice to recal the career of one whose life was action, and whose fairest monument has long been raised in all hearts.

Sprung from illustrious ancestors, greeted with double joy as the hope of an almost extinct line, the infant ruler was left by the early death of his father, to the care of his incomparable mother. He was trained by the illustrious men she selected—Hermann, Wieland, and Count Görz, to personal sacrifice, to unprejudiced exertion of the judgment, and to love for art and science. Early formed to all the higher and fairer virtues of humanity, in his fourteenth year he won from the great Frederic the declaration, that 'he had never seen a young man of his age who inspired such hopes.' With the fullest confidence could the regent-mother, Amalie, deliver up to him the reins of government on the day on which he completed his eighteenth year.

A few weeks afterwards his union with Princess Luise of Hessen Darmstadt took place;—a union of truly equal souls, so rich in noble fruits, in thousand-fold blessings on the land; so ennobled by interchange thoughts, by devotion in times of need and of peril, by affectionate attachment and kindness, that none ever better deserved the rare privilege of remaining, at the end of fifty years, the greatest happiness of those it bound together. Under such favourable circumstances did the youthful prince enter upon the arduous duties of his office: but a more arduous task he imposed upon himself,—to strengthen and elevate his powers by liberal, all-sided culture, and to cause the prince to be forgotten in the man.

His heart, susceptible of friendship, had opened itself to a young man full of high aspiring, and profound feeling, whom he had met with at Frankfurt on his way to Paris, before he assumed the reins of government, and whose writings had filled him with lively admiration. He gave him a cordial invitation and soon won, for his whole life, the most faithful servant, and intimate friend—nay, such a crown and ornament to his reign as no other land can boast.

Pursuing his remarkable career of mental development, it appeared to him—whose great object was future self-dependence—that a free, natural mode of life was the highest good, and that hardness of body was a necessary condition of vigour and activity of mind.

At his court all cramping restraints were as much as possible removed; nothing was valued but what betokened freshness and vigour of mind; inquiry, experiment, investigation were set on foot in every direction; the physical sciences were zealously pursued; care was taken to open every possible path to industry and commerce; personal efforts were made to further every useful undertaking; facilities granted to every attempt at improvement, and a refined taste exercised and cultivated. And though many precipitate schemes failed, and even many well grounded expectations were disappointed, yet the active spirit was never discouraged, the clear glance was ever more strongly attracted by objects of zeal and universal utility.

Every fresh acquisition of knowledge or experience was therefore for the good of the whole; all were to participate in every advantage of their prince. He amended and simplified the administration of justice; took further precautions for the security of the poor and unprotected; abolished fines to the church; opened the gloomy walls of the orphan-house, and gave its inmates fresh life and energy in the bosom of domestic comfort. Herder's aid was obtained for the church and public education, and he was as soon as possible placed at their head; public instruction was elevated and extended; normal schools for the formation of a regular supply of country-school-masters were founded; a free-school of design was instituted; art and industry on all sides encouraged.

Similarity of character and pursuits united him closely with the excellent Margrave Karl-Friedrich of Baden, with the noble prince of Dessau, with the frank and upright Duke George of Meiningen. His near connection with the elector of Mainz had a considerable influence on the choice of Karl von Dalberg as coadjutor, with whom he kept up a most confidential and mutually delightful correspondence.

His frequent travels brought him acquainted with the most remarkable statesmen and learned men of foreign countries; he was eager to drink from every source; to profit by every opportunity.

At the breaking out of the disastrous war with France, he joined the Prussian army. As if he were only about to make some new and interesting experiment, his Goethe must be his associate and share his danger and glory. At the siege of Mainz, at the battle of Kaiserslautern, he gave proof of all the virtues of a soldier; every privation was borne with calmness, every opportunity of perilous distinction was eagerly seized.

In 1793 he had to endure the loss of his only and beloved brother, and the destruction of all his hopes of a favourable termination of the war. He returned to his country with dejected heart, but bore with him the unbroken, persevering activity which he now turned with double zeal to the service of his own subjects.

Nothing escaped his attention. He imported finer breeds of cattle and improved implements of all kinds; examined into the state of medical schools and hospitals, of charitable institutions, of means of preservation from fire and other calamities;—wherever human succour could prevail, there was the Duke to be found by day and by night.

The meanest had access to him and a hearing at all times. Intimately acquainted with the necessities of all classes, he excited in all confidence and love, he attracted all irresistibly to him, without restraint or command. An approving look from him was the highest reward, a benevolent wish more than law. Affection, and pleasure in serving him, often rose to passion, and they who had once attached themselves to him could never leave him; a word, a look from him, made them forget every toil. Thus did he reign securely and tranquilly by the simplest means. His power was doubled by the love his philanthropy inspired.

He continued his reforms of the administration of justice. His acute and vigilant eye detected in the circle of his faithful counsellors the modest, profound, and laborious man; fitted to be placed at the head of affairs, and worthy of his entire confidence. In the person of Voigt he found a compensation for the many aged excellent advisers of his earlier reign.

But the Beautiful went hand in hand with the Useful, and art and science flourished under the prince's liberal care. Under Goethe's immediate direction, the court theatre became the model-school of German dramatic art, and of easy natural acting. Foreigners resorted to Weimar and to Jena where youthful talents unfolded themselves in a secure and free asylum, and often attained to a maturity by which other countries were destined to benefit. This was the most flourishing period of the University of Jena. Its pre-eminence was not produced by wealth, nor by any artificial excitements; it was the observant encouraging eye of the prince which animated and enhanced those glorious efforts, which stimulated those noble aspirations. It was the mild and gentle atmosphere of mental freedom and tolerance of opinion, which made every one feel so perfectly at ease in this narrow space: and as in the great garden of nature, trees and flowers of the most differing kinds unfold in luxuriance side by side, so did we here see the most various nay repugnant spirits, distinguish themselves undisturbed, each in his own province, secure and free under the shield of their high-minded patron.

Under such auspices were fostered a Griesbach, Paulus, Reinhold, Fichte, Schelling,* a Loder, Fenerbach, Thebaut, Schutz, Tieck;†—the Humboldts, Hufeland, Schlegel. Here Schiller found a second home, and, in Karl-August's favour and warm sympathy, fresh stimulus and tranquil leisure for his immortal masterworks. The cosmopolitan Bode, the far-travelled Gore, chose Weimar as their place of rest, here did the noble refugees Montmorency, Mounier, Camille Jordan, and many others, find an asylum and respect amid the storms of the time; the most delightful and refined society surrounded the court, and Weimar, as well as the tranquil valley of Tiefurt (the summer residence of the Duchess-mother), was the hallowed resort of the most distinguished pilgrims from all countries.

In the midst of these peaceful happy times, the youthful hope of the country, the first-born son of the duke, had attained maturity, and had been united to the daughter of an imperial house. But this domestic felicity was soon interrupted by the most fearful calamity. Honour and duty summoned our prince to the unequal combat (1816) which Prussia waged against the overwhelming might of Napoleon; far from the land of his ancestors, at the head of the only yet unconquered corps d'armée, the duke had to learn the invasion and pillage of his states—the threatened annihilation of his existence as a sovereign.

But even this tempest of calamity could not shake his heroic firmness. He insisted on remaining at the side of the King of Prussia, and only that monarch's express command—a proof of magnanimity worthy of a king—could induce him to lay down his field-marshal's staff, and to think of returning home and making terms with the conqueror.

On the fearful day after the battle of Jena, his high-hearted wife, by her intrepid firmness and dignified serenity, had impressed the conqueror with a respect and admiration, which was the immediate cause of the salvation of the country, and of the ducal house. He received an envoy from Weimar in his headquarters, and before the end of the year peace was concluded at Posen. Soon after his return home, the duke had to lament the death of his beloved mother; the most afflicting consequence of the war which had disturbed and broken all the springs of that invaluable life.

The investment of his country, the frightful contributions that were levied upon it, lay heavy on his heart; the great military road crossed his dominions; every day demanded new efforts; all the ties of social enjoyment, of the delightful cultivation of art, seemed broken, but the magnitude of the calamity did but redouble his vigour and energy. In the midst of his anxious endeavours to distribute the burthens of war with the greatest equity, and of the caution required by his still very critical political position, the most provident thought for the benefit and education of his people was never for a moment laid aside; measures for the simplification and improvement of the institutions of the country were never for a moment suspended. The hitherto divided states of Weimar and Eisenach were united under more similar constitutional forms; the Land-rathe (councils of the country) were instituted with truly paternal views; new municipal systems, calculated to give energy and independence to the citizens, were introduced, and great ameliorations were made in the state of the law by the establishment of local criminal courts and of an improved penal system.

Amid the pressure of these lowering times the duke preserved his open clear glance and his tranquil temper, and constantly opposed a dignified demeanour to the often insolent demands of foreign domination. No feeling of personal alarm could restrain him from affording to his Prussian brothers-in-arms, a refuge and a home, and the expressed approbation and encouragement of a frank and noble heart. His situation with regard to Napoleon thus became more and more critical, especially when after his disastrous reverses in Russia, the emperor took the field for a fresh campaign (1813) in our valleys and on our frontiers, with mistrust and resentment against the most high-spirited of German princes in his heart, and with many a threat of violent measures on his tongue. But Providence preserved our sovereign to us. He escaped from the battle of Leipsig, as by a miracle. His heart beat high when he was greeted by the conquering monarchs on their visit to Weimar, as one of the saviours of Germany; he instantly joined the great confederation, and marched at the head of the third corps d'armée, to which his own brave subjects and all the Saxon troops were attached, into the Netherlands. Immediately after the conquest of Paris he hastened thither, and while he sedulously attended to the political interests of his country, devoted himself with his usual zeal to science and art. A visit to England afforded him the long desired opportunity of seeing industry and mechanical skill carried to their highest pitch. At his return (Sept. 1814) the triumph dearest to his heart awaited him,—the thousand voiced joyous acclamations of his people.

Returning home with a considerable accession of territory, he immediately resolved to place the faithful servants and assistants of his government in situations of more extended activity and higher dignity, and thus to render them sharers of his own prosperity. He made the wisest arrangement in his ministry; introduced various useful reforms, and on the birthday of his noble consort, his most valued servants of all classes and ranks received from his own hand the first honourable decorations as proof of his approbation. Having thus satisfied the desires of his generous heart, he turned his whole mind to the construction of a fundamental law on the constitution and rights of the states (Land stände), and thus secured to his people the most solid guarantee for good government and civil freedom.

Taxation was rendered more uniform and equal; public credit raised and established; the peasant delivered from the oppressive remains of feudalism; burthens on landed property lightened, and trade freed from many vexatious restraints.

His perseverance conquered every obstacle that was opposed to the establishment of a supreme court of appeal. (Ober-Appellations-Gericht) in Jena; common to the dominions of all the Saxon houses of the Ernestine line.*

In a critical period of political excitement and exaggerated demands, among the youth of the German universities his admirable sense led him to combine firmness with indulgence.†

He did not desist till he had improved the condition of every sort of establishment for education, from the university to the meanest village school, both as to the funds and the course of instruction. He was also assiduous in completing lines of roads, as means of promoting intercourse between all his subjects.

He was continually occupied with the consideration how the burthens caused by the war could be reduced to their minimum, and, after numerous experiments, he succeeded in leaving a most beneficent example how much may be accomplished with how little. By a judicious change of the portion of the population bearing arms, he made nine-tenths of the soldiery available for agriculture and mechanical employments.

His generous temper delighted in constant sympathy with the personal condition and fortunes of all who came in contact with him: after long years he retained a grateful recollection of every pleasant hour, of every little service; and testified this recollection to children and children's children.

Such a temper secured him respect and love wherever he went. Every foreign land was his home. His residence in Milan (1817) was commemorated by a medal. "Il principe uomo" was the simple and beautiful title which accompanied him in his travels.

The horizon of his life gradually became brighter and more cloudless; the tranquil enjoyment of the fruits of his progress in the arts and sciences, in all of which he took a lively interest, became more pure and deep-felt; gleams of the high intents and destinies of creation broke with increased brightness on his inquiring mind, from nature and from history; chemistry and botany peculiarly attracted him; his mild spirit felt itself at home amid the tranquil beauties and fresh bounties of the vegetable world. He collected around him the plants of every part of the world, watched the secrets of their growth with constant and tender ease, and returned refreshed to the cares of government.

Thus was that free, natural life, after which he had striven in his early years, at the expense of considerable sacrifices of care and comfort, now granted to him in a fairer and more spiritual sense. He often stayed at Wilhelmsthat in the beauty and serenity of summer, assembling around him tried friends and accomplished guests; but even from this retreat he conducted all the affairs of his government, and on hill and valley, in field and forest, there was not a spot to be found which did not share his affectionate cares.

Amidst this constant alternation of solicitude and of action, of exertion and dignified enjoyment, the day of the celebration of the fiftieth year of his reign approached. Averse from all ostentation, he wished to withdraw from it, but he was obliged to yield to the loud wishes of his people. What a festival of joyous gratitude of deep emotion did he then witness, heightened by the marked sympathies of other countries.

Inspired by his own spirit, towns, villages, and individuals, rivalled each other in their efforts to hallow this day by institutions which might render it blessed to contemporaries and posterity. A well-designed medal was presented to him by his most attached servants, and the establishment of the excellent burgher schools at Weimar and Eisenach, as well as of many other new beneficent institutions, confirmed that consciousness of having laboured for the civilization of the remotest generations, which was his ever present reward. And thus may it truly be said of him, that even while he tarried among us, he enjoyed the fairest and noblest immortality.

The oldest and most confidential of his servants stood in unchanged freshness by his side. He entered with ardour into all arrangements for consecrating a second festival to this honoured friend, (7th November, 1825.) Singular and rich as had been the blessedness of such a life, long union must be its reward. He caused a gold medal to be struck, on which his own likeness and that of his noble consort were united with that of Goethe, and as the three had blended their light through life in one constellation, one common jubilee embraced their golden day of honour.

His second son returned from America in health and safety, and enriched with knowledge and experience.* A triple band of grand-children bloomed around the beloved ruler; his eldest daughter was married to the son of the King of Prussia, and thus he saw the early ties of blood and of affection which had bound him through life to the destinies of the noble house of Hohenzollern, secured to his heart's content.

He was spared to bless even a great grandson, whose birth he looked upon as an additional reason for visiting Berlin. Anxieties, but too well justified by the doubtful state of his health, gave rise to the most pressing entreaties that he would not attempt the journey, and many a gloomy presentiment oppressed his people, but, unused to spare his valuable life, and to repress that activity which was the element of his being, he disregarded all warnings. At first he appeared to overcome all the fatigues of the journey. Received most affectionately by the king and the royal family, greeted with reverence and honour by all, he enjoyed the noblest and purest pleasure of his heart; when, on his return, while the memory and relish of these delightful hours was yet on his mind, the angel of death overtook him, and gently and suddenly called him, without pain or struggle, to his better home. He died at Gratz, near Torgau.

Who was more worthy of such a death than he! Even in the deep unutterable grief which oppressed the noble partner of his life and reign, and all his family, which depressed us all, and made us deplore the loss of his presence as an irremediable calamity, even at his hallowed tomb, we say, as Goethe said at the grave of his incomparable mother,—"This is the prerogative of the noblest natures, that their departing to higher regions exercises a no less blessed influence than did their abode on earth; that they lighten us from above like stars by which to steer our course, often interrupted by storms; that those to whom we turned in life as the Beneficent, the Helpful, now attract our longing, aspiring glance as the Perfected, the Blessed.

ANECDOTE OF A HIGHWAYMAN, FOUNDED ON FACT.

(From the "Lounger's Common Place Book.")

A clergyman on his way from London to the parish in which he resided, within twenty miles of the metropolis, as the evening was closing, overtook a traveller on horseback, and as the road had been long notorious for frequent robberies, begged leave to join company, which was agreed to.

The appearance of the stranger, half-suppressed sighs, and a rooted melancholy stamped on his countenance, against which he seemed to be ineffectually struggling, interested the old gentleman in his favour. They conversed on various subjects, and soon dissipated that unsocial reserve, which has sometimes been considered the characteristic mark of an Englishman. Politics, the weather, and the danger of travelling near London at night, with other extemporaneous topics of new acquaintance, were successively the subject of their conversation. "I am surprised," said the ecclesiastic, "that any reasonable being, should expose himself to the infamy and destruction which sooner or later always follow the desperate adventures of a highwayman; and my astonishment at the infatuation increases when I recollect several instances of wanderers in this dangerous path, who were men of sound intellect, and, previous to the fatal act, of sober life and conversation; they must have known that in this our Christian country, there were inexhaustible resources of pity and relief, in the hands and hearts of the charitable and humane, many of whom make it the business of their lives, to seek for, and assist real distress in any form."

"I agree to the truth of your description generally speaking," replied the traveller; "the princely revenues and bulky magnificence of our various public hospitals; the vast subscriptions on every occasion of general calamity or individual distress; the thousands, and tens of thousands, fed, clothed, and instructed; the Gallic fugitives, and the shoals of exiles from every part of the continent, confirm the justice of your panegyrics on British benevolence and hospitality; but there is a species of suffering, which shrinking from public notice, and brooding in silence over its sorrows, often escapes the benignant, but rapid glance of modern charity. There are spirits, Sir," continued the stranger, in an elevated tone of voice, his eyes flashing at the moment with ferocious pride, and tortured sensibility, "there are spirits which would rather perish by inches than attempt to awaken the generosity, or expose themselves to the neglect or contempt of the giddy unthinking part of mankind;—spirits, Sir, which would not hesitate a moment in flying for refuge in instant death, in order to evade the arrows of misfortune, and conclude their own miseries, but who cannot see a wife, a child, or a parent, bereft of the necessities of life, without resolving, at any risk, to alleviate their difficulties? There is a species of distress which does not always strike the wealthy, which they cannot often find out, and which prudent men when they do see it often laugh at and revile; they tell the sufferer that he is poor and miserable only because he deserves to be so; that while he has legs to support him and arms able to work, he has no right to expect relief; that it would be injustice and bad policy to bestow on imaginary poverty, refined indolence, and culpable affectation, the meed due only to irretrievable calamity and indigent infirmity. Your appearance, Sir, from the moment you approached me, and your conversation since, have strongly prepossessed me in your favour, and I am resolved, without fear or reserve, to inform you of a secret, which I never meant should have passed my lips; it will account for that anxiety and dejection, which cannot have escaped your observation. I am a wretched being of that class, which, as I have just said, the gay overlook, the prudent censure, and the ignorant despise; I was reduced by a union of folly and misfortune, from ease and affluence, to a total deprivation of the means of existence; I cannot dig; I am ashamed to beg; but this is the least part of my affliction, as one desperate, (I do not say justifiable) step, would at once remove me from the evils I endure; but the pangs of want are aggravated by the bitter reflexion, that a beloved wife, an aged parent, and three lovely children are involved in the same ruin. Too proud to appeal to the humanity, I resolved to work upon the fears of mankind, and I have for some time supported my family by force of arms. I confess without scruple that to procure a purse at all events is the business of my present journey—be not alarmed, Sir, at the avowal," cried the stranger, seeing the clergyman somewhat terrified at his words, "be not alarmed; I would cut off my right hand rather than abuse the confidence you have placed in me. It is on individuals of a very different description that I mean to raise contributions; on the luxurious, the wealthy, and the indolent, who parting with a little loose cash are deprived of only a minute portion of their superfluity which they would otherwise dissipate in folly or vice."

The divine, somewhat recovered from his embarrassment, now ventured to speak.

"I cannot by any means be prevailed on to agree to your positions, nor can I, as a minister of the gospel, refrain from warning you against the fatal conclusions you draw from them; such is the discriminating sense, such the enlightened philanthropic spirit, and such the persevering benevolence of the times, that I am convinced there is no species of distress, however it may recede from public view, or bury itself in obscurity, that can escape the sharp sighted optics of English humanity. Not content with conferring favours on humble applicants, it is one of the most prominent features of the present day to form societies, for the express purpose of exploring the darkest recesses of human misery; no grievance properly explained and well authenticated, is suffered to go unredressed;—remove all possibility of imposition; and to know calamity in England, is to remove it. But allowing for arguments sake that the case was otherwise; on what principle of religion or right reason, are you authorised, rash and mistaken man, to desert the post at which providence placed you, and at the first appearance of difficulty or disaster, forgetting duty, interest, friendship, and every social tie, insolently to rush into the presence of your creator, your hands reeking with your own blood; and murder most foul, vile, and unnatural, branded on your cheeks, in defiance of divine precepts, and in direct violation of that principle, which he has so wisely and so mercifully implanted in your breast." The good man would have proceeded; but his companion seeing, as the moonlight shone through the parting clouds, a post-chaise ascending the hill, thus interrupted him:—

"To know calamity is to relieve it, if I rightly understood you, is one of your positions?"—"It is."—"An opportunity for putting to the test the truth of your assertion, now offers itself," said the stranger; "the carriage which is coming is, in fact, what I have several hours been expecting. The owner of it is a rich man, and if my information be correct, has a considerable sum of money with him: I will without exaggeration or reserve, explain my situation to him; according to your honourable, but in my mind, romantic and unfounded doctrine, I will endeavour to prevail on his reason to acknowledge the justness of my claims, and try to interest his feeling to relieve my distress."

The trier of this dangerous and unlawful experiment, immediately turned his horse, and descending the hill, in a few minutes met the gentleman's carriage. Requesting the driver to stop, he advanced to the door, without any appearance of violence, and, in a gentle tone of voice, thus addressed the person who was in it: "Sir, the urgency of my wants must be an apology for this abrupt application: myself, my wife, and an infant family, are in want of support, our accustomed resources have vanished; you are plentifully supplied with the means, have you the inclination effectually to serve me?"

The gentleman, considering what he said as the common-place cant of mendicant imposture, by which the hearts of the frequenters of London are so naturally, but too indiscriminately hardened, sometimes against the wailings of real misery, yet not able wholly to suppress those feelings which an indiscriminate address had awakened, twisted all his loose silver into a paper, gave it to the petitioner, and ordered the post-boy to drive on. "This trifle, I am sorry to say," replied the illicit collector, "is by no means adequate to the pressure I feel; it will not provide for my family a week. A fifty-pound bank note, which will not be missed in your abundance, would remove all my difficulties, and give me time to apply to a wealthy relation, who lives in another kingdom. If you can prevail on yourself to afford me this timely assistance, I will give you my name and address, to a place, where you will see positive proof that your benevolence has not been imposed on, and I may possibly recover by diligence, and good friends, my customary place in society."

"You are troublesome, ungrateful, and impertinent," said the gentleman, somewhat irritated; "can you suppose I am to be duped by so shallow an artifice, can you expect me to give so serious a sum to a man whose face I never saw before, and probably shall never see again; I will do no such thing; you are mistaken in your man: post-boy, I insist on it, that you drive on directly." Let him do it at his peril! cried the robber, raising his voice and presenting a double barrelled pistol: "stir not an inch; before we part I must have your money or your life. There is in your portmanteau that which will relieve all my wants; deliver me instantly the key; your pocket-book which I see you have dropped to the bottom of your chaise, must with its contents be also surrendered. Driver, alight directly, and if you have any regard for your safety, stand steadily at the heads of your horses, throw aside your whip, turn your back to the carriage, and unless you wish for a slug through your head, take not the least notice of anything that is doing." The key of the portmanteau was produced, the cords and straps divided with a knife, and three hundred guineas, in two yellow canvass bags were conveyed to the pockets of the highwayman. Having amply supplied his pecuniary wants, the marauder did not neglect to take the necessary means for insuring his own safety; cutting pieces from the cord which had secured the baggage, he tied the hands and feet of the gentleman and the post-boy, placed them in the chaise, then taking the harness from the horses, he let them loose on the heath, remounted, and quickly rejoined the clergyman, to whom he gave a circumstantial account of the whole transaction; declared himself confirmed in his system, spurred his horse, and wishing him a good night, was in a few minutes out of his sight. The old gentleman soon reached his house, reflecting with a heavy heart on the circumstances of the evening; the stranger so obstinately persisting in a theory so opposite to all laws, human and divine, and defending violence by argument, disordered his feelings, and kept him awake more than half the night. Rising early, he walked to the seat of his brother, a magistrate, who resided in a neighbouring village, to whom he related the adventure of the preceding night. They resolved, assisted by a gentleman who presided at one of the public offices, to whom the ecclesiastic immediately wrote, to watch the progress of the unhappy man, whose destruction they saw was certain. It was not long before what they dreaded came to pass; in a few posts they received a letter from their friend in London, informing them, that by means of one of the bank-notes in the pocket-book, the robber had been detected, taken into custody, and conveyed to prison. So vigorous, indeed, were the means pursued, and so rapid the march of justice, in consequence of the Judges of the Assize being sitting at the moment of the offender's apprehension, that an indictment was prepared, the bill found, and the culprit actually arraigned at the bar, by the time the clergyman was able to reach town. He hurried into court, anxious to be convinced that the prisoner at the bar was the companion of his nocturnal journey, in whose fate he felt himself so strangely interested. Pressing with some difficulty through the crowd he instantly recognized him; and, to add to the sorrow he felt, a verdict of guilty, in consequence of evidence which it was impossible to resist, was pronounced against him, at the moment of entering. The worthy priest was not able to suppress or conceal his emotions at beholding a young man, of pleasing person and manners, and of a good understanding, who might have been an ornament to his country, the delight and solace of his family, thus cut off in the prime of life, by adhering to a system radically preposterous and unwarrantable. Rushing from the afflicting scene, he relieved himself by a shower of tears. The criminal soon after suffered an ignominious death. But the worthy clergyman did not let his feelings make him forget his duty. He considered virtue as something more than a well-sounded period, or an harmonious flow of words, and recollecting that the deceased had left a mother, widow, and children, he hastened to them, and became a parent to the fatherless, promoting, and largely contributing to a subscription in their favour. In exercising this kind office, he procured further information concerning this unhappy man; he found that he was the son of an industrious and successful mechanic, who had realized a small fortune by frugality and perseverance; but instigated by the vanity or folly of his wife, and perhaps glad to make that an excuse for indulging his own, he had yielded in an unlucky moment to the infatuation of the times. He gave his eldest son a genteel and expensive education, that pernicious weakness in large families of small fortune; he taught him to despise that humble, but honest art, which had raised his family from indigence; the fabrication of some one part of the complex machinery of a watch, in the formation of which human industry is divided into so many separate and distinct branches, while the putting the whole together and superintending its movements, constitutes another reputable employment. The young man was thus disqualified for treading in the footsteps of his father, which would have led him by the paths of duty and regularity, to health of body, peace of mind, and competency: he became that wretchedest of all beings, an accomplished gentleman without fortune, without any intellectual or material dexterity, which would enable him to procure one; a class of men to whom the gaming-tables, or the road, afford a common last resource. He had been taught to spend, and actually had spent thousands, but had not been initiated in the more mercenary art of earning his dinner. But this was not the whole of the evil; in frivolous or vicious pursuits, he had dissipated a large portion of that property, which, at his father's death, ought to have been equally divided among himself, his brothers, and sister. The miserable parent felt, when it was too late, the effects of his mistake, and injudicious partiality. In the decline of life he was deprived of those little indulgences, those sweet reliefs of age and pain to which honest industry is fairly entitled. This fatal error, of which I believe every person who peruses this page can produce numerous instances, embittered the old man's declining days with unavailing repentance, and hurried his son into a disgraceful death.

LA SORTILEGA; OR, THE CHARMED RING.

(From Lays and Legends of Spain.)

In the province of Andalusia there lived a rich and noble cavalier, named Don Remigio de la Torre, who had to wife Donna Ines Pauda, the most beautiful woman in all the land. Long and happily they lived together; so that their felicity had become a byword among their neighbours, and they were held up as an example to all young persons entering into the blessed state of matrimony. Indeed neither tongue nor pen can describe how happily they were consoled.

One day, as they sat together in the lady's bower, their talk turned upon death. The thoughts of a possible separation made each feel melancholy, and they remained silent for some time. At last Donna Ines said,

"If you should die, my love, I am sure I should die too."

Don Remigio kissed her eyes, which were full of tears, and pressed her to his bosom.

"What should I do," murmured he, half choked with his imaginary sorrow, "if you left me alone in this bleak world?"

They kissed and comforted each other; and soon the momentary melancholy they had experienced was absorbed in sentiments of increased affection. However, it was agreed between them that the survivor should watch nine successive nights in the sepulchre of the deceased, with the coffin opened and the face of the corpse uncovered; and that during that vigil which was to commence an hour before midnight, and terminate an hour before dawn, his or her eyes should never for a moment be taken off the corpse.

Time fled, and a period was about to be put to their happiness. In one single week from the day on which this conversation occurred, Donna Ines was attacked with a deadly malady. Three days more, and she departed this life to the unspeakable sorrow of her agonized husband. Her funeral was celebrated with every possible pomp and magnificence. All the nobility and clergy of the neighbouring country accompanied the body, which was deposited in an old vault, at a short distance from the castle of Don Remigio, and which had been used by his ancestors since the days of Pilayo. The concourse then departed to their several homes, and the disconsolate husband retired to his chamber.

An hour before midnight according to his compact with the deceased, he entered the vault in which lay the earthly remains of all that he had loved in the world. In pursuance of his plighted word, he proceeded to unfasten the coffin lid, and to uncover the face of his beloved Ines. This done, he fell on his knees beside her, and alternately kissing her cold lips, eyes, and cheeks, prayed aloud, in the most fervent strain, for the repose of her soul.

Midnight, which was announced by the giant bell, found him engaged in this occupation. Just as the last stroke of the bell reverberated in his ear, his attention was attracted by a sudden noise at the other side of the vault. He started back in momentary affright, as an enormous serpent, with eyes like fire, and scales sparkling like polished steel, sprung forward to attack him. But his dismay was but momentary,—he stepped aside instantly—the serpent shot past him, and before the reptile could again renew the attack, Remigio smote it with his trusty sword, and, behold, in its place, he perceived a beautiful ring glittering with jewels, lying on a written scroll of paper, the letters inscribed on which were of burnished gold. Don Remigio approached and took the ring and the scroll; on the latter he read, in glowing characters, the following verse:

Take this ring and straight apply it
To the corpse's lips, that lieth
In the sleep of death so quiet;
Quick to life you'll bring her by it,
In the blessed Trine's name try it.

While he read these lines the air seemed to resound with strains of wild harmonious music. When he had finished he did not delay a moment in trying the means for the recovery of his beloved wife from the grave, which had been so strangely revealed to him.

"In the name of the Blessed Trinity—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit," said he, touching at the same time the corpse's pale cold lips with the talisman, "arise, and live once more."

Ines arose as if from a sleep.

"My beloved wife!"—"My beloved husband." They could say no more for some minutes, so absorbed were they with each other. At last tears came to their relief, and they wept in joy until the day broke, and they left the sepulchre together.

Unconscious in the fullness of their happiness whither they went, they wandered unwittingly the whole morning, until at noon they found themselves on a broad beech, the sands of which shone like diamonds in the sun; and the sea before them. They sat down at the water edge, and Don Remigio exhausted from contending emotions, laid his head on his lady's lap, and took his siesta while she watched over him as a mother over her child.

But while he continued in this deep sleep a gallant barque, with all her sails set, neared the shore, the captain, a young man of most comely presence, leaped from her deck, beside Donna Ines.

"Fair Lady," said he, enamoured at the first glimpse of her extreme beauty, "what dost thou here in a place of such danger. Know ye not that this cave is the resort of Moorish Zebiques; and that if they find you here they will carry you off to captivity."

Don Remigio slept on, and heard not a word of this discourse. Donna Ines imperceptibly shifted his head from her lap, until at last she laid it on a large stone which was beside them.

"Leave your drowsy, ungallant companion," continued the captain, "and come with me on board my brave barque. I love you more than I may say. We will go to my home in a distant country, and you shall be my bride, and mistress of all my broad lands. Come, sweetest, come, you shall know neither fear nor sorrow; but your life shall be as one long sunny day of delight."

The lady hesitated a moment, and looked at her husband; she then rose, averted her head, put forth her hand to her seducer, and stepped on board his barque. A fair wind sprung up, the mariners bent on their oars,—the sails filled, and bellied in the breeze, and in a very short period Ines and her new over were out of sight of land.

When Don Remigio awoke and missed his wife, he stormed and raved like a man distracted. Now he thought she might have been carried off by the Moors, and he cursed his untoward drowsiness; anon, he deemed that she had returned home, and left him to find his way as he best could; but his good opinion of himself did not suffer him to entertain this thought for more than a moment; and at last he imagined that it might be all nothing more than a dream. Filled with this idea he sped back to the sepulchre; but he found the door open, and only the sere cloths, of which he had divested the body of Ines, in the coffin. His wife was not there, and he was convinced. He then hastened home.

Arrived at the castle, he called to his servants, and anxiously inquired whether his wife had returned? But the servants, astonished beyond measure, one and all answered in the negative.

"What does our master mean?" inquired the hoary Castellan. "I have nursed him on my knee when a child—I have shared in his sports when a boy—I have waited and watched for him, a man—and never before heard I such a question from him."

But Don Remigio, who had returned from an unsuccessful search in his lady's bower, under the impression that she might have entered the castle unheeded by his servants, explained to them the cause of his question; and they all stood aghast with horror and surprise at the strangeness of the tale.

"Moreover," said he, "I mean to leave my castle to-morrow, never, perhaps, to return again; so make speed for my departure. Stay you here, however, and never want support, while my demesnes afford it. Before the dawn I shall depart, and let no one on his peril seek for me or speak of me after I shall have gone."

The menials bowed their heads; they were filled with grief, for he was a good and a kind master. They then went to eat their dinners and discuss his project, as far as they could conjecture its significance. The hoary Castellan was so sad that he retired to his ward-room—got intoxicated, and deranged his stomach for an entire week on the strength of his sorrow.

Before the dawn, Don Remigio had departed from the hall of his fathers disguised as a mendicant, but with a large sum of money and many valuable jewels concealed about his person. Two day and two nights he journeyed thus, in pursuance to a vow he had made previous to his setting out, of subsisting only on the alms of the pious, until he once more found his beloved wife, he eat only the bread of charity. On the evening of the third day he fell in with a poor fellow equipped at all points like himself, and also bound like him on an eleemosynary expedition, with this difference, that was not it from inclination, but from necessity he undertook it. Short time sufficed to make these companions in misfortune known to each other, for there are not many formalities among the poor; and misery, says the old saw, makes us acquainted with strange bed-fellows.

Don Remigio proposed that they should join company, a proposal which the beggar most readily agreed to, since his partner renounced all claims to further share in the alms they received, than was absolutely necessary to his support; this done, they journeyed on together.

Many long days, and many weary miles did they wander on, they knew not whither. Many a kind heart did they meet in their course, many an unkind one—the kind hearts preponderated, and they were principally women. In the meanwhile, each had manifold opportunities of knowing the other. At length, one sultry afternoon, as they lay in the shade of a cork-tree, high in the Sierra Morena mountains, Remigio's companion earnestly inquired of him, whither he was going? Remigio moved by the poor fellow's sympathy told him all. This drew closer the bonds of friendship with which they had become insensibly attached to each other; and in reply to a suggestion of the former that he might leave him if he chose, he said he would follow him while he had life and his permission. When the air cooled they pursued their journey together.

Days and days, and leagues and leagues they wandered on, over mountains and rivers, through valleys and gardens, on—on, until they arrived at last at a great city, fatigued, foot-sore, and anxious for a little repose after their toils. Here they made up their minds to remain and rest for a week. It would seem as if this resolve were the inspiration of some protecting spirit. They had been there but two days, when going to mass on the third, which was Sunday, they learned from their brethren in misery, whom they had met with at the church doors in crowds, that the nuptials of a great lord of the land with a beautiful Andalusian lady, were to take place the same day, and that an entertainment was to be given in the court-yard of his palace to all the mendicants of the city and its vicinity. After mass was over, they joined company with their brother beggars, proceeded to the palace of the great lord, and placed themselves at one of the long tables which were laid out in the court-yard, covered with wholesome and savoury food.

Seated behind the jalousies in her balcony, the Andalusian lady and her lord, saw with curiosity, the concourse of mendicants to the banquet provided for them. All of a sudden the lady started back, uttered a half-suppressed shriek, and grew deadly pale.

"What ails you, my love," asked the lord, in the utmost alarm.

"My husband—my own husband," she exclaimed, her straining eye-balls almost starting from her head.

"You are mad," said her lord, half in anger, and half in jest.

"My husband!" she exclaimed. "See, he is sitting at yon table disguised as a mendicant. Look, look; oh God! what shall I do." The mendicant looked up, and saw her and fell backwards, for the Andalusian lady was poor Remigio's ungrateful wife.

The lord of the castle looked also, and seeing that Remigio was no common mendicant, believed what the Andalusian lady had spoken.

"Take your lady to her chamber," said he to her maiden, who had entered at his call, "and send Guzman to me."

Guzman came, and after conversing apart with his lord, received a purse of money and descended to the court-yard of the castle, while the bridegroom sought the chamber of his lady.

"Tis all arranged," said he, "he shall trouble us no longer. He then told her his scheme for getting rid of her husband without violence on his part, and with due observance of every form of law. There was a statute in force in that city that visited with the punishment of death all those who stole the sum of ten ducats or any thing over it.

"I have sent Guzman," said he, "to conceal a purse to that amount on his person; Guzman will do the business dexterously I warrant you, for he was once a brigand; we shall then have the fool tried, and I will deal with him accordingly. That will not be our fault."

"No," said the Andalusian lady: "No, it will not be our fault, it will be all Guzman's."

Guzman meanwhile had executed his commission; under the pretence of helping the mendicant from his swoon, he concealed the purse in the large sleeve of the beggar's garb. In a few minutes he made an outcry, said he was robbed of ten ducats in a purse—and commanded the castle gates to be shut. A search was immediately begun among the beggars. It came to Remigio's turn to be searched last, when, just as they touched him, out fell the purse from his sleeve, where it had been hid by the treacherous Guzman.

This was all Guzman wanted. So they hurried poor Remigio before the lord of the castle for judgment. After a mock trial, which was secretly witnessed by his wife, concealed behind the judgment seat, Remigio was condemned to death. From the audience-chamber he was quietly transferred to the castle chapel; and then left to prepare himself for eternity, while the gibbet on which he was to be hanged was getting ready.

Innocent of all guilt, and sad at the idea of such a fate, poor Remigio remained in the castle chapel during the period preceding the time appointed for his execution. However, the godly assistance of his confessor, reconciled him in some degree to death, and he resigned himself ultimately to his departure from a world where, after all, he had latterly experienced nothing but misery and misfortune. The confessor shrieved him and sained him; and then took his leave. At this juncture Remigio bethought him of the talisman. He made up his mind at once to the course he should pursue; and taking leave of his confessor, he prayed him as a final favour, that he would seek out his brother mendicant, and send him to him without delay.

"Vulgate Dios, my son," said the confessor, "thy will shall be done." The confessor departed, and in a short time the beggar arrived.

"Brother," said Remigio, "you have proved yourself a real friend; will you do me one favour after I die?"

The beggar replied that he would if it were in his power.

"Take this ring then," said Remigio, giving him the charmed circlet; "take also this purse, which contains all my money. When I am removed from the gallows touch you at midnight my lips with the middle stone of the ring, in the name of the Blessed Trinity, and keep the contents of the purse for yourself when you have done so.

The mendicant promised all that was required of him, and left the chapel, taking with him the ring and the purse.

In a few minutes afterwards the executioners came in, and took Remigio to the gibbet, where they hung him at once. When he was dead they cut him down and carried his corpse to the castle chapel; there, leaving it on the steps of the altar until morning, they departed.

At midnight, the mendicant, faithfully to his promise, stole into the chapel on tip-toe, sadly frightened at the solemnity and singularity of the scene in which he was to perform a part.

"In the name of the Blessed Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit," said he, as with the charmed ring he touched the lips of the corpse.

That which was the corse at once stood up, and the mendicant swooned from fear on the floor of the chapel.

"Fear nothing," said Don Remigio; "follow me; all is right."

They left the city together in the silence of the night; and left the city together rejoicing in the darkness. Days on days, and nights on nights they wandered on, until at last they came to the capital city of the kingdom. Just as they entered the gates they heard a herald proclaim the sore illness of the king, and offer of a third of the realm to whoever would cure him of his grievous malady.

"Come," said Remigio, who had resumed possession of the talisman, to his mendicant companion, "I'll go and cure the king."

His companion, who now of course, nothing doubted his ability, did as he desired. They proceeded together to the royal palace. After considerable difficulty, they obtained access to the monarch; and Remigio at once proposed to make him whole again. The king wished him to try the experiment in the presence of his council; but this he would not consent to. The chamber was accordingly cleared of all but the patient and his new physician. After a few words of good cheer to the dying monarch, Remigio touched his lips with the ring, and bade him to be healed in the name of the Blessed Trinity. He arose at once, sound in mind and body, from the couch in which he had lain in sorrow and pain for many long years. The gratitude of the monarch had no bounds. At the end of five days he summoned Remigio before him; and in the presence of his council proceeded to partition his kingdom according to the proclamation made by the royal herald. But Remigio, who had been lodged in the palace during that period would not hear of this; and he simply asked to be made commandant and governor of the city in which he had, through the instrumentality of his wife and her gallant, suffered so much in mind and body. This the king ceded to at once, and entertained him sumptuously till his departure.

Accompanied by a magnificent cavalcade, and followed by a sumptuous retinue he set out for this city. After some days pleasant travel he reached it in safety. Arrived there, he immediately convoked the nobility and gentry, and invited their wives and daughters to accompany them to a great entertainment to be given in his palace. They all hastened to the scene of festivity. Among them, the causes of his misery, were not the slowest in coming.

What must have been his feelings at seeing his wife and her lover, may be better guessed than described. However, he made a great shew of kindness to them, and especially singled out his wife, to whom he was completely unknown, as the object of his particular attention. He seated her and her lord beside him, and induced her by degrees to relate to him her whole history. She omitted, however, those portions of it which reflected on her own character, and threw all the blame of her former husband's death on her lord. At last he discovered himself to her.

"Do you know me?" cried he, in a voice like thunder—"Look, I am your much injured husband!"

She fell down in a swoon, the whole company was in consternation, for no one knew the cause. At last Remigio cleared up the mystery by calling in his guards; and after ordering them to carry the two delinquents off to prison, related to his nobles the nature of their offence, and the whole of his own history. Every one pitied him, and approved of his proceedings.

Next day they were put on their trial, and condemned to be hanged first and to be beheaded afterwards. Guzman was the principal witness against them. At the time appointed they were accordingly executed, and you may be sure Remigio did not apply the ring to the mouth of either. Guzman was sent to the quick-silver mines. Their heads were set on the principal gates of the city, where they remained at the time that the story was written.

TABLE-TALK.

Reproof.—Choose a fit time for that reproof which effective benevolence demands. If a failure have taken place on the part of any individual toward you avoid mentioning it at the moment, for nothing you can say will cause that not to have happened which has happened. The tendency of your observation will naturally and necessarily be to produce suffering on his part, and that ill humour towards you which is the result of his suffering. If a similar occasion is likely to occur, then and then only, just before the occasion, if you see a prospect that your interposition will be of use, is the time for recalling to his mind the former failure. The effect will thus be influential at the moment when it is wanted, and all the intermediate suffering will be spared. But remember, that of useless reproof pure evil is the consequence,—evil certain and considerable, in the humiliation of the person reproofed,—evil contingent, in the loss of his amity, and the exposure to his enmity.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We are obliged to postpone various extracts which we had intended to make this week from the communications, in prose and verse, of our correspondents; and shall probably be compelled to do so till the week after next. Meantime, we insert in this place, as the fittest for it, the letter we promised which was addressed by Goethe "To the Youthful Poets of Germany."

"But too frequently are German poems sent to me with a wish that I would not only criticize the work, but give my thoughts on the true poetical vocation of the poet. However flattered I may be by such marks of confidence, it is impossible for me to give a suitable reply in writing to each of these applications;—it would, indeed, be difficult enough to answer them by word of mouth. As, however, these missives have a sort of general agreement or resemblance, I may venture here to make some remarks which may be of future usefulness.

"The German language has attained to such a pitch of cultivation and polish, that any man may succeed in expressing himself well and happily—in proportion to the subject or the sentiment, either in prose or verse, according to his ability. Hence it follows that every man, who, by hearing or by reading, has cultivated his mind up to that point at which he becomes in some degree intelligible to himself, feels himself immediately impelled to communicate to others his thoughts and opinions, his perceptions and his feelings.

"It were difficult, perhaps impossible for a young man to perceive that by this, little, in any higher sense, is accomplished. If we observe such productions accurately, all that passes in the inward man, all that concerns the person himself, appears more or less successfully, accomplished; in many cases so successfully that it is as deep as it is luminous, as correct as it is elegant. All that is general; the highest modes of existence, and the love of country; boundless nature, as well as her individual exquisite features,—surprise us here and there in the poems of young men; and we can neither fail to recognize their moral value, nor withhold our praise from their execution.

"Herein, however, lies the danger; for many who are travelling the same road will join company, and enter upon a pleasant excursion together, without trying themselves well, and observing whether their goal lie not all too far in the blue distance.

"For, alas! an observant well wisher has very soon cause to remark, that the deep-felt complacency of youth hiddenly fails, that mourning over vanished joys, regret for the lost, longing for the unknown, the unfound, the unattainable; discontent; invective against hindrances of all kinds; struggles against envy, jealousy, and persecution, trouble the clear spring; and thus we see the joyless company break up and become joyless misanthropic hermits. How difficult is it to make it intelligible to talent of every kind and degree, that the muse is a willing and delightful companion on the journey of life, but in no wise a safe guide!†

"When at our entrance into the life full of action and effort, and scant in pleasures, in which we must all, be what we may, feel ourselves dependent on a great Whole, we ask back all our early dreams, wishes, hopes—all the delicious joys and facilities of our youthful fairy-land,—the Muse abandons us, and seeks the company of the man who can bear disappointment cheerfully, and recover from it easily; who knows how to gather something from every season; who can enjoy the glassy ice-track and the garden of roses, each at its appointed time; who understands the art of mitigating his own sufferings, and looks watchfully and industriously around him where he may find another's pain to soothe, another's joy to enhance.

"Then do no years sever him from the benign goddesses, who, if they delight in the bashfulness of innocence, also give their support to far-looking prudence; here foster the germ full of hope and promise; there rejoice in the complete, accomplished man, in his full development.

And thus be it permitted me to close this outpouring of the heart with a few words of rhyme.

Jungling, merke dir, in Zeiten
Wo sich Geist und Sinn erhöht
Dass die Muse zu begleiten
Dock zu leiten nicht versteht.

WINDOWS.

We have had a special regard for a window, ever since we sat in an old-fashioned one with a low seat to it in our childhood, and read a book. And for a like reason, we never see a door-way in a sequestered corner, with a similar accommodation for the infant student, without nestling to it in imagination, and taking out of our pocket the Arabian Nights or Philip Quarll. The same recollection makes us prefer that kind of window to all others, and count our daily familiarity with it as by no means among the disservices rendered us by fortune. The very fact of its existence shews a liberality in the dimensions of old-fashioned walls. There is "cut and come again" in them. Had modern houses been made of cheese, and La Fontaine's mouse found himself in one of them, he would have despised those rinds of buildings,—thin and fragile as if a miser had pared them away.

These modern windows are all of a piece, inside and out. They may make a show of having some thickness of wall at the sides, but it is only a hollow pretence for the convenience of the shutters; and even when the opportunity of forming a recess is thus offered them, it is not taken. It is seldom they contain a seat even in the parlour; and the drawing-room windows in such houses cannot comfortably have any, because, for the benefit of one's feet in this cold climate, they are cut down to the floor; a veranda being probably over head to intercept any superfluity of sunshine. "If a merry meeting is to be wished," says the man in Shakspeare, "may God prohibit it." If there is any sunshine to be had, stave it off; especially if you have been grumbling for its absence all the rest of the year.

"Would you have us sit then and be baked, Mr.— London Journal?"

Dear Madam, you ask the question with so pleasant a voice, and such a pretty good-natured exaggeration, that you are evidently one of those who may do, or not do, just what you please. We shall not find fault with you, if you close every shutter in the room, let the sun be never so smiling. Besides, we give up the hottest days in July and August. But grant us at any rate, that to have verandas always, as we see them in some houses, is hardly more reasonable, than having windows down to the floor at any time; and that the horror of a sunshine, by no means too abundant in this region, has more to do with the fear of discoloured curtains and carpets than it ought to have, especially among the rich. What signifies the flying of a few colours, easily replaced, compared with the giving a proper welcome to the great colourer himself,—the sun that makes all things beautiful? There are few sights in your town-house more cheerful than a sudden burst of sun into the room, smiting the floor into so many windows, and making the roses on the very carpet look as if they felt it. Let them fade in good season as the others do; and make up for the expense, dear fashionable people, by staying a little more at home, keeping better hours, and saving the roses on your cheeks.

Verandas have one good effect. They are an ornament to the house outside, and serve to hide the shabby cut of the windows. Still more is to be said for them, where they and the balcony include flowers. Yet windows down to the floor we hold to be a nuisance always—unnecessary, uncomfortable, absurd,—to say nothing of perils of broken panes and scolded children. They let draughts of air in across the floor, where nobody wants them; they admit superfluous light,—from earthwards instead of from heaven; they render a seat in the window impossible or disagreeable; they hinder the fire from sufficiently warming the room in winter-time; and they make windows partake too much of out-of-doors, shewing the inhabitants at full length as they walk about, and contradicting the sense of snugness and seclusion. Lastly, when they have no veil or other ornament outside, they look gawky and out of proportion. But the outside cut of windows in this country is almost universally an eye-sore. We have denounced them before, and shall denounce them again, in the hopes that house-builders may be brought to shew some proofs of being the "architects" they call themselves, and dare to go to an expense of nine and sixpence for a little wood or plaster, to make a border with. Look at the windows down the streets at the west-end of the town, and they are almost all mere cuts in the wall, just such as they make for barracks and work-houses. The windows of an Irish cabin are as good, as far as architecture is concerned. The port-holes of a man of war have as much merit. There is no pediment, nor border; seldom even one visible variety of any sort, not a coloured brick. And it is the same with the streets that contain shops, except, in some instances, those of the latest construction; which if not in the best taste otherwise, are built with a little more generosity, and that is a good step towards taste. When we meet with windows of a better sort, the effect is like quitting the sight of a stupid miser for that of a liberal genius. Such are the windows in some of the nobler squares; and you may see them occasionally over shops in the Strand and Piccadilly. Observe for instance the windows of Messrs. Greensill and Co. the lamp-oil manufacturers in the Strand, compared with those of the neighbours; and see what a superiority is given to them by the mere fact of their having borders, and something like architectural design. We will venture to say it is serviceable even in a business point of view; for such houses look wealthier; and it is notorious, that the reputation of money brings money. Where there is no elegance of this kind, (and of course also where there is) a box of flowers along the windows gives a liberal look to a house, still more creditable to the occupants, from the certainty we have of its being their own work. See in Piccadilly, the houses of Messrs. Rickards the spirit-merchants, near Regent Street, and Messrs. ——— we forget the name—the wax-chandlers, near the Park end. We never pass the latter without being grateful for the beautiful shew of nasturtiums,—a plant which it is an elegance itself to have so much regard for. There is also something very agreeable in the good-natured kind of intercourse thus kept up between the inmates of a house and those who pass it. The former appeal to one's good opinion in the best manner, by complimenting us with a share of their elegancies; and the latter are happy to acknowledge the appeal, for their own sakes as well as that of the flowers. Imagine (what perhaps will one day be the case) whole streets adorned in this manner, right and left; and multitudes proceeding on their tasks through avenues of lilies and geraniums. Why should they not? Nature has given us the means, and they are innocent, animating, and contribute to our piety towards her. We do not half enough avail ourselves of the cheap riches wherewith she adorns the earth. We also get the most trivial mistakes in our head, and think them refinements, and are afraid of being "vulgar!" A few seeds, for instance, and a little trouble, would clothe our houses every summer, as high as we chose, with draperies of green and scarlet; and after admiring the beauty, we might eat the produce. But then this produce is a bean; and because beans are found at poor tables, we despise them! Nobody despises a vine in front of a house; for vines are polite, and the grapes seldom good enough to be any use. Well; use, we grant, is not the only thing, but surely we have no right to think ourselves unbogged to it, when it teaches us to despise beauty. In Italy, where the drink is not common, people have a great respect for beer, and would perhaps rather see a drapery of hops at the front of a house, than vine-leaves. Hops are like vines; yet who thinks of adorning his house with them in England? No: they remind us of the ale-house instead of nature and her beauties; and therefore they are "vulgar." But is it not we who are vulgar, in thinking of the ale-house, when nature and her beauties are the greater idea?

It is objected to vegetation against walls and windows, that it harbours insects; and good housewives declare they shall be "over-run." If this be the fact, care should be taken against the consequences; and should the care prove unavailing, every thing must be sacrificed to cleanliness. But is the charge well-founded? and if well-founded in respect to some sorts of vegetation, is it equally so with all? we mean, with regard to the inability to keep out the insects. There is a prejudice against ivy on houses, on the score of its harbouring wet, and making the houses damp; yet this opinion has been discovered to be so groundless (see London Journal, No. 4, p. 32), that the very contrary is the fact. Ivy is found to be a remedy for damp walls. It wards off the rain; and secures to them a remarkable state of dryness; as any one may see for himself by turning a bush of it aside, and observing the singular drought and dustiness prevailing between the brick or mortar and the back of the leaves.

Plate-glass has a beautiful look in windows; but it is too costly to become general. We remember when the late Mrs. Orby Hunter lived in Grosvenor Place, it was quite a treat to pass by her parlour window, which was an arch, full of large panes of plate-glass, with a box of brilliant flowers underneath it, and jessamine and other creepers making a bower of the wall. Perhaps the house has the same aspect still; but we thought the female name on the door particularly suited it, and had a just ostentation.

Painted glass is still finer; but we have never seen it used in the front windows of a house, except in narrow strips, or over door-ways; which is a pity; for its loveliness is extreme. A good portion of the upper part of a window or windows, might be allotted to it with great effect, in houses where there is light to spare; and it might be turned to elegant and otherwise useful account, by means of devices, and even regular pictures. A beautiful art, little known, might thus be restored. But we must have a separate article on painted windows; which are a kind of passion of ours. They make us loth to speak of them, without stopping, and receiving on our admiring eyes the beauty of their blessing. For such is the feeling they always give us. They seem, beyond any other inanimate object, except the finest pictures by the great masters (which can hardly be called such) to unite something celestial, with the most gorgeous charm of the senses. There are more reasons than one for this feeling; but we must not be tempted to enter upon them here. The window must have us to itself, as in the rich quiet of a cathedral aisle.

We will conclude this outside consideration of windows (for we must have another and longer one for the inside), by dropping from a very heavenly to a very earthly picture, though it be one still suspended in the air. It is that of the gallant footman in one of Steele's comedies, making love to the maid-servant, while they are both occupied in cleaning the windows of their master's house. He does not make love as his honest-hearted brother Dodsley would have done (who from a footman became a man of letters); still less in the style of his illustrious brother Rousseau (for he too was once a footman); though there is one passage in the incident, which the ultra-sensitive lackey of the "Confessions," (who afterwards shook the earth with the very strength of his weakness) would have turned to fine sentimental account. The language also is a little too good even for a fine gentleman's gentleman; but the "exquisite" airs the fellow gives himself, are not so much beyond the reach of brisk footman-imitation, as not to have an essence of truth in them, pleasantly shewing the natural likeness between fops of all conditions; and they are as happily responded to by those of the lady. The combination of the unsophisticated picture at the close of the extract, with the languishing comment made upon it, is extremely ludicrous.

Enter TOM, meeting PHILLIS.

Tom. Well, Phillis!—What! with a face as if you had never seen me before?—What a work have I to do now! She has seen some new visitant at their house whose airs she has caught, and is resolved to practise them upon me. Numberless are the changes she'll dance through before she'll answer this plain question, videlicet, Have you delivered my master's letter to your lady? Nay, I know her too well to ask an account of it in an ordinary way; I'll be in my airs as well as she. (Aside). Well, madam, as unhappy as you are at present pleased to make me, I would not in the general be any other than what I am; I would not be a bit wiser, a bit richer, a bit taller, a bit shorter, than I am at this instant. (Looking steadfastly at her).

Phil. Did ever any body doubt, Master Thomas, that you were extremely satisfied with your sweet self?

Tom. I am indeed. The thing I have least reason to be satisfied with is my fortune, and I am glad of my poverty; perhaps, if I were rich, I should overlook the finest woman in the world, that wants nothing but riches to be thought so.

Phil. How prettily was that said! But I'll have a great deal more before I say one word. (Aside).

Tom. I should perhaps have been stupidly above her had I not been her equal, and by not being her equal never had an opportunity of being her slave. I am my master's servant from hire,—I am my mistress's servant from choice, would she but approve my passion.

Phil. I think it is the first time I ever heard you speak of it with any sense of anguish, if you really suffer any.

Tom. Ah, Phillis! can you doubt after what you have seen.

Phil. I know not what I have seen, nor what I have heard; but since I am at leisure, you may tell me when you fell in love with me, how you fell in love with me, and what you have suffered, or are ready to suffer, for me.

Tom. Oh! the unmerciful jade! when I am in haste about my master's letter:—But I must go through it (aside). Ah! Too well I remember when, and on what occasion, and how I was first surprised. It was on the First of April one thousand seven hundred and fifteen I came into Mr. Sealand's service; I was then a little hobble-de-hoy, and you a little tight girl, a favourite handmaid of the house keeper. At that time we neither one of us knew what was in us. I remember I was ordered to get out of the window, one pair of stairs, to rub the sashes clean—the person employed on the inner side was your charming self, whom I had never seen before.

Phil. I think I remember the silly accident. What made you, you oaf, ready to fall down into the street?

Tom. You know not, I warrant you; you could not guess what surprised me—you took no delight when you immediately grew wanton in your conquest, and put your lips close and breathed upon the glass, and when my lips approached, a dirty cloth you rubbed against my face, and hid your beauteous form; when I again drew near, you spit and rubbed, and smiled at my undoing.

SUCCESSIVE WRITERS ON THE MONTHS.

THE sight of an old acquaintance in improved condition, after a long lapse of time, is doubly pleasant. Dr. Aikin's Calendar of Nature, published originally perhaps about forty years back, once set us upon writing a similar book, with the addition of what we conceived to be a little more poetry,—a greater sense of enjoyment. Our attempt was followed by a variety of the like publications, all adding beauty and luxuriance as they went, cropping fresh flowers and noticing new objects. We here give a specimen of their prototype, who has just re-appeared with some congenial additions and elegant designs; * and shall annex to it with a sample or two of his more poetical and lively followers. We regret that we have not some more of them by us, that the reader may see how luxuriantly the good seed sown by Dr. Aikin has flourished. We have our own Calendar of Nature by us; but its account of the month of August is not a "favourable specimen," as the Reviewers say; so we beg leave to withhold it. And if it were, the reader might accuse us of immodesty in putting it cheek by jowl with its handsome kindred. Mr. Howitt's is very good, and requires any thing but an apology, though it is but an extract from his month, and not the whole of it, as in the Doctor's instance. The excellence of Mr. Clarke's descriptions was seen by our readers the other day in his account of the Rain-Storm. We have here made him contribute to our variety, by relating a harvest-joke; which, by the way, like most of the very best of caricature jokes, has all the air of being a matter of fact.

GENERAL ACCOUNT OF THE MONTH.

(From Dr. Aikin's Calendar of Nature.)

August—so called in compliment to the celebrated Roman emperor Augustus; and by the Anglo-Saxons Arn-monat intimating that this was the month for filling the barns with the products of the land. Arn is the Saxon word for harvest.

In the beginning of this month, the weather is still hot, and usually calm and fair. What remained to be perfected by the powerful influence of the sun, is daily advancing to maturity. The farmer now sees the principal object of his culture, and the chief source of his riches, waiting only for the hand of the gatherer. Of the several kinds of grain, rye and oats are usually the first ripened; but this varies according to the time of sowing; and some of every species may be seen fit for cutting at the same time.

Every fair day is now of great importance; since, when the corn is once ripe, it is liable to continual damage while standing, either from the shedding of the seeds, from the depredations of birds or from storms. The utmost diligence is therefore used by the careful husbandman to get it in, and labourers are hired from all quarters to hasten and complete the work.

Poured from the villages, a numerous train
Now spreads o'er all the fields. In formed array
The reapers move, nor shrink for heat or toil,
By emulation urged. Others, dispersed,
Or bind in sheaves, or load, or guide the wain,
That tinkles as it passes. Far behind,
Old age and infancy, with careful hand,
Pick up each straggling ear.

This pleasing harvest-scene is beheld in its perfection only in the open-field countries, where the sight can take in at once an uninterrupted extent of land waving with corn, and a multitude of people engaged in the various parts of the labour. It is a prospect equally delightful to the eye and the heart, and which ought to inspire every sentiment of benevolence to our fellow-creatures, and gratitude to our Creator.

Be not too narrow, husbandman! but fling
From the full sheaf, with charitable stealth,
The liberal handful. Think, oh! grateful, think How good the God of harvest is to you;
Who pours abundance o'er your flowing fields.

In a late season, or where favourable opportunities of getting in the harvest have been neglected, the corn on the ground often suffers from heavy storms of wind and rain. It is beaten to the earth; the seeds are shed, or rotted by the moisture; or, if the weather continues warm, the corn grows, that is, the seeds begin to germinate and put out shoots. Grain in this state is sweet and moist: it soon spoils on keeping; and bread made from it is clammy and unwholesome.

Harvest concludes with the field peas and beans, which are suffered to become quite dry and hard before they are cut down. The blackness of the bean-pods and stalks is disagreeable to the eye, though the crop is valuable to the farmer. In these countries they are used as food for cattle only, as the nourishment they afford, though strong, is gross and heavy.

The rural festival of harvest-home is an extremely natural one, and has been observed in almost all ages and countries. What can more gladden the heart than to see the long expected products of the year, which have been the cause of so much care and anxiety, now safely housed, and beyond the reach of injury?

Inwardly smiling, the proud farmer views
The rising pyramids that grace his yard,
And counts his large increase; his barns are stor'd,
And groaning staddles bend beneath their load.
Somerville.

The poor labourer too, who has toiled in securing another's wealth, justly expects to partake of the happy-ness. The jovial harvest-supper cheers his heart, and prepares him to begin, without murmuring, the labours of another year. About the middle of this month, the catkins of the hazel-nut make their appearance; these contain the male-blossoms, and by being born thus early acquire a firmness that enables them to resist the severity of the ensuing winter.

This month is the season for another kind of harvest in some parts of England, which is the hop-picking. The hop is a climbing plant, sometimes growing wild in hedges, and cultivated on account of its use in making malt-liquors. They are planted in regular rows, and poles set for them to run upon. When the poles are covered to the top, nothing can make a more elegantly appearance than one of these hop-gardens. At the time of gathering, the poles are taken up with the hops clinging to them, and the scaly flowering heads, which is the part used, are carefully picked off. These possess a finely flavoured bitter, which they readily impart to hot water. They improve the taste of beer, and make it keep better. Kent, Sussex, and Worcester, are the counties most famous for the growth of hops.

The number of plants in flower is now very sensibly diminished. Those of the former months are running fast to seed; and few new ones succeed. The uncultivated heaths and commons are now, however, in their chief beauty, from the flowers of the different kinds of heath or ling with which they are covered, so as to spread a rich purple hue over the whole ground: meadow-saffron, and Canterbury-bells are in flower. Many of the fern tribe now show the rusty-coloured dots on the back of the leaves, which are their parts of fructification. The leaves of the beech-tree now assume a yellow tinge.

Some of the choicest wall fruits are now coming into season.

The sunny wall

Presents the downy peach, the shining plumb,
The ruddy, fragrant nectarine, and, dark
Beneath his ample leaf, the luscious fig.

About the middle of August the largest of the swallow tribe, the swift or long-wing, disappears.

On their neighbouring beach yon swallows stand,
And wait for favouring winds to leave the land.

As there can yet be no want of insect food, moths abound in profusion at this time: the alderman and painted lady butterflies are constantly on the wing, and the weather is still warm—they cannot be supposed to retire to holes or caverns, and become torpid for the winter, and as they are so admirably formed for flight, it can scarce be doubted that they now migrate to some distant country. The wry-neck also departs, and the turtle dove. Starlings congregate about this time. Nearly at the same time, rooks no longer pass the nights from home, but roost in their nest trees.

The red-breast,* one of our finest though commonest songsters, renews his music about the end of the month. The young ones, that are now full grown, give us a pre-sage of their future familiarity with us, by hopping near us, and as it were observing us, among the shrubs in the garden. No bird shews so little fear of man as this, even when not pressed by hunger; and its confidence is rarely abused.

The bird whom man loves best,
The pious bird with the scarlet breast,
Our little English robin!
The bird that comes about our doors,
When autumn winds are sobbing.

CORN-HARVEST.

(From Mr. Howitt's Book of the Seasons.)

The grand feature of this month is CORN-HARVEST. It is a time for universal gladness of heart. Nature has completed her most important operations. She has ripened her best fruits, and a thousand hands are ready to reap her with joy. It is a gladdening sight to stand upon some eminence and behold the yellow hues of harvest amid the dark relief of hedges and trees, to see the shocks standing thickly in a land of peace, the partly reaped fields—and the clear, cloudless sky, shedding over all its lustre. There is a solemn splendour, a mellowness and maturity of beauty thrown over the landscape. The wheat crops shine on the hills and slopes, as Wordsworth expresses it, 'like golden shields cast down from the sun.' For the lovers of solitary rambles, for all who desire to feel the pleasures of a thankful heart, and to participate in the happiness of the simple and the lowly, now is the time to stroll abroad. They will find beauty and enjoyment spread abundantly before them. They will find the mowers sweeping down the crops of pale barley, every spiked ear of which so lately looking up bravely at the sun, is now bent downward in a modest and graceful curve, as if abashed at its ardent and incessant gaze. They will find them cutting down the rustling oats, each followed by an attendant rustic who gathers the swath into sheaves from the tender green of the young clover, which, commonly sown with oats, to constitute the future crop, is now shewing itself luxuriantly. But it is in the wheat field that all the jollity, and gladness, and picturesqueness of harvest are concentrated. Wheat is more particularly the food of man. Barley affords him a wholesome, but much abused potation; the oat is welcome to the homely board of the hardy mountaineers; but wheat is especially, and every where, the 'staff of life.' To reap and gather it in every creature of the hamlet is assembled. The farmer is in the field, like a rural king amid his people—the labourer, old or young, is there to collect what he has sown with toil, and watched in its growth with pride; the dame has left her wheel and her shady cottage, and with sleeve-defended arms, scorns to do less than the best of them:—the blooming damsel is there, adding her sunny beauty to that of universal nature; the boy cuts down the stalks which overtop his head; children glean amongst the shocks; and even the unwalkable infant, sits propt with sheaves, and plays with the stubble, and

With all its twined flowers.

Such groups are often seen in the wheatfield as deserve the immortality of the pencil. There is something too about wheat harvest, which carries back the mind and feasts it with the pleasures of antiquity. The sickle is almost the only implement which has descended from the olden times in its pristine simplicity—to the present hour neither altering its form, nor becoming obsolete amid all the fashions and improvements of the world. It is the same now as it was in those scenes of rural beauty, which the scripture history, without any laboured description, often by a simple stroke, presents so livingly to the imagination: as it was when tender thoughts passed Through the sad heart of Ruth, when sick for home,

She stood in tears amid the alien corn;

when the minstrel king wandered through the solitudes of Paran, or fields reposing at the feet of Carmel; or 'as it fell on a day that the child of the good Shunamite went out to his father to the respers. And he said unto his father, My head, my head! And he said to a lad, Carry him to his mother. And when he had taken him, and brought him to his mother, he sat on her knees till noon, and then died.' 2 Kings, c. iv. 18—20.

Let no one say it is not a season of happiness to the toiling peasantry; I know that it is. In the days of boyhood I have partaken their harvest labours, and listened to the overflowings of their hearts as they sate amid the sheaves beneath the fine blue sky, or among the rich herbage of some green headland beneath the shade of a tree, while the cool keen plentifully replenished the horn, and sweet after exertion were the contents of the harvest field basket. I know that the poor harvesters are among the most thankful contemplators of the bounty of Providence, though so little of it falls to their share. To them harvest comes as an annual festivity. To their healthful frames, the heat of the open fields, which would oppress the languid and relaxed, is but an exhilarating and pleasant glow. The inspiration of the clear sky above, and the scenes of plenty around them, and the very circumstance of their being drawn from their several dwellings at this bright season, open their hearts and give a life to their memories; and many an anecdote and history from the simple annals of the poor are there related, which need only to pass through the mind of a Wordsworth or a Crabbe, to become immortal in their mirth or woe.

GENUINE CLOWNISH RECRET,

Or the Relics of the Pudding going away.

(From Mr. Clarke's Adam the Gardener.)

After passing the afternoon in the wheat field, the children amusing themselves with catching and examining the most curious butterflies and other insects that came under their notice, the whole party, harvest-men and all, when the last load of corn had been ricked, sat down to a famous old English supper, of beef, pudding, and home-brewed ale, that had been prepared for them in the barn. What a pleasure it was to see the tired, hungry, and red-faced labourers pegging away at their hunks of meat and brown bread! And how they laughed and quizzed each other!—One of the party, a long, bony old fellow, who had pitched many a shaft from the cart to the rick, and who had eaten enough to choke a wolf, particularly excited the merriment of his comrades. 'Why, Jem,' said one, 'you pick your morsels loike a fine lady!—your stomach seems delicate to-day.' 'Oh! he's finikin,' said another; 'because he's invited out to supper. He wouldn't be so ongen-teel as to eat in our common way loike!' 'It's quite pleasant to see him so perlite,' said a third. 'And how daintily he sips his liquor!—like a sparrow.' 'You shouldn't wipe your mouth with the back o' your hand afore coompany, Jem!' 'Where's your thing-um-bob—your napkin?' 'I say—old fellow—you'll never be able to do a day's work if you play at knife and fork in that ere dandy way;—why, you'll never keep life and soul together. See there!—there's a little bit to put into a gentleman's mouth!—it aint so big as my flat.' The only answer Jem made to their jibes, (for he was too busy to talk much), were, 'I'll tell you what, young chaps!—eat as I may, I know you'd rather keep me a week than a fortnight. I don't get such a supper as this seven days in the week; and it's my maxim to make hay while the sun shines!' As they were clearing the board of the provisions, a blubberly young lad at the further end, who had sate for some time quite silent, and with his mouth wide open, suddenly burst into tears, 'Hal-lo! what's the matter with you, Giles?' 'My name aint Giles!—its Jowley—mother calls me Jowley for shortness!' 'Well, Jowley, what are you howling arter?' 'Why—why,' said he, sobbing, 'aint it enough to make any one roar to see all that nice pudding going away, and I can't eat no more!'

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XXX.—A PERSEVERING IMPOSTOR.

WE had doubts whether the following story from an old magazine had "dignity" enough for our Romances of Real Life! But a falsehood, however shabby, persevered in through the very solemnities of a death-bed, and investing itself with imaginary glories as it sets, even of name and estate, acquires a sort of astounding importance, however mixed with the trivial and absurd. The poor wretch, who thus strangely died, had at least something of an imagination, and he could not bear to part with the flatteries of it, even in the shape of the greater simpleton whom he had deceived.

A good likely sort of man, that had been many years footman to Mr. Wickham, a rich gentleman at Banbury, in Oxfordshire, came to London, and took lodging at a bakehouse, over against Arundel Street in the Strand. The baker being asked by his lodger what countryman he was, replied, "that he was of Banbury;" the other mighty glad to meet with his countryman, was wonderfully fond of the baker; adding, "that since he was of Banbury he must needs know Mr. Wickham, or have heard his name." The baker who, indeed, was very well acquainted with that gentleman's family, though he had been absent from Banbury fifteen or twenty years, was very glad to hear news of it, but was perfectly overjoyed when he heard that the man he was talking with was Mr. Wickham himself. This produces great respect on the side of the baker, and new testimonies of friendship from the sham Wickham. The family must be called up that Mr. Wickham might see them; and they must drink a glass together to their friends at Banbury, and take a pipe. The baker did not in the least doubt his having got Mr. Wickham for his lodger; but yet he could not help wondering that he should see neither footman nor portmanteau. He therefore made bold to ask him, "how a man of his estate came to be unattended?" The pretended Wickham, making a sign to him to speak softly, told him, "that his servants were in a place where he could easily find them when he wanted them, but that at present he must be very careful of being known, because he came up to town to arrest a merchant of London who owed him a great sum of money and was going to break. That he desired to be incognito for fear he should miss his stroke, and so he begged he would never mention his name. The next day Mr. Wickham went abroad to take his measures with a comrade of his own stamp, about playing their parts in concert. It was concluded between them, that this latter should go for Mr. Wickham's servant, and come privately from time to time to see his master, and attend upon him. That very night the servant came, and Mr. Wickham, looking at his own dirty neckcloth in the glass, was in a great rage with him for letting him be without money, linen, or any other conveniences, by his negligence, in not carrying his box to the waggon in due time, which would cause a delay of three days. This was said aloud while the baker was in the next room, on purpose that he might hear it. This poor deluded man hereupon runs immediately to his drawers, carries Mr. Wickham the best linen he had in the house, begged him to honour him so much as to wear it, and at the same time lays down fifty guineas upon his table that he might do him the favour to accept them also. Wickham at first refused them, but with much ado was prevailed upon. As soon as he had got this money, he made up a livery of the same colour as the true Mr. Wickham's, gave it to another pretended footman, and brought a box full of goods as coming from the Banbury waggon. The baker more satisfied than ever that he had to do with Mr. Wickham, and consequently with the one of the richest and noblest men in the kingdom, made it more and more his business to give him fresh marks of his profound respect and zealous affection. To be short, Wickham made a shift to get of him a hundred and fifty guineas, besides the first fifty, for all which he gave him his note. Three weeks after the beginning of this adventure, as the rogue was at a tavern, he was seized with a violent headache, with a burning fever, and great pains in all parts of his body. As soon as he found himself ill he went home to his lodging to bed, where he was waited upon by one of his pretended footmen, and assisted in everything by the good baker, who advanced whatever money was wanted, and passed his word to the doctors, apothecaries, and everybody else. Meanwhile, Wickham grew worse and worse, and about the fifth day was given over. The baker, grieved to the heart at the melancholy condition of his noble friend, thought himself bound to tell him, though with much regret, what the doctors thought of him. Wickham received the news as calmly as if he had been the best Christian in the world, and fully prepared for death. He desired a minister might be sent for, and received the communion the same day. Never was more resignation to the will of God, never more piety, more zeal, or more confidence in the merits of Christ. Next day the distemper and the danger increasing very much, the impostor told the baker that it was not enough to have taken care of his soul, he ought also to set his worldly affairs in order; and desired that he might make his will while he was yet sound in mind. A scrivener was therefore immediately sent for, and his will made and signed in all the forms before several witnesses. Wickham by this disposed of all his estate, real and personal, jewels, coaches, teams, race-horses of such and such colours, packs of hounds, ready money, &c., and a house with all appurtenances and dependencies, to the baker; almost all his linen to the wife; five hundred guineas to their eldest son; eight hundred guineas to the four daughters; two hundred to the parson that had comforted him in his sickness; two hundred to each of the doctors; and one hundred to the apothecary; fifty guineas and mourning to each of his footmen, fifty to embalm him, fifty for his coffin, two hundred to hang the house with mourning, and to defray the rest of the charges, of his interment. A hundred guineas for gloves, hat bands, scarfs, and gold rings; such a diamond to such a friend, and such an emerald to t'other. Nothing more noble, nothing more generous. This done, Wickham called the baker to him, loaded him and his whole family with benedictions, and told him, that immediately after his decease he had nothing to do but to go to the lawyer mentioned in his will, who was acquainted with all his affairs, and would give him full instructions how to proceed. Presently after this, my gentleman falls into convulsions and dies. The baker, at first, thought of nothing but burying him with all the pomp imaginable, according to the will. He hung all the rooms in his house, the stair-case, and the entry with mourning. He gave orders for making the rings, clothes, coffin, &c. He sent for the embalmer. In a word, he omitted nothing that was ordered by the deceased to be done. Wickham was not to be interred till the fourth day after his death, and everything was got ready by the second. The baker having got this hurry off his hands, had now time to look for the lawyer before he laid him in the ground. After having put the body into a rich coffin covered with velvet and plates of silver, and settled everything else; he began to consider that it would not be improper to reimburse himself as soon as possible, and to take possession of this new estate. He therefore went and communicated this whole affair to the lawyer. This gentleman was indeed acquainted with the true Mr. Wickham, had all his papers in his hands, and often received letters from him. He was strangely surprised to hear of the sickness and death of Mr. Wickham, from whom he had heard the very day before; and we may easily imagine the poor baker was much more surprised, when he found that in all likelihood he was bit. 'Tis not hard to conceive the discourse that passed between these two. To conclude, the baker was thoroughly convinced by several circumstances, too tedious to relate here, that the true Mr. Wickham was in perfect health; and that the man he took for him was the greatest villain and most complete hypocrite that ever lived. Upon this he immediately turned the rogue's body out of the rich coffin, which he sold for a third part of what it cost him. All the tradesmen that had been employed towards the burial had compassion on the baker, and took their things again, though not without some loss to him. They dug a hole in a corner of St. Clement's Churchyard, where they threw in his body with as little ceremony as possible. I was an eye-witness of most of the things which I have here related, and shall leave the reader to make his own reflexions upon them. I have been assured, from several hands, that the baker has since had his loss pretty well made up to him by the generosity of the true Mr. Wickham, for whose sake the honest man had been so open-hearted.

AFTER many years' separation, it is a great pleasure to meet, unexpectedly, with early acquaintances—to find those we thought dead to the world, or slumbering in our remembrance break upon our presence, like the April sun, once again in all their bloom of beauty, aided by the indelible charm of manner which education and the polish of refined society alone can give.

In meeting with Marcella, all former days and hours of happiness rushed to my imagination with renewed affection, when I found her, though improved in person, imposing in appearance, and more dignified in deportment, yet in manner to me still unchanged, rejoiced at the discovery, and that we breathed the same air once more. With a joyful heart I hastened to fulfil my promise to dine with her; so, having dressed myself, like a true patriot for the manufacture of my country, in the greenest of green tunic—the whitest of Lime-rick gloves—Balmbriggan stockings—Kerry kid shoes—a Londonderry lace tucker, fastened with three Irish diamonds, in the form of a shamrock—a Cork-made reticule, composed of cord, in which was a Belfast cambric pocket handkerchief, I was set down, precisely at four o'clock, at the mansion of Alfred Burgoyne, Esq. M.P., Merriem-square. This was a very early hour; few families dine till seven; but I hoped at least to have two hours' conversation with Marcella. She was dressing, so not choosing to encounter a host of strangers, who might arrive one after another, by waiting in the drawing-room, and as I saw one of the children peeping out of the study door, I preferred waiting there until Marcella descended. On entering, the governess, a middle-aged French lady, whom the servant addressed as Madame Ferrier, introduced her pupils severally—Gustavus—Adolphus—Reginald—Oliver—Sylvia—and Pauline—all called after renowned people in war, wit, or wisdom; the eldest ten years of age, the youngest boy, as he said, "going of theven;" the two younger girls passive little slaves to their brothers; and certainly no house could be dull with such a variety of noises, tones, and tempers. I had hardly been seated five minutes, when they broke through their shyness, and commenced a game at romps. Gustavus had transposed my swansdown boa into a bridle; Adolphus purloined my comb, while Reginald made a seizure of, and was exploring my reticule. In order to regain my stolen property, I began to remove the numerous books, dolls, toys, &c., with which their sisters had filled my lap, when the rebellious Master Oliver climbed on the back of my chair, and mounted himself on my shoulders; nor would he get down, until I had raced three times round the room with him. Madame scolded, I entreated, it was of no use, and as I had brought on the mischief by caressing them at first, I thought it best to comply to the delight of the urchin. I had nearly performed the third heat round the room, when the door opened, and a young cornet of dragoons entered. "Uncle, uncle!" all exclaimed. Bowing to me, he turned to Madame with this request,—"Permit me to make this a refuge for the destitute?" "Certainly," replied Madame, "but what is your distress?" "Why to tell you the truth, my sister is going to have some blue-stocking people here to dine, and as I hate blue belles, as intolerable blue-boreds in society, I cannot tolerate their presence. So with your leave, I will make this my head-quarters, until dinner is announced."

The children now deserted me for their uncle, and I began to wonder what literary ladies Marcella had invited to meet me, when herself and family were all I wished to see. I thought of all the lady lionesses of literature I could in Dublin—Lady Morgan, Lady Clarke, and many others; when Madame asked the martial man why he objected to them, and what reason he had to dislike learned women. "I do not like your pen and ink women," replied he. "This is some strange one my sister has caught, coming to-day. I have never seen her, but she will fancy what she will be like. I dare say she's a tall scarecrow of a Gorgon, with jet black hair, and ferocious black eyes, arrayed in rusty black velvet, preaching with the lungs of a Stentor in blank verse, and walking with a tragedy step—unmarried, save to the muses—I would not sit near her for the world; and," added he, with a wise shake of his empty head, "I would advise you, madame, to mind your p's and q's, or she will write you down."

I was a silent listener, and thought with Dogberry, what I could write him down:—"Shall quibs and sentences, and these paper bullets of the brain, awe a man from the career of his humour?" It would have been wasting words to talk to such a popinjay, for thus speaking of his sister's guests; yet I could not help saying, that I thought he had caricatured a clever woman. "Pon honour," said he, "they are all abominable horrors." He was still indulging in this absurdity, when Marcella entered the study. She welcomed me kindly, saying, "My dear Emily, why did you not come up to me?" And turning to her husband's brother, said, "Allow me to introduce my earliest friend, one whom you have heard me often speak of." The cornet bowed—stammered—coloured—hesitated—and seemed in a very awkward predicament. "What is the matter?" asked Mrs. Burgoyne. "Captain Burgoyne is afraid to meet your blue-stocking visitors," replied Madame. "A soldier, and afraid!" said Marcella. "Well, Emily," continued she, "now your laurels are complete; you have appalled the victor—for it is to you and your pen and ink amusement, which have been so long known to me, I allude—you are the blue-belle at whom by brother is so terrified; not that I think there is any thing very ferocious in your appearance." "Why, no," I observed, "though fond of my pen, I am not tall enough for a scarecrow of a Gorgon," have neither 'black eyes or hair,' nor wear 'rusty black velvet,' 'preach with the lungs of a Stentor in blank verse,' nor 'walk with a tragedy step.'" "For heaven's sake," cried the dragon, "spare me! and I will henceforth become a convert to rationality, provided you will forgive me, and allow me to lead you to dinner." This effected a change in his opinions, and no one could be more agreeable, now that his prejudices were removed.

Marcella, with all the pride of an affectionate wife, introduced me to her dear Alfred, one of nature's own noblemen—a scholar, and a gentleman, combining every qualification in mind and manner, to give true dignity to a very handsome person. He kindly received me; complimented me on my good taste in encouraging the manufacture of his unfortunate country in my suit of green; condemned all French fashions; and on the arrival of other friends, he joined the six little representatives of the house of Burgoyne, in the dance and song, until a late hour. Thus I had the happiness to see my earliest friend, Marcella, as happy as I ever wished her to be, and she as deserving of all the blessings she possessed.

ANTHONY'S SPEECH OVER CÆSAR.

(For the London Journal.)

APOLLO, having completed the business of the day, retired to rest, leaving his royal consort with her twinkling attendants, to "rule the night." At this time, all nature seemed as still and as silent as if she held in her breath, for fear of disturbing the sleep of her children. Every thing betokened tranquillity and repose,—and therefore, taking leave of care for a period, I gradually, and insensibly, fell into a state of unconsciousness;—little anticipating the Aeronautic Romance I was about to enjoy. Soon however, I experienced the most indescribable sensations,—for I felt as a new creature in a new world. My soul was suddenly seized by two gens d'armes belonging to good Queen Mab,—and thrust into a nutshell carriage, drawn by six most superbly caparisoned grasshoppers. Off I dashed through the heavens, with a velocity the winds might envy;—clouds sank beneath in fleecy clusters,—the terrestrial atmosphere looked from above, like a mantle of glass just flung around the green earth to keep her from cold,—planets, stars, and systems disappeared behind in rapid succession,—comets flitted and glimmered around like playthings in invisible hands,—and the milky-way appeared at a distance, like a mighty streamer of gauze unfurled to the boundless blue. By some incomprehensible apotheosis, the totality of existence, seemed to be personified, and vivified with the fire and brilliancy of poetry—breathing forth a grandeur, beauty and glory; soothing, thrilling, ravishing, and harrowing up the passions into such a pitch of intensity, that the soul,—but language fails me, for I was completely overwhelmed by a whirlwind rush of splendours, as the wheels of my chariot, and the hoofs of my tiny steeds, clattered on the emerald pavement of the grand empyrean itself!

My reader must now take a ride on his Pegasus over many weeks and months,—until at length, he can fancy my being introduced by Minerva into the sanctum sanctorum of the heathen mythology; where, after a thousand preliminaries and preparatives, I received from her hand three favorite instruments, by which I was invested with an omnipotence over the worlds of thought, and of feeling. "Mortals," said the goddess, "have no appropriate names for such articles,—so for want of better, let them be called the critical microscope, telescope, and kaleidoscope."

Enraptured with the boons so graciously conferred—I panted to bring them into immediate operation. Having the fullest confidence in their wondrous virtue, I scorned to apply them to an examination of mere mediocrity, and therefore resolved to begin, by levelling the instruments divine, at what the most competent judges have often pronounced to be the first and finest specimen of human eloquence—namely, "The Speech of Anthony over the dead body of Cæsar." This, I now found to be glowing and burning with a living glory, which I—though always a most devoted admirer of Shakspeare—had never before been able to appreciate: and I was hurried along into such an intensity of delight, by fresher and brighter discoveries of its excellence every successive moment, that at length I positively shrieked aloud, in something like an agony of ecstasy!

But alas! alas! as easily could the sun be plucked from the heavens, and transferred to the canvass—as could those beatific and spiritual disclosures be adequately represented upon paper. Yet, I would fain do my best to give my reader a shadowy outline, of what I then and there saw, and thought, and felt: premising, however, that I can describe only successively what took place simultaneously—and that my sluggish pen can only crawl tardily and circuitously, while the realities flashed full and at once upon my soul.

Allow me then to begin with the "microscopic" view of the inward workings of his mind, while the orator was addressing the assembled multitude. The object of Anthony was evidently to avenge the death of Cæsar, and to succeed him in his real though not nominal dominion over Rome: yet how that could be effected under the existing state of things, he felt to be a problem of the most exquisite complexity. He saw very clearly that the senate and the people were marshalled in direct opposition to his purposes, and that Brutus had obtained for himself almost universal respect and sympathy. Nothing therefore could be done before the most inveterate prejudices were eradicated, and the affections of the populace transferred to the opposite party. And hence the following play of thought and feeling which I observed in the spirit of Anthony as he slowly ascended the rostrum.

"Mankind are always envious of their superiors; they love those only between whom and themselves there is a community of sentiment and of interest. If therefore I assume an Egalité with the audience, I may secure a reciprocation of their friendship. This must act upon them in two ways; it will indicate an attractive humility, by shewing that in my own estimation, I am but as one of themselves, having no object distinct from theirs, and having no wish to be separated from them; and, secondly, it will raise them in their own opinion, and thereby most effectually flatter their vanity. Such is the avidity with which the human mind snatches at every thing grateful to its pride, that I am persuaded, my hearers will not be so ready to think, that Anthony is a much less important personage than they had supposed, as that Anthony's philanthropy has invested them with a new and most unexpected importance. I shall therefore at once intimate that we are all on a social equality; and as this better accords with their feelings, they are much more likely to believe each of themselves to be an Anthony, than that the great Anthony has sunk to a level with them. Thus shall I make them fancy they have power,—fire them with an ambition to exert that power in some way or other; and gradually insinuating myself into their confidence and esteem, I shall obtain a sovereign control over their passions." After this soliloquy Anthony stooped to conquer the mob by calling them "Friends!"

But the possession of their sympathies was intended merely as a preparatory measure. He did not aim at absolutely smothering their passions, but rather at blending their subserviency to some ulterior, but as yet, undiscovered purpose. Indeed, the more violent they might be, the better for him, provided they could be properly managed or directed. Accordingly, he thus reasoned within himself on the subject—"Having happily succeeded to insinuate myself insensibly into their goodwill, I must next endeavour to kindle their rage, without neutralizing the conciliatory influence of the former apostrophe; the demon of vengeance should uncoil himself in their souls, and thereby give augury that a tempest is brooding. Associations of war and of bloodshed must be excited, and their wrath must burn; but against whom it is to be directed they must not be able to guess, or else they will steel their hearts to conviction, and as an inevitable consequence, frustrate all my wishes. All this will be done by allusions to the martial deeds of their ancestors. Visions of national glory and bravery will flit before their eyes with a shadowy and yet impressive splendour, as soon as I invoke the mighty name under which they conquered the world. Strike that note, and all the furies of their nature will yell in responsive echo."—Anthony judged correctly; for violent convulsions shook the multitude, and frowns and scowls thickened on their angry countenances, as soon as he uttered the magic appellation, "Romans!"

This word, however, far overstretching the matter. It conveyed a great deal too much; as, in addition to the sanguinary desires it excited, it indirectly raised a tempest of associations that recoiled with tremendous violence on the memory of Cæsar. The very word "Romans," was pregnant with anathemas against kings and tyranny: the simple expression seemed to justify Brutus, in emulating the haughty patriotism of his ancestor, and to call upon the people to rally still more closely and thickly around his standard; yet it would be impolitic to discard it, as no other could so effectually fire their souls with the spirit of revenge. The only remedy, then, was to employ another term, which should in a measure contain the force of both the former, and at the same time cause them to lose their offensive qualities by merging them in greater vagueness or obscurity. A momentary confusion of their ideas would render them more manageable. Such an expedient would increase their confidence, and foment their rage, while it might allay, or at least turn aside, their aversion to that supremacy after which Cæsar but too evidently aspired. Here, however, our hero felt the greatest perplexity, as the reader may see from the following soliloquy:—"Having secured their sympathies by the word 'Friends,' it will be prudent to drop, as soon as possible, every idea of Egalité,—for after all they are to be my tools and not my companions. And having infuriated their passions by the other word, 'Romans,' it is necessary to draw off their attention from the fact of their being bound in honour and consistency, as Romans, to punish every infraction of the laws of the Republic, lest they should become incensed against me as a covert apologist of tyranny, and as a consequence tear me to pieces, and give thereby an additional triumph to the conspirators. Now, then, for a word which shall accomplish both these ends, and concentrate all their remaining feelings as into a focus: all may be done by calling them—'Patriots!'"

The Orator, having gone so far, thought it desirable, if possible, to bring his audience into a more immediate alliance with Cæsar and himself. The last term was of a somewhat exclusive character,—overlooking every thing that was common to them all; and therefore foregoing the benefits that might accrue from a contagion of sympathy. Under this conviction, he looked for a term which might supply the place of "Patriots," and super-add the advantage of referring to an intimate relation that subsisted between them, and thereby wreath their sympathies yet more closely around the memory of him whose death they were doomed speedily to avenge; and to his rapturous astonishment he found all he desired, embodied with a living fervid potency, in the comprehensive but expressive epithet, "Countrymen!" This heightened their regard for the speaker, screwed up their passions still more furiously against something (though as yet they scarcely knew against what), and identified them so completely with Cæsar and Anthony, that every heart forcibly received, and still more forcibly emitted, the deadly contagion of sympathy and vengeance. Now then the apostrophe was complete. The first word soothed them into the temper of lambs;—the second incensed them into tygers about to spring on their prey; and the third mastering their passions, held them by the leash, like rabid bloodhounds thirsting to tear to pieces the first object that might be presented to them!

Friends! Romans!! Countrymen!!! The microscope was now passed on to the following sentence, when it gave me this singularly complex view of Anthony's thoughts. "There is a principle in man, which revolts

* N.B.—It is particularly requested, that the reader will apply a similar process of criticism to the first sentence in Brutus's speech on the same occasion. Without this, it were impossible to appreciate the excellencies of either. His words, like his design, are almost the exact converse of Anthony's, "Romans, Countrymen, and Lovers!" We are not, of course, to suppose that Shakspeare reasoned thus about every word,—but nature, faithful nature, taught him all as by inspiration. It is said of Newton that he understood most of the theorems of Euclid by simply reading the enunciations, without any of the drudgery of demonstration:—so here, likewise, our poet could feel with the rapidity and force of intuition, what ought to be put in the mouths of his heroes, whatever might be their character or their circumstances.

from the idea of being a mere tool in the hands of another. Marks of study therefore are always detrimental to a speech, as they put the hearers on their guard, by seeming to betray a scheme for the subjugation of their minds: whereas in what they believe to be extemporaneous, they almost take for granted, that the speaker can have no aim, but what is expressed; and therefore, cheerfully follow his suggestions without any misgiving or suspicion. They are appalled by the thought of falling victims to a previously concerted plot; yet they willingly give up their independence when led to it insensibly. The appearance of design is often more afflicting than the disaster it effected; and even our horror of the brute force of the public robber is surpassed by our hatred of the deliberate intrigue and cold-blooded villainy of the more than doubly perjured assassin, who is designing our ruin, while calling us "Friends." It is necessary for me, therefore, as soon as possible, to use a sentence apparently incompatible with much preparation; its carelessness must be evident enough for all to feel it, and yet, it must be so delicate as not to offend the taste of even the most scrupulous. I must not, however, introduce it parenthetically, or else the object will be detected and frustrated;—but rather, the next sentence, whatever it may be, must be expressed so chastely as not to shock the audience,—and at the same time so clumsily as to persuade them that I speak spontaneously and not "advisedly."

Having thus determined on the style, he had next to ascertain what ought to be the matter of the forthcoming words. He knew it necessary as soon as he could, formally to arrest the attention of his hearers, for as yet, they did not seem anxious for much specification. So Anthony thus continued his soliloquy. "We are always more ready to grant, what is begged as a favour, than what is demanded as a right: the latter comes like a challenge to our pride, but the former, is an irresistible appeal to our sensibilities. Although therefore, justice gives me a claim to be heard, it is better in this case to ask it as mercy; for in denying the right their vanity might be gratified, but they cannot reject my prayer without doing positive violence to their own feelings. If however, I have recourse to the phraseology commonly employed on such occasions, they may regard it as a matter of course, and overlook the extraordinary earnestness and humility, with which I implore their attention. Consequently I must use an expression which shall be so new and strange as to strike their minds with a sense of its peculiarity; and then I doubt not they will cheerfully listen to me 'till my aim is accomplished.'"

But it was further necessary, as soon as possible, to insinuate something (but very indirectly) against Brutus, and begin very cautiously, gradually to incense the populace against him, before any one could be aware of it. For want of room I must omit a great part of Anthony's meditations on this point, and give merely the conclusion. * * * "In the next sentence I have to effect a triple purpose; I must lead the people to think that I speak extemporaneously.—I must so pander their passions as to secure a protracted attention; and I must aim an envenomed shaft against Brutus, that shall do its work noiselessly and imperceptibly. Hence therefore it must be clumsy, pointed and sarcastic: and all I trust may be done by the circutious, novel, and hesitating words, 'Lend me your ears.'"

Let the reader examine this sentence a little more deeply, and see how admirably it answered Anthony's "triple purpose." It most effectually does away with all marks of study, inasmuch as it is the very extreme of ambiguity, and a living caricature on all perspicuity! A wit might exclaim—"Does he mean to tell us, he has no ears of his own? Does he mean that we are wrong in supposing he is going to keep them for ever, as he is going to borrow them only for a short time? What can he do with our ears, unless we give him our minds and our hearts as well? If he takes our ears, how shall we be able to listen to his speech? &c. &c. &c." Indeed this sentence, being susceptible of so many ludicrous interpretations, is on the very verge of the absurd—and I hesitate not to say, that, but one man ever visited our globe, who could so filter a blunder, as to render it the very quintessence of eloquence and poetry!

It forcibly arrested attention by its singularity. A phrase so anomalous, appeared to be the effect of some very extraordinary cause; and that cause the people fondly ascribed to Anthony's deep and pervading consciousness, that he had no right or claim to be heard, by such persons as themselves. The words fell upon their hearts, like the humble and earnest entreaties of a child upon his father; and they felt proud and delighted, to respond with a father's tenderness and love!

And again, it embodied a strong insinuation that the audience were prejudiced against the speaker, and in favour of Brutus. He did not seem even to hope they would become his partisans, for he merely begged of them for a moment to "lend" him their ears. And above all, the phrase was the very antipodes of what would be expected from the bold and intrepid Anthony; it seemed to betray a want of confidence, or a lurking suspicion of something, and it was in every respect so very "unstraight-forward," as proved the speaker to be clogged and cramped by external circumstances. And they, whose passions had already begun to sway their judgment, would at once ascribe it to a dread of Brutus' influence, so they immediately gathered more closely around him, that they might hear every syllable of his words, and catch all the sympathy of his action. The dead silence of their movements, and the intenseness of their gaze upon Anthony, showed they found a satisfaction in yielding up to him all the feelings of their nature, and that their hearts were beginning to throb with a wish to defend him against the world!

The writer may be mistaken, but to the best of his belief, there is not, within the whole range of literature, ancient or modern, a solitary sentence, which exhibits a more profound acquaintance with human nature, or a more complete sovereignty over language. It is the focus of a thousand rays. But its mystic elements are so refined, its bearings so vast and numerous, and its point so exquisitely well edged, that I had never been able to see them till I looked through the critical microscope!

In this exordium, however, the idea of Anthony had been intimately associated with all the excited feelings. It was time, therefore, for him to glide out of the minds of the people, so as not to intrude upon or interfere with the working of their passions. This could be done only by presenting an object that would be attractive enough to transfer their sensibilities, and concentrate them all upon itself. The all-absorbing name of Cæsar would fully answer the purposes; utter that but once, and they will think no more of the orator.

The people had already begun to sympathise very intensely with Cæsar; but the object was to make them so to sympathise as that they might be impelled to avenge his death. Ordinary speakers would here probably expatiate on the amiableness or valour, &c., of their hero; but Anthony well knew that the most fervent admiration kindled by such a detail would be entirely desecrated from vengeance. Delightful themes tranquillize the mind, and the contemplation of the virtues of an individual yields a sweet and peaceful serenity. On the other hand, terrible themes impart their own character to the mind, and fill it with terrible feelings, or fit it for terrible resolutions. Nothing, therefore, could have been more impolitic in this instance, than to cajole the hearers into that mild and tender sorrow which would be satisfied with merely shedding a few tears. Hence, he boldly aimed at the deeper and darker elements of their souls, feeling assured that if these could be but once thoroughly agitated and roused, they would engross or sway all their thoughts and passions. The people, he knew, were not yet prepared for undisguised anathemas against Brutus, and, therefore, with a matchless adroitness, he ventures only casually and indirectly to allude to the catastrophe at the capital.

"I come to bury Cæsar," suggested most vividly all the circumstances connected with his death. Once more they saw the brandishing of swords—once more they heard et tu Brute?—once more they felt the sickening shudder which always accompanies the sight of bloodshed—and once more they saw all the murderers in full array before them, and their souls began to experience the direct throes of rancour and remorse.

"I come to bury Cæsar," opened to their minds a vista into a long, dark, and cheerless futurity. He who was once the idol of his country and the pride of their hearts, has been suddenly hurled from his joys and his glory, beyond the reach of their sympathy or praise. The flowers of a thousand springs might bloom, or the sunbeams of a thousand summers play o'er his grave, but all in vain: for to him, they could afford no delight; or a thousand tears might be shed, or a thousand songs be hymned, but all in vain; for they could never touch his heart, or awake a smile on his countenance. Cæsar was now to be no more; and as the only available means of testifying their gratitude, they determined to exterminate his murderers from the face of the earth.

"I come to bury Cæsar" threw a meretricious glow over the whole transaction. That principle in man, which leads him to magnify the excellencies of departed friends, gave a mournful sanctity to all the imaginary virtues once possessed by their hero. With a hallowed reverence, they enthroned him for ever in their hearts; their memories recalled all his stupendous victories, with all the brilliancy and splendour of his "triumphs," and their heated imaginations working on their patriotism, affrighted them with the belief that all was now lost, and lost for ever; as Cæsar, whose prowess alone could maintain the sovereignty of Rome over the world, was now more powerless than any of themselves. Hence, there took place a tremendous reaction in all their sensibilities and sympathies: recoiling from Brutus, they wreathed around his victim, and decked it with countless irresistible attractions. Immediately, therefore, the people felt as if they were children of Cæsar, bound by all that was sacred, to avenge his untimely death.

"I come to bury Cæsar" struck a chord which vibrated through every heart. It is not in man, to rail at the dead. The bitterest enemy relents on the grave of his foe; and the most cold-blooded duellist weeps over the victim of his malice, when he sees him bleeding at his feet: he then grieves for the loss of an abused friend; but still more does he grieve, that he should ever have hated and abused him; and as the only possible reparation for his savage ferocity, he vows to reverence his memory, and perhaps to avenge his death. The same principle operated in this intimidated mob—they raged against themselves for having at first felt any exultation over the death of Cæsar—and fancied that by vengeance alone, could they make a satisfactory atonement.

"I come to bury Cæsar" fell on the audience with the force of a thunderbolt, and scared their inmost souls with the thought, that by the hands of assassins, the brave, the polished, and the brilliant conqueror and orator, was no more than mangled clay:—a mere wreck of his former glorious "self." A damp and hateful and horrifying chill ran through them all—and they felt as if their souls had been suddenly drenched in human blood—and glutted with gore—were even now absolutely reeking from its hideous pollution! The irritated multitude became restless, moving to and fro, from side to side, in dark and massy undulations,—like the ocean gradually lashed into fury by the storm:—while their every effort to stifle their rising rage, tended only to give it a gloomier hue and a more deadly intensity.

"I come to bury Cæsar,"—as soon as the doleful words were uttered, all the conspirators who were present involuntarily howled in chorus, long and dismal groans, "not loud" perhaps, "but deep." Anthony sobbed aloud—while the glance of his eye turned the attention of the people, to the dead body of Cæsar, as it lay beneath, all bloody and torn. A wild and savage yell from the angry mob, immediately announced the brooding of the storm—the nearness of its approach and the dreadful havoc and desolation it was about to make. Under this deep gathering darkness, were let loose all the elements of destruction: every heart was maddened into a boiling vortex—and the fellest, foulest, fiercest purposes, rioted in every wish, and revelled with rabid ecstasy, in every feeling of their nature!

Having so far excited their passions, Anthony could now venture on a bolder allusion to Cæsar. But even here he durst not do so directly, for the people were still in principle as much opposed to him as ever; so that it was only by subduing or seducing their feelings, they could be enlisted in his cause. Already however, they mourned the loss of Cæsar;—and their grief would be immeasurably heightened by painting his excellencies to their minds. But the difficulty was, to execute a proper portraiture:—a detail of his many recommendations would have been tedious and useless; and a specification of any particular virtue would have been ineffectual—as it might be contradicted. Hence the irresistible force of "not to praise him." The words were so vague and mysterious as to admit of no contradiction, and yet so explicit and vivid, as to make themselves felt. The character of Cæsar was thus seen as through a prism, too shadowy to be defined, and yet too beautiful and bright, not to be attractive to every beholder.

"Not to praise him" intimated that he might have expatiated on his virtues and glories, for they were many and great;—and their own excited imaginations would abundantly fill up the unfinished draught, and give it the deepest colouring.

"Not to praise him" assumed his virtues too well known to need a catalogue, and too universally confessed to require proof. His character appeared too plain for ornament, and too grand for illustration; thus equally by its humility and its majesty, leaving at a distance the most eloquent eulogium. The hearers became enamoured with the picture Anthony's skill had led them to form to themselves, and therefore stopped not to examine its fidelity. A meteor, as it were, flashed before their eyes, with such intensity, that they thought of nothing but its brilliancy and premature evanishment.

"Not to praise him"—intimated that the situation of the speaker was extremely perilous (and by a contagion of sympathy the hearers would fancy the same of themselves), inasmuch as he durst not give full expression to his feelings, lest Brutus should hurl him to destruction. The people therefore were delighted with the apparent fearless magnanimity, which, in such circumstances, could say any thing at all in favour of Cæsar, and their passions would violently rebound into a paroxysm of agony and of rage against his opponents.

"Not to praise him"—above all, this might lead the hearers to suppose, that he forbore, from a dignified compassion for Brutus; and that from a contemptuous pity, he refrained from all such expressions as might impel them to vengeance. This gave them a higher confidence in the rectitude of his motives, and the leniency of his purposes; so that in listening to the words, they would exclaim of Anthony, "half his strength he put not forth, but checked it in mid volley." All this "infixed plagues into their souls," and plunged them into such an intensity and agony of fury that blood—blood—blood alone would assuage it; but who was to be the victim, the subsequent sentences was to decide. Every principle of their nature became as a separate burning centre of emanation of hatred and of scorn—every passion became as a fatal blast, scorching and withering all around,—and every individual hearer became a living focus of all that was terrible and destructive!

But I see, from my reader's gaping and yawning, that my story has already doubled the length of his patience. For the present therefore, I drop the curtain on the telescopic analysis of the speech, and forbear to inflict any description of its appearance in perspective, as seen through the kaleidoscope,—reserving those glories for such as have thoroughly understood and felt this first scene in the Aeronautic Romance.

MAGIC AND MAGICIANS.

(From an interesting article in the sixth and last volume (just published) of Mr. D'Issraeli's Curiosities of Literature.)

WHAT a subject, were I to enter on it, would be the narratives of magical writers! These precious volumes have been so constantly wasted by the profane, that now a book of real magic requires some to find it, as well as a magician to use it. Albertus Magnus, or Albert the Great, as he is erroneously styled—for this sage only derived his enviable epithet from his name De Groot, as did Hugo Grotius—this sage, in his "Admirable Secrets," delivers his opinion that these books of magic should be most preciously preserved; for, he prophetically added, the time is arriving when they would be understood! It seems that they were not intelligible in the thirteenth century; but, if Albertus has not miscalculated, in the present day they may be! Magical terms with talismanic figures may yet conceal many a secret; gunpowder came down to us in a sort of anagram, and the kaleidoscope with its interminable multiplications of forms, lay at hand for two centuries in Baptista Porta's "Natural Magic." The abbot Trithemius, in a confidential letter, happened to call himself a magician, perhaps at the moment he thought himself one, and sent three or four leaves stuffed with the names of devils, and with their evocations. At the death of his friend, these leaves fell into the unworthy hands of the prior, who was so frightened on the first glance at the diabolical nomenclature, that he raised the country against the abbot, and Trithemius was nearly a lost man. Yet, after all, this evocation of devils has reached us in his "Steganographia," and proves to be only one of this ingenious abbot's polygraphic attempts at secret writing; for he had flattered himself that he had invented a mode of concealing his thoughts from all the world, while he communicated them to a friend. Roger Bacon promised to raise thunder and lightning, and disperse clouds by dissolving them into rain. The first magical process has been obtained by Franklin; and the other, of far more use to our agriculturists, may perchance be found lurking in some corner which has been overlooked in the "Opus Magnus" of our "Doctor Mirabilis." Do we laugh at their magical works of art? Are we ourselves such indifferent artists? Cornelius Agrippa, before he wrote his "Vanity of the Arts and Sciences," intended to reduce into a method and system the secret of communicating with spirits and demons. On good authority, that of Porphyry, Psellus, Plotinus, Jamblicus—and on better, were it necessary to alledge it—he was well assured that the upper regions of the air swarmed with what the Greeks called dæmones, just as our lower atmosphere is full of birds, our waters of fish, and our earth of insects. Yet this occult philosopher, who knew perfectly eight languages, and married two wives, with whom he had never exchanged a harsh word in any of them, was every where avoided as having by his side, for his companion, a personage no less than a demon. This was a great black dog whom he suffered to stretch himself out among his magical manuscripts, or lie on his bed, often kissing and patting him, and feeding him on choice morsels. Yet for this would Paulus Jovius and all the world have had him put to the ordeal of fire and faggot! The truth was afterwards boldly asserted by Wierus, his learned domestic, who believed that his master's dog was really nothing more than he appeared! "I believe," says he, "that he was a real natural dog; he was indeed black, but of a moderate size, and I have often led him by a string, and called him by the French name Agrippa had given him, Monsieur! and he had a female who was called Mademoiselle! I would ask how authors of such great characters should write so absurdly on his vanishing at his death, nobody knows how!" But, as it is probable that Monsieur and Mademoiselle must have generated some puppy demons, Wierus ought to have been more circumstantial.

Albertus Magnus, for thirty years, had never ceased working at a man of brass, and had cast together the qualities of his material under certain constellations, which threw such a spirit upon his man of brass, that it was reported his growth was visible; his feet, legs, thighs, shoulders, neck, and head expanded, and made the city of Cologne uneasy at possessing one citizen too mighty for them all. This man of brass, when he reached his maturity, was so loquacious, that Albert's master, the great scholastic Thomas Aquinas, one day, tired of his babble, and declaring it was a devil, or devilish, with his staff knocked his head off; and, what was extraordinary, this brazen man, like any human being thus effectually silenced, "word never spake more." This incident is equally historical and authentic; though whether heads of brass can speak, and even prophecy, was indeed a subject of profound enquiry, even at a later period. Naudé, who never questioned their vocal powers, and yet was puzzled concerning the nature of this new species of animal, has, no doubt, most judiciously stated the question, whether these speaking brazen heads had a sensitive and reasoning nature, or whether demons spoke in them? But brass has not the faculty of providing its own nourishment, as we see in plants, and therefore they were not sensitive; and, as for the act of reasoning, these brazen heads presumed to know nothing but the future; with the past and the present they seem totally unacquainted, so that their memory and their observation were very limited; and as for the future, that is always doubtful, and obscure even to heads of brass! This learned man then infers, that "These brazen heads could have no reasoning faculties, for nothing altered their nature; they said what they had to say, which no one could contradict; and having said their say, you might have broken their heads for anything more that you could have got out of them. Had they had any life in them, would they not have moved as well as spoken? Life itself is but motion, but they had no lungs, no spleen; and, in fact, though they spoke, they had no tongue. Was a devil in them? I think not. Yet why should men have taken all this trouble to make, not a man, but a trumpet?"

Our profound philosopher was right not to agitate the question, whether these brazen heads had ever spoken? Why should not a man of brass speak, since a doll can whisper, and a statue play chess? Another magical invention has been ridiculed with equal reason. A magician was annoyed, as philosophers still are, by passers in the street; and he, particularly so, by having horses led to drink under his window. He made a magical horse of wood, according to one of the books of Hermes, which perfectly answered its purpose by frightening away the horses, or rather the grooms! the wooden horse, no doubt, gave some palpable kick.

The works of the ancient alchemists have afforded numberless discoveries to modern chymists; nor is even their grand operation despaired of. If they have of late not been so renowned, this has arisen from a want of what Ashmole calls "apertness," a qualification early inculcated among these illuminated sages. We find authenticated accounts of some who have lived three centuries, with tolerable complexions, possessed of nothing but a crucible and a bellows! but they were so unnecessarily mysterious, that whenever such a person was discovered, he was sure in an instant to disappear and was never afterwards heard of.

In the "Liber Patris Sapientie" this selfish cautiousness is all along impressed on the student, for the accomplishment of the great mystery. In the commentary on this precious work by the alchemist Norton, who counsels,

"Be thou in a place secret, by thyself alone,
That no man see or hear what thou shalt say or done.
Trust not thy friend too much wheresoe'er thou go,
For he thou trustest best sometime may be thy foe;"

Ashmole observes, that "Norton gives exceeding good advice to the student in this science where he bids him be secret in the carrying on of his studies and operations, and not let any one know of his undertakings but his good angel and himself: and such a close and retired breast had Norton's master, who,

"When men disputed of colours of the rose,
He would not speak, but kept himself full close!"

We regret that by each leaving all his knowledge to his "good angel and himself," it has happened that the "good angels" have kept it all to themselves.

It cannot, however, be denied, that if they could not always extract gold out of lead, they sometimes succeeded in washing away the pimples on ladies' faces, notwithstanding that Sir Kenelm Digby poisoned his most beautiful lady, because, as Sancho would have said, he was one of those who would "have his bread whiter than the whitest wheaten." Van Helmont, who could not succeed in discovering the true elixir of life, however, hit on the spirit of hartshorn, which, for a good while, he considered was the wonderful elixir itself, restoring to life persons who seemed to have lost it. And though this delightful enthusiast could not raise a ghost, yet he thought he had; for he raised something aerial from Spa water, which, mistaking for a ghost, he gave it that very name; a name which we still retain in gas, from the German geist, or ghost. Paracelsus carried the tinea spirit about him in the hilt of his great sword! Having first discovered the qualities of laudanum, this illustrious quack made use of it as an universal remedy; and distributed it in the form of pills, which he carried in the basket-hilt of his sword; the operations he performed were as rapid as they seemed magical. Doubtless we have lost some inconceivable secrets by some unexpected occurrences, which the secret itself, it would seem, ought to have prevented taking place. When the philosopher had discovered the art of prolonging life to an indefinite period, it is most provoking to find that he should have allowed himself to die at an early age! We have a very authentic history from Sir Kenelm Digby himself, that when he went in disguise to visit Descartes at his retirement at Egmond, lamenting the brevity of life which hindered philosophers getting on in their studies, the French philosopher assured him that "he had considered that matter; to render a man immortal was what he could not promise, but that he was very sure it was possible to lengthen out his life to the period of the patriarchs." And when his death was announced to the world, the Abbé Picot, an ardent disciple, for a long time would not believe it possible, and at length insisted, that if it had occurred, it must be owing to some mistake of the philosopher.

The late Holcroft, Louthborough and Cosway, imagined that they should escape the vulgar era of Christian life by re-organising their old bones, and moistening their dry marrow; their new principles of vitality were supposed by them to be found in the powers of the mind; this seemed more reasonable, but proved to be as little efficacious as those of other philosophers who imagine they have detected the hidden principle of life in the eels frisking in vinegar, and allude to "the bookbinder, who creates the bookworm!"

Paracelsus has revealed to us one of the grandest secrets of nature. When the world began to dispute on the very existence of the elementary folk, it was then that he boldly offered to give birth to a fairy, and has sent down to posterity a recipe. He describes the impurity which is to be transmuted into such purity, the gross elements of a delicate fairy, which, fixed in a phial, placed in fuming dung, will in due time settle into a full grown fairy, bursting through its vitreous prison, on the vivifying principle on which the ancient Egyptians hatched their eggs in ovens. I recollect at Dr. Farmer's sale, the leaf which preserved this recipe for making a fairy, forebly folded down by the learned commentator; from which we must infer the credit he gave to the experiment. There was a greatness of mind in Paracelsus, who, having furnished a recipe to make a fairy, had the delicacy to refrain from its formation. Even Baptista Porta, one of the most enlightened philosophers, does not deny the possibility of producing creatures, which "at their full growth shall not exceed the size of a mouse;" but he adds, "they are only pretty little dogs to play with." Were these akin to the fairies of Paracelsus?

They were well convinced of the existence of such elemental beings; frequent accidents in mines showed the potency of the metallic spirits; which so tormented the workmen in some of the German mines, by blindness, giddiness, and sudden sickness, that they have been obliged to abandon mines well known to have been rich in silver. A metallic spirit, at one sweep, annihilated twelve miners, who were all found dead together. The fact was unquestionable; and the safety lamp was undiscovered.

Never was a philosophical imagination more beautiful than that exquisite Palingenesis, as it has been termed from the Greek, or regeneration; or rather, the apparitions of animals and plants. Schott, Kircher, Gaffarel, Borelli, Digby, and the whole of that admirable school, discovered in the ashes of plants their primitive forms, which were again raised up by the force of heat. Nothing they say perishes in nature; all is but a continuation, or revival. The seeds of resurrection are concealed in extinct bodies, as in the blood of man: the ashes of roses will again revive into roses, though smaller and paler than if they had been planted unsubstantial, and unodoriferous, they are not roses which grew on rose trees, but their delicate apparitions; and, like apparitions, they are seen but for a moment. The process of the Palingenesis, this picture of immortality, is described. These philosophers, having burned a flower, by calcination disengaged the salts from its ashes, and deposited them in a glass phial: a chemical mixture acted on it, till in the fermentation they assumed a bluish and spectral hue. This dust, thus excited by heat, shoots upwards into primitive forms; by sympathy the parts unite, and while each is returning to its destined place, we see distinctly the stalk, the leaves and the flower arise; it is the pale spectre of a flower coming slowly forth from its ashes. The heat passes away, the magical scene declines, till the whole matter again precipitates itself into the chaos at the bottom. This vegetable phoenix lies thus concealed in its cold ashes, till the presence of heat produces this resurrection; in its absence it returns to its death. Thus the dead naturally revive; and a corpse may give out its shadowy re-animation when not too deeply buried in the earth. Bodies corrupted in their graves have risen, particularly the murdered; for murderers are apt to bury their victims in a slight and hasty manner. Their salts, exhaled in vapour by means of their fermentation, have arranged themselves on the surface of the earth, and have formed those phantoms, which at night have often terrified the passing spectator, as authentic history witnesses. They have opened the graves of the phantom and discovered the bleeding corpse beneath; hence it is astonishing how many ghosts may be seen at night, after a recent battle, standing over their corpses! On the same principle, my old philosopher Gaffarel conjectures on the raining of frogs; but these frogs, we must conceive, can only be the ghosts of frogs; and Gaffarel himself has modestly opened this fact by a "peradventure." A more satisfactory origin of ghosts modern philosophy has not afforded.

And who does not believe in the existence of ghosts? for as Dr. More forcibly says, "That there should be so universal a fame and fear of that which never was nor is, nor can ever be in the world, is to me the greatest miracle in the world. If there had not been, at some time or other, true miracles, it had not been so easy to impose on the public by false. The alchemist would never go about to sophisticate metals to pass them off for true gold and silver, unless that such a thing was acknowledged as true gold and silver in the world."

The pharmacopoeia of those times combined more of morals with medicine than our own. They discovered that the agate rendered a man eloquent and even witty; a laurel leaf placed on the centre of the skull, fortified the memory; the brains of fowls, and birds of swift wing, wonderfully helped the imagination. All such specifics have now disappeared, and have greatly reduced the chances of an invalid recovering that which perhaps he never possessed. Lentils and rape-seed were a certain cure for the small-pox, and very obviously, their grains resembling the spots of this disease. They discovered that those who lived on "fair" plants became fair, those on fruitful ones were never barren; on the principle that Hercules acquired his mighty strength by feeding on the marrow of lions. But their talismans, provided they were genuine, seem to have been wonderfully operative; and had we the same confidence, and melted down the guineas we give physicians, engraving on them talismanic figures, I would answer for the good effects of the experiment. Naudé, indeed, has utterly ridiculed the occult virtues of talismans, in his defence of Virgil, accused of being a magician: the poet, it seems, cast into a well a talisman of a horse-leech, graven on a plate of gold, to drive away the great number of horseleeches which infested Naples. Naudé positively denies that talismans possessed any such occult virtues. Gaffarel regrets that so judicious a man as Naudé should have gone this length, giving the lie to so many authentic authors; and Naudé's paradox is, indeed, as strange as his denial; he suspects the thing is not true, because it is so generally told! "It leads one to suspect," says he, "as animals are said to have been driven away from so many places by these talismans, whether they were ever driven from any place." Gaffarel, suppressing by his good temper his indignant feelings at such reasoning, turns the paradox on its maker:—"As if, because of the great number of battles which Hannibal is reported to have fought with the Romans, we might not, by the same reason, doubt whether he fought any one with them." The reader must be aware that the strength of the argument lies with the firm believer in talismans. Gaffarel, indeed, who passed his days in collecting "Curiosities inouïes," is a most authentic historian of unparalleled events, even his own times! Such as that heavy rain in Poitou, which showered down "petites bestioles," little creatures like bishops with their mitres, and monks with their capuchins over their heads; it is true, afterwards they all turned into butterflies.

The museums, the cabinets, and the inventions of our early virtuosos were the baby-houses of philosophers. Baptista Porta, Bishop Wilkins, and old Ashmole, were they now living, had been enrolled among the quiet members of the "Society of Arts," instead of flying in the air, collecting "A wing of the phoenix, as tradition goes;" or catching the disjointed syllables of an old dotting astrologer. But those early dilettanti had not derived the same pleasure from the useful inventions of the aforesaid "Society of Arts," as they received from what Cornelius Agrippa, in a fit of spleen, calls "things vain and superfluous, invented for no other end but for pomp and idle pleasure." Baptista Porta was more skilful in the mysteries of art and nature than any man in his day. Having founded the Academy de gli Oziosi, he held an inferior association in his own house, called di Secreti, where none was admitted but those elect who had communicated some secret; for in the early period of modern art and science, the slightest novelty became a secret, not to be confided to the uninitiated. Porta was unquestionably a fine genius, as his works still shew; but it was a misfortune that he attributed his own penetrating sagacity to his skill in the art of divination. He considered himself a prognosticator; and what was more unfortunate, some eminent persons really thought he was. Predictions and secrets are harmless, provided they are not believed; but his holiness finding Porta's were, warned him that magical sciences were great hindrances to the study of the bible, and paid him the compliment to forbid his prophesying. Porta's genius was now limited to astonish, and sometimes to terrify, the more ingenious part of I Secreti. On entering his cabinet, some phantom of an attendant was sure to be hovering in the air, moving as he who entered moved; or he observed in some mirror that his face was twisted and on the wrong side of his shoulders, and did not quite think that all was right when he clapped his hand on it; or passing through a darkened apartment, a magical landscape burst on him with human beings in motion, the boughs of trees bending, and the very clouds passing over the sun; or, sometimes banquettes, battles, and hunting-parties in the same apartment. "All these spectacles my friends have witnessed!" exclaims the self-delighted Baptista Porta. When his friends drank wine out of the same cup which he had used, they were mortified with wonder: for he drank wine, and they only water! or, on a summer's day, when all complained of the sirocco, he would freeze his guests with cold air in the room; or, on a sudden, let off a flying dragon to sail along with a cracker in its tail, and a cat tied on its back; shrill was the sound, and awful was the concussion; so that it required strong nerves in an age of apparitions and devils, to meet this great philosopher when in his best humour. Albertus Magnus entertained the Earl of Holland, as that earl passed through Cologne, in a severe winter, with a warm summer-scene, luxuriant in fruits and flowers. The fact is related by Trithemius—and this magical scene connected with his vocal head, and his books de Secretis Mulierum, and de Mirabilibus, confirmed the accusations they raised against the great Albert, for being a magician. His apologist, Theophilus Raynaud, is driven so hard to defend Albertus, that he at once asserts, that the winter changed to summer, and the speaking head to be two infamous flames! He will not believe these authenticated facts, although he credits a miracle which proves the sanctity of Albertus;—after three centuries, the body of Albert the Great remained as sweet as ever.

"Whether such enchantments," as old Mandeville cautiously observeth, two centuries preceding the days of Porta, were "by craft or by nygromancy, I wot nere." But that they were not unknown to Chaucer appears in his "Franklin's Tale," where, minutely describing them, he communicates the same pleasure he must himself have received from the ocular illusions of "the Tregetours," or "Jogelours." Chaucer ascribes the miracle to "a naturall magique;" in which, however, it was as unsettled, whether the "Prince of Darkness" was a party concerned.

"For I am siker that there be sciences
By which men maken divers apperences
Swiche as thire subtil tregetours play.
For oft at festes have I well herd say

That tregetours, within an halle large,
Have made come in a water and a barge,
And in the halle rowen up and doun:
Sometime hath seemed come a grim leoun,
And sometime flowies spring as in a mede,
Sometime a vine and grapes white and rede;
Sometime a castel al of lime and stone,
And whan hem liketh voideth it anon:
Thus seemeth it to every mannes sight."

Bishop Wilkins's Museum was visited by Evelyn, who describes the sort of curiosities which occupied and amused the children of Science. "Here, too, there was a hollow statue, which gave a voice, and uttered words by a long concealed pipe that went to its mouth, whilst one speaks through it at a good distance:" a circumstance which, perhaps they were not then aware, revealed the whole mystery of the ancient oracles, which they attributed to demons, rather than to tubes, pulleys and wheels. The learned Charles Patin, in his scientific travels, records, among other valuable productions of art, a cherry-stone, on which were engraven about a dozen and a half of portraits! Even the greatest of human geniuses, Leonardo da Vinci, to attract the royal patronage, created a lion which ran before the French monarch, dropping flours de lis from his shaggy breast. And another philosopher who had a spinet which played and stopped at command, might have made a revolution in the arts and sciences, had the half-stifled child that was concealed in it not been forced, unluckily, to crawl into daylight, and thus it was proved that a philosopher might be an impostor!

The arts, as well as the sciences, at the first institution of the Royal Society, were of the most amusing class. The famous Sir Samuel Moreland had turned his house into an enchanted palace. Every thing was full of devices, which shewed art and mechanism in perfection; his coach carried a travelling kitchen; for it had a fireplace and grate, with which he could make a soup, broil cutlets, and roast an egg; and he dressed his meat by clockwork. Another of these virtuosos, who is described, as "a gentleman of superior order, and whose house was a knickknackatory," valued himself on his multifarious inventions, but most in "sowing salads in the morning, to be eat for dinner." The house of Winstanley, who afterwards raised the first Eddystone light-house, must have been the wonder of the age. If you kicked aside an old slipper, purposely lying in your way, up started a ghost before you; or if you sat down in a chair, a couple of gigantic arms would immediately clasp you in. There was an arbour in the garden by the side of a canal; you had scarcely seated yourself when you were sent out afloat to the middle of the canal—from whence you could not escape till this man of art and science wound you up to the harbour. What was passing at the Royal Society, was also occurring at the "Academie des Sciences" at Paris. A great and gouty member of that philosophical body, on the departure of a stranger would point to his legs, to shew the impossibility of conducting him to the door; yet the astonished visitor never failed to find the virtuoso waiting for him on the outside, to make his final bow! While the visitor was going down stairs this inventive genius was descending with great velocity in a machine from the window; so that he proved, that if a man of science, cannot force nature to walk down stairs, he may drive her out at the window!

If they travelled at home, they set off to note down prodigies. Dr. Plott, in a magnificent project of a journey through England for the advantage of "Learning and Trade," and the discovery of "Antiquities and other Curiosities," for which he solicited the royal aid which Leland enjoyed, among other notable designs, discriminates a class thus: "Next I shall enquire of animals; and first of strange people."—"Strange accidents that attended corporations and families, as that the deans of Rochester ever since the foundation by turns have died deans and bishops; the bird with a white breast that haunts the family of Oxenham near Exeter, just before the death of any of that family; the bodies of trees that are seen to swim in a pool near Brereton in Cheshire, a certain warning to the heir of that honourable family to prepare for the next world." And such remarkable as "Number of children, such as the Lady Temple, who before she died saw seven hundred descended from her." This fellow of the Royal Society, who lived nearly to 1700, was requested to give an addition of Pliny: we have lost the benefit of a most copious commentary! Bishop Hall went to the "Spa." The wood about that place was haunted not only by "freebooters, but by wolves and witches; although these last are oftentimes but one." They were called lous garoux; and the Greeks, it seems, knew them by the name of λυκαθροποι, men wolves, witches that have put on the shapes of those cruel beasts. "We sawe a boy there, whose half-face was devoured by one of them near the village; yet so, as that the eare was rather cut than bitten off." Rumour had spread that the boy had had half his face devoured; when it was examined, it turned out that his ear had only been scratched! However, there can be no doubt of the existence of witch-wolves; for Hall saw at Limburgh "one of those miscreants executed, who confessed on the wheel to have devoured two and forty children in that form." They would probably have found it difficult to have summoned the mothers who had lost the children. But observe our philosopher's reasoning: "It would make a large volume to scan this problem of lycanthropy." He had laboriously collected all the evidence, and had added his arguments: the result offers a curious instance of acute reasoning on a wrong principle.*

Men of science and art then passed their days in a bustle of the marvellous. I will finish with a specimen of philosophical correspondence in a letter to old John Aubrey. The writer betrays the versatility of his curiosity by very opposite discoveries. "My hands are so full of work that I have no time to transcribe for Dr. Henry More an account of the Barnstable apparition—Lord Keeper North would take it kindly of you—give a sight of this letter from Barnstable to Dr. Witchcot." He had lately heard of a Scotchman who had been carried by fairies into France; but the purpose of his present letters is to communicate other sort of apparitions than the ghost of Barnstable. He had gone to Gastonbury, "to pick up a few berries from the holy thorn which flowered every Christmas-day." The original thorn had been cut down by a military saint in the civil wars but the trade of the place was not damaged, for they had contrived not to have a single holy thorn, but several "by grafting and inoculation." He promises to send these berries, but requests Aubrey to inform "that person of quality who had rather have a bush, that it was impossible to get one for him. I am told," he adds, "that there is a person about Gastonbury who hath a nursery of them, which he sells for a crown a piece, but they are supposed not to be of the right kind."

The main object of this letter is the writer's "suspicion of gold in this country;" for which he offers three reasons. Tacitus says there was gold in England, and that Agrippa came to a spot where he had a prospect of Ireland—from which place he writes; secondly, that "an honest man had in this spot found stones from which he had extracted good gold; and that he himself had seen in the broken stones a clear appearance of gold;" and thirdly, "there is a story which goes by tradition in that part of the country, that in the hill alluded to there was a door into a hole, that when any wanted money they used to go and knock there, that a woman used to appear, and give to such as came. At a time one by greediness or otherwise gave her offence, she flung to the door, and delivered this old saying, still remembered in the country—

'When all the Daws be gone and dead,
Then—— Hill shall shine gold red.'

My fancy is that this relates to an ancient family of this name, of which there is now but one left, and he not likely to have any issue." These are his three reasons; and some mines have been perhaps opened with no better ones! But let us not imagine that this great naturalist was credulous; for he tells Aubrey that "he thought it was but a monkish tale, forged in the abbey, so famous in former time; but as I have learned not to despise our forefathers, I question whether this may not refer to some rich mine in the hill, formerly in use, and now lost. I shall shortly request you to discourse with my lord about it to have advice, &c. In the mean time, it will be best to keep all private for his Majesty's service, his lordship's, and perhaps some private person's benefit." But he has also positive evidence: "A mason, not long ago, coming to the renter of the abbey for a freestone, and sawing it, out came divers pieces of gold, of 3*l*. 10*s*. value, of ancient coins. The stone belonged to some chimney-work; the gold was hidden in it, perhaps, when the Dissolution was near." This last incident of finding coins in a chimney-piece, which he had accounted for very rationally, serves only to confirm his dream, that they were coined out of the gold of the mine of the hill; and he becomes more urgent for a private search into these mines, which "I have, I think, a way to." In the Postscript he adds an account of a well, which, by washing, wrought a cure on a person deep in the king's evil. "I hope you don't forget your promise to communicate whatever thing you have, relating to your Idea."

This promised idea of Aubrey may be found in his MSS., under the title of "The Idea of Universal Education." However whimsical, one would like to see it. Aubrey's life might furnish a volume of these philosophical dreams; he was a person who, from his incessant bustle and insatiable curiosity, was called "The Carrier of Conceptions of the Royal Society." Many pleasant nights were "privately" enjoyed by Aubrey and his correspondent about the "Mine in the Hill;" Ashmole's MSS. at Oxford, contain a collection of many secrets of the Rosicrucians; one of the completest invention is "a Recipe how to walk invisible." Such were the fancies which rocked the children of science in their cradles! and so feeble were the steps of our curious infancy!—But I start in my dreams! dreading the reader may also have fallen asleep!

* Hall's postulate is, that God's work could not admit of any substantial change, which is above the reach of all infernal powers; but "Herein the devil plays the double sophister; the sorcerer with sorcerers. He both deludes the witch's conceit and the beholder's eyes." In a word, Hall believes in what he cannot understand. Yet Hall will not believe in one of the Catholic miracles of the "Virgia of Louvain," though Lipsius had written a book to commemorate "the goddess," as Hall sarcastically calls her; Hall was told with great indignation in the shop of the bookseller of Lipsius, that when James the First had looked over this work, he flung it down, vociferating "Damnation to him that made it, and to him that believes it."

DAY AND NIGHT.

(For the London Journal.)

Lightness and veiled Darkness, sisters twain,
 Hold momentary converse morn and eve :
 Lightness attended by her gorgeous train
 Of sunbeams, and that single star, whose reign Lasts longest in the sky. The Pleiads grieve
 Around the grace of Night; Orion mourns,
 And dim Arcturus pours his flowing urns.
 The comet's lurid homage decks her brow !
 Upon the mountain heights the sisters meet,
 When glistening pearl-dews cool their glowing feet.
 They part—where venturous vessels never plough
 Old Ocean's utmost waves.—'Tis very sweet
 To conjure up their greetings, voiceless given—
 Farewells, and welcomes, blush'd across the heaven !

TIMELY INTERCESSION.

Two instances are recorded in which an effectual appeal was made, in one case to the fears, and in another to the religious prejudices of conquerors, who in no other passage of their lives, have shewn any propensity to tender feeling or common humanity. Yet on these occasions their extravagant fury was arrested, by the cool expostulation, admirable presence of mind, and well-timed dexterity of individuals, neither exalted by rank, nor eminent for intellectual abilities; individuals whom, in any other point of view, they would have crushed as worms beneath their feet. The first was soon after the conquest of China by Zingis, who, enraged by some real or imaginary opposition to his ferocious despotism, issued an order for exterminating, by an indiscriminate massacre, the whole of the miserable natives, men, women, and children. The murder of millions was already on the threshold of preparation, when Yelutchou-say, an honest and intrepid Mandarin, who possessed what honest men frequently despise, and do not always exert, the valuable faculty of adapting himself to the expediency, the circumstances, and the necessities of the times in which he lived, without forfeiting his integrity, rushed into the presence of the haughty Khan.

Having acted as his interpreter, and being a favourite, in an erect attitude and elevated voice, he thus addressed the conqueror: "Is it thy intention to destroy the faithful Tartars, as well as the Chinese?" "Should the hair of the head of a single Tartar be injured," replied Zingis, "I will desolate the face of the earth." "Then recal the order thou hast given," said the Mandarin, "for the utter destruction of both nations will be the inevitable consequence of its being carried into execution." "Dost thou mean by the resistance the Chinese will make?" said the Khan, with a mixture of indignation and contempt. "Know, rash man, that I condemn thy menace, as much as I despise their power; they have fled, and will fly before my hardy hands as sheep from the tiger, or as dust is dissipated from the northern blast." "I entertained no such thought," said the Chinese; "And after hearing what I have to say, thou wilt be at liberty to follow thy own inclination; but of this thou mayest rest assured, that if thy commands be literally executed, pestilence and famine will soon destroy the troops. Who can, or who will inter, a hundred million of dead bodies, which if unburied, will affect the air you breathe. Another object is also worthy of thy consideration; the indiscriminate destruction proposed, will not leave a single artisan, or a single slave, to administer to the comforts, to sharpen the weapons, or to till the ground of their Tartar lords. "But should a few of the miserable slaves be spared from the general havoc, by policy or interest, who can protect and insure thee, and the companions of thy conquest, from the secret conspiracies, the midnight dagger, and the poisoned bowl of the survivors; I appeal to thy own sense and feelings, if it is possible for any human creature to serve with complacency or attachment the assassins of their parents, their brethren, or their children; it is contrary both to nature and reason; whatever may be their profession, blood for blood, the erosions of cruelty and revenge, the most fascinating and inextinguishable of all our passions, will lurk in the secret recesses of our hearts. I therefore pray," concluded the excellent Yelutchou-say, conscious of the impression he had made, and the strong ground on which he stood, "I humbly pray that the rebellious and the guilty may be severely punished, but that the industrious citizen, the inoffensive rustic, the hardy labourer, their wives and their children, may continue to serve thee unmolested; that Zingis and his faithful Tartars may live likewise." The conqueror listened with attention and obedience to his pacific, and instantly recalled the savage mandate he had issued.

The second example of influence happily exerted, was during the predatory expedition of Nadir Shah into Hindoostan, in the middle of the Eighteenth century. As soon as the merciless tyrant entered Delhi, he ordered every gate in the city to be shut, and closely guarded, and it was proclaimed by sound of trumpet, that none should enter or go forth, on pain of death.

The provisions within the walls being inadequate to the daily consumption, famine was speedily the consequence of this severe decree; and the unfeeling monster saw thousands perishing from hunger, or devouring substances at which nature revolts, without one emotion of pity or regret.

Surrounded by death in its most hideous and agonizing forms, and with the shrieks and groans of starving wretches assailing his ears, he ordered martial music to be constantly played, and with apparent unconcern indulged himself to excess in the pleasures of the table, aggravating injury by insult. He also ordered the theatre to be magnificently illuminated, and an entertainment to be performed for his amusement.

At this musical and dramatic exhibition, Tucki, an actor and a singer, pleased the barbarian so much, that he exclaimed in his transports, that he would grant the player any favour that he should ask; at the same time confirming his declaration with an oath.

The hero of the piece, who amidst all the assumed gaiety and splendour of an oriental drama, strongly felt for, and warmly sympathized with the sorrows of his countrymen, instantly prostrated himself before Nadir, and taking a fair advantage of his voluntary offer, said, "Command, Oh King, that the gates of the city may be opened."

The cruel invader thus surprised into an act of humanity, paused for a moment, but recollecting the solemn oath he had taken, and uniting superstition and enormity, granted the prayer of Tucki with considerable reluctance; and disconcerted in his hateful plans, retired, frowning to the palace.

TABLE-TALK.

A Picture.—Among all the interesting objects which Chandler has seen in his travels, there is none except the Parthenon which I so much wish to see as the stupendous ruins of the temple of Apollo at Ura, near Miletus, the description of which has perfectly transported me. Chandler saw them towards evening, when a herd of goats had spread themselves over the majestic reliques, climbing among blocks of marble and massy pillars, while the whole was illumined with the richest tints of the setting sun, and the still sea glittered in the offing.—Matthison's Letters.

JAMES PRICE was an English chymist, who in the course of experiments exhibited in the presence of several men of science and reputation, produced a wonderful powder, which, if it did not actually turn all it touched to gold, like the fabulous philosopher's stone, made very near approaches to that miraculous transmutation. Half a grain of this wonder-working ingredient, which was of a deep red colour, and weighed by an indifferent person, prevented quicksilver from evaporating or boiling, though the crucible which contained it, was surrounded by an intense fire, and was itself become red hot. I will not puzzle my readers, nor incur the risque of exposing myself, by describing in technical terms every part of the progress. It is sufficient to observe, that Dr. Price directed, but touched nothing, and that at the conclusion of the operation, when the crucible was cooled, and broken, a globe, weighing ten grains, of a yellow metal, was found at the bottom, which a skillful artist, after trying it by the common tests, pronounced it to be pure gold, for which he would give the highest price that was generally asked for that metal. A variety of experiments which it is not necessary to particularize in this place, and of which the principal nobility and gentry in the neighbourhood of Guildford, the doctor's residence, were witnesses, established beyond a doubt the fact, that by means of his extraordinary powders, for he produced a white as well as a red one, silver and gold, in the proportion of 28 to 1, and in other instances of 40 to 1, and 60 to 1, was repeatedly produced. Notwithstanding such unexceptionable evidence, the world still incredulous and suspecting deception, demanded further experiments; but the sanguine expectations of the friends of Dr. Price were checked by the reply he made; "The whole of my materials have been expended in the experiments I made, and I cannot furnish myself with more but by a process tedious and onerous, whose effects I find have already been injurious to my health, and of which I decline the repetition." Whether the operator had impaired his fortune, his intellect, or his spirits, I cannot tell; but I understand that he not long after died by his own hands, and his secret, to the experimental chymist, so highly interesting, perished with him. The philosopher and statesman who may lament the loss of an art, which would apparently have enabled us to pay off the national debt, and to set at defiance the exhausting circumstances of war, will, however, cease to repine, and estimate the doctor's secret at its proper value, when they are told, as he confessed to a friend, a few months before his death, that the materials necessary to produce an ounce of gold cost seventeen pounds. Lounger's Common Place Book.

A Guild of Poets!—Nürnberg also was the chief seat of the famous Meistersänger and their Sangerzünfte or Singer-guilds, in which poetry was taught and practised, like any other handicraft, and this by sober and well-meaning men, chiefly artisans, who could not understand why labour, which manufactured so many things, should not also manufacture another. Of these tuneful guild-brethren, Hans Sachs, by trade a shoemaker, is greatly the most noted and most notable. His father was a tailor; he himself learnt the mystery of song under one Nunnebeck, a weaver. He was an adherent of his great contemporary Luther, who has even deigned to acknowledge his services in the cause of the Reformation; how diligent a labourer Sachs must have been, will appear from the fact, that in his 74th year (1563), on examining his stock for publication, he found that he had written 6048 poetical pieces, among which were 208 tragedies and comedies, and this besides having all along kept house like an honest Nürnberg burgher, by assiduous and sufficient shoe-making! Hans is not without genius, and a shrewd irony; and above all, the most gay, child-like, yet devout and solid character; a man neither to be despised nor patronized, but left standing on his own basis, as a singular product, and a still legible symbol, and clear mirror of the time and country where he lived. His best piece known to us, and many are well worth perusing, is the Fastnachtspiel (Shrovetide Farce) of the Narrenschneider, where a doctor cures a bloated and lethargic patient by cutting out half-a-dozen Fools from his interior!—Thomas Carlyle on German Literature.

A French Wit.—Singular mode of accommodating a Debt.—Bois-Robert was the best companion of his time; his admirable invention of agreeable stories, with his inimitable manner of telling them, had made him a kind of favourite with Cardinal Richieu. Upon any indisposition of this minister, his physician would say to him, "My lord, no endeavours, you may be sure, will be wanting in us for your recovery; but all won't do, without some Bois-Robert." Bois-Robert, on some occasion, unfortunately got out of the Cardinal's favour. The Royal Academy of Science, who were indebted to him for Richieu's patronage, proposed to intercede for him; but the Cardinal being informed of it, intimated that their application would be to no purpose; upon which, they consulted with his Eminence's physician, and he at the end of the first prescription for the minister, who frequently stood in need of his skill, writ Recipe Bois-Robert ("a dose of Bois-Robert,") which succeeded.—This companionable person, more witty than wise, played so deep, that at one ill run he lost no less than ten thousand crowns with the Duke de Roquelaure. The duke loved money, and insisted upon being paid; but an accommodation was brought about by a friend. Bois-Robert sold off all he had, which made up four thousand crowns; this sum a gentleman carries to the Duke, telling him he must forgive the rest, and Bois-Robert would compose a panegyric ode on him, but of the very worst kind. "Now when it comes abroad that the Duke of Roquelaure has rewarded a paltry piece with six thousand crowns, your generosity will be extremely applauded, and, it will doubtless be said, what would he have given to a well-written poem!"

A Strange Prisoner.—In the inner court of the state-prison of Pierre-Gucise, at Lyons, I saw an old man with a venerable aspect, walking with slow yet firm steps, whose uncommon height struck me forcibly. He was neat, but old fashioned in his dress, and my conductor persuaded me to talk to him, for he loved conversation. I began therefore by observing on the weather, and the very remarkable situation of the castle, but I soon led him to the subject of his imprisonment. "It is now sixty years," he said with a resolute tone, "that I have seen nothing but these walls, and eighty-five that I have been in the world; I might have regained my freedom twenty years ago, but it was then too late, and I continue here above, where at present I am very well off;—I do not know that I should be so down below." Of the cause of his imprisonment I inquired in vain; only thus much I learned that he is of an illustrious family, and that he has never answered a single question upon the subject of his captivity.—Matthison's Letters.—[If this poor prisoner had not lost his wits, he furnishes one of the most remarkable instances, on record, of the force of habit. He had got so used, in fact, to his prison, that he could not have borne to be out of it. The novelty, and the being born, as it were, a second time to a world which had become different to him, would have frightened him. Such things have been. It is said of an old prisoner in the Bastille, when it was set open, that he requested to be taken back again to his cell. Such are the trials, but such also are the endurances, of human nature.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

IN our next number, we shall have the pleasure of paying our acknowledgments to various kind notices in Magazines and Newspapers. We also hope to say something on Mr. Coleridge.

We had always intended (and if we are not mistaken, have said so) to give a series of those criticisms from time to time, a sample of which (in the instance of Thomson's Castle of Indolence) has met the approbation of an OLD FRIEND AND WELL-WISHER.

The "Angler," from Goethe, is creditable to the translator; but it does not appear to us to afford any particular evidence of the genius of its great author.

We are sorry to say we have no recollection of the article mentioned by Mr. James.

The novel mentioned by Mr. M. has not come to hand. Nor the communication, to the best of our recollection, of G. B. W.

T. R. W. shall have attention.

Various articles from correspondents are under consideration; and promised insertions of others, or of extracts from them, shall now appear in weekly succession, till our stock be out.

PRICE THREE HALFPENCE.

WINDOWS, CONSIDERED FROM INSIDE.

THE other day a butterfly came into our room, and began beating himself against the upper panes of a window half open, thinking to get back. It is a nice point—relieving your butterfly—he is a creature so delicate. If you handle him without ceremony, you bring away, on your fingers, something which you take to be down, but which is plumes of feathers; and as there are no fairies at hand, two atoms high, to make pens of the quills, and write “articles” on the invisible, there would be a loss. Mr. Bentham’s ghost would visit us, shaking his venerable locks at such unnecessary-pain-producing and reasonable-pleasure-preventing heedlessness. Then, if you brush him downwards, you stand a chance of hurting his antennæ, or feelers, and of not knowing what mischief you may do to his eyes, or his sense of touch, or his instruments of dialogue; for some philosophers hold that insects talk with their feelers, as dumb people do with their fingers. However, some suffering must be hazarded in order to prevent worse, even to the least and most delicate of heaven’s creatures, who would not know pleasure if they did not know pain; and perhaps the merrier and happier they are in general, the greater the lumps of pain they can bear. Besides, all must have their share, or how would the burthen of the great blockish necessity be equally distributed: and finally, what business had little Papilio to come into a place unfit for him, and get bothering himself with glass? Oh, faith!—your butterfly must learn experience, as well as your Bonaparte.

There was he, beating, fluttering, flouncing,—wondering that he could not get through so clear a matter (for so glass appears to be to insects, as well as to men) and tearing his silken little soul out with ineffectual energy. What plumage he must have left upon the pane! What feathers and colours, strewed about, as if some fine lady had gone mad against a ball-room door, for not being let in!

But we had a higher simile for him than that. “Truly,” thought we, “little friend, thou art like some of the great German transcendentalists, who in thinking to reach at heaven by an impossible way (such at least it seemeth at present) run the hazard of cracking their brains, and spoiling their wings for ever; whereas if thou, and they, would but stoop a little lower, and begin with earth first, there, before thee, lieth open heaven as well as earth; and thou mayest mount high as thou wilt, after thy own happy fashion, thinking less, and enjoying all things.”

And hereupon we contrived to get him downwards,—and forth, out into the air, sprang he,—first against the lime-trees, and then over them into the blue æther—as if he had resolved to put our advice into practice.

We have before spoken of the fret and fury into which the common fly seems to put himself against a window. Bees appear to take it more patiently, out of a greater knowledge; and slip about with a strange air of hopelessness. They seem to “give it up.” These things, as Mr. Pepys said of the humanities at court, “it is pretty to observe.” Glass itself is a phenomenon that might alone serve a reflecting observer with meditation for a whole morning,—so substantial and yet so air-like, so close and compact to keep away the cold, yet so transparent and facile to let in light, the gentlest of all things,—so palpably something, and yet to the eye and the perceptions a kind of nothing! It seems absolutely to deceive insects in this respect, which is remarkable, considering how closely they handle it, and what microscopic eyes we suppose them to have. We should doubt (as we used to do) whether we did not mistake their ideas on the subject, if we had not so often seen their repeated dashings of themselves against the panes, their stoppings (as if to take breath), and then their re-commencement of the same violence. It is difficult to suppose that they do this for mere pleasure, for it looks as if they must hurt themselves. Observe in particular the tremendous thumps given himself by that great hulking fellow of a fly, that Ajax of the Diptera, the blue-bottle. Yet in autumn, in their old age, flies congregate in windows as elsewhere, and will take the matter so quietly as sometimes to stand still for hours together. We suppose they love the warmth, or the light; and that either they have found out the secret as to the rest, or

Why should Fly plague himself any longer with household matters which he cannot alter? He has tried hard in his time; and now he resigns himself like a wise insect, and will taste whatsoever tranquil pleasures remain for him, without beating his brains or losing his temper any longer. In natural livers, pleasure survives pain. Even the artificial, who keep up their troubles so long by pride, self-will, and the want of stimulants, contrive to get more pleasure than is supposed out of pain itself, especially by means of thinking themselves ill-used, and of grumbling. If the heart (for want of better training) does not much keep up its action with them, the spleen does; and so there is action of some sort: and whenever there is action, there is life; and life is found to have something valuable in it for its own sake, apart from ordinary considerations either of pain or pleasure. But your fly and your philosopher are for pleasure too, to the last, if it be harmless. Give old Musca a grain of sugar, and see how he will put down his proboscis to it, and dot, and pound, and suck it in, and be as happy as an old West India gentleman pondering on his sugar cane, and extracting a pleasure out of some dulcet recollection.

Gamblers, for want of a sensation, have been known to start up from their wine, and lay a bet upon two rain drops coming down a pane of glass. How poor are those gentry, even when they win, compared with observers whose resources need never fail them! To the latter, if they please, the rain-drop itself is a world,—a world of beauty and mystery and aboriginal idea, bringing before them a thousand images of proportion, and reflection, and the elements, and light, and colour, and roundness, and delicacy, and fluency, and beneficence, and the refreshed flowers, and the growing corn, and dew drops on the bushes, and the tears that fall from gentle eyes, and the ocean, and the rainbow, and the origin of all things. In water, we behold one of the old primeval mysteries of which the world was made. Thus, the commonest rain-drop on a pane of glass becomes a visitor from the solitudes of time.

A window, to those who have read a little in Nature’s school, thus becomes a book, or a picture, on which her genius may be studied, handicraft though the canvas be, and little as the glazier may have thought of it. Not that we are to predicate ignorance of your glazier now-a-days, any more than of other classes that compose the various readers of penny and three-half-penny philosophy,—cheap visitor, like the sunbeams, of houses of all sorts. The glazier could probably give many a richer man information respecting his glass, and his diamond, and his putty, (no anti-climax in these analytical days,) and let him into a secret or two, besides, respecting the amusement to be derived from it. (We have just got up from our work to inform ourselves of the nature and properties of the said mystery, putty; and should blush for the confession, if the blush would not imply that a similar ignorance were less common with us than it is.)

But a window is a frame for other pictures besides its own; sometimes for moving ones, as in the instance of a cloud going along, or a bird, or a flash of lightning; sometimes for the distant landscape, sometimes the nearer one, or the trees that are close to it, with their lights and shades; often for the passing multitude. A picture, a harmony, is observable, even in the drapery of the curtains that invest it; much more in the sunny vine-leaves or roses that may be visible on the borders, or that are trailed against it, and which render many a poor casement so pleasant. The other day, in a very humble cottage window in the suburbs, we saw that beautiful plant, the nasturtium, trained over it on several strings; which must have furnished the inmates with a screen as they sat at their work or at their tea inside, and at the same time, permitted them to see through into the road, thus constituting a far better blind than is to be found in many great houses. Sights like these give a favourable impression of the dispositions and habits of the people within,—show how superior they are to their sophistications, if rich, and how possessed of natural refinement, if among the poorer classes. Oh! the human mind is a fine graceful thing everywhere, if the music of nature does but seize its attention, and throw it into its natural attitude. But so little has the “school-master” yet got hold of this point, or made way with it, and so occupied are men with digging gold out of the ground, and neglecting the other treasures which they toss about in profusion during the operation (as if the clay were better than the flowers which it produced,) that few make the most of the means and appliances for enjoyment that lie round about them, even in their very walls and rooms. Look at the windows down a street, and generally speaking, they are all barren. The inmate might see through roses and geraniums, if they would; but they do not think of it, or not with loving knowledge enough to take the trouble. Those who have the advantage of living in the country or the suburbs, are led in many instances to do better, though their necessity for agreeable sights is not so great. But the presence of nature tempts them to imitate her. There are few windows any where which might not be used to better advantage than they are, if we have a little money, or can procure even a few seeds. We have read an art of blowing the fire. There is an art even in the shutting and opening of windows. People might close them more against dull objects, and open them more to pleasant ones, and to the air. For a few pence, they might have beautiful colours and odours, and a pleasing task, emulous of the showers of April, beneficent as May; for they who cultivate flowers in their windows (as we have hinted before,) are led instinctively to cultivate them for others as well as themselves; nay, in one respect they do it more so; for you may observe, that wherever there is this “fenestral horticulture,” (as Evelyn would have called your window-gardening,) the flowers are turned with their faces towards the street.

But “there is an art in the shutting and opening of windows.”—Yes, for the sake of air (which ought to be had night as well as day, in reasonable measure, and with precautions) and for the sake of excluding, or admitting, what is to be seen out of doors. Suppose, for example, a house is partly opposite some pleasant, and partly some unpleasant object; the one, a tree or a garden; the other, a gin-shop or a squalid lane. The sight of the first should be admitted as constantly as possible, and with open window. That of the other, if you are rich enough, can be shut out with a painted blind, that shall substitute a beautiful landscape for the nuisance; or a blind of another sort will serve the purpose; or if even a blind cannot be afforded, the shutters may be partly closed. Shutters should always be divided in two, horizontally as well as otherwise, for purposes of this kind. It is sometimes pleasant to close the lower portion, if only to preserve a greater sense of quiet and seclusion, and to read or write the more to yourself; light from above having both a softer and stronger effect, than when admitted from all quarters. We have seen shutters, by judicious management in this way, in the house of a poor man who had a taste for nature, contribute to the comfort and even elegance of a room in a surprising manner, and (by the opening of the lower portions and the closure of the upper) at once shut out all the sun that was not wanted, and convert a row of stunted trees into an appearance of interminable foliage, as thick as if it had been in a forest.

"But the fact was otherwise;" cries some fastidious personage, more nice than wise; "you knew there was no forest, and therefore could not have been deceived."

"Well, my dear Sir, but deception is not necessary to every one's pleasure; and fact is not merely what you take it for. The fact of there being no forest might have been the only fact with yourself, and so have prevented the enjoyment; but to a livelier fancy, there would have been the fact of the imagination of the forest (for every thing is a fact which does any thing for us)* and there would also have been the fact of having cultivated the imagination, and the fact of our willingness to be pleased, and the fact of the books we have read, and above all, the fact of the positive satisfaction. If a man be pleased, it is in vain you tell him he has no cause to be pleased. The cause is proved by the consequence. Whether the cause be rightly or wrongly cultivated, is another matter. The good of it is assumed in the present instance; and it would take more facts than are in the possession of a "mere matter of fact man" to disprove it. Matter of fact and spirit of fact must both be appreciated, in order to do justice to the riches of nature. We are made of mind as well as body,—of imagination as well as senses. The same mysterious faculty which sees what is before the eyes, sees also what it suggested to the memory. Matter of fact is only the more palpable world, around which a thousand spirits of fact are playing, like angels in a picture. Not to see both, is to be a poor unattended creature, who walks about in the world conscious of nothing but himself, or at best of what the horse-jockey and the coachmaker has done for him. If his banker fails, he is ruined! Not so those, who in addition to the resources of their industry, have stock in all the banks of nature and art, (pardon us this pun for the sake of what grows on it), and whose consolations cannot wholly fail them, as long as they have a flower to look upon, and a blood not entirely vitiated.

A window, high up in a building, and commanding a fine prospect, is a sort of looking out of the air, and gives a sense of power, and of superiority to earth. The higher also you go, the healthier. We speak of such windows as Milton fancied, when he wished that his lamp should be seen at midnight in "some high lonely tower;" a passage, justly admired for the goodness as well as loftiness of the wish, thus desiring that wayfarers should be the better for his studies, and enjoy the evidence of their fellow-creature's vigils. But elevations of this kind are not readily to be had. As to health, we believe that a very little lift above the ground floor, and and so on as you ascend, grows healthier in proportion. Malaria (bad air) in the countries where a plague of that kind is prevalent, is understood to be confined to a certain distance from the earth; and we really believe, that even in the healthiest quarters, where no positive harm is done by nearness to it, the air is better as the houses ascend, and a seat in a window becomes valuable in proportion. By and bye, perhaps, studies and other favourite sitting rooms will be built accordingly; and more retrospective reverence be shewn to the "garrets" that were once so famous in the annals of authorship. The poor poet in Pope, who lay

High in Drury lane,

Lulled by soft zephyrs through the broken pane, was better off there, than if he had occupied the ground floor. For our parts, in order that we may save the dignity of our three-halfpenny meditations, and at the same time give evidence of practising what we preach, we shall finish by stating, that we have written this article in a floor neither high enough to be so poetical nor low enough for too earthly a prose,—in a little study made healthy by an open window, and partly screened from overlookers by a bit of the shutter, while our look-out presents us with a world of green leaves, and a red cottage top, a gothic tower of a church in the distance, and a glorious apple-tree close at hand, laden with its yellow balls.

Some kindness of this sort Fortune has never failed to preserve to us, as if in return for the love we bear to her rolling globe; and now that the sincerity of our goodwill has become known, none seem inclined to grudge it us, or to dispute the account to which we may turn it, for others as well as ourselves.

We had something more to say of seats in windows, and a good deal of windows at inns, and of sitting and looking out of windows; but we have other articles to write this week, of more length than usual, and must reserve it for a future number.

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 27th of August, to Tuesday the 2d of September.

FIRST OF SEPTEMBER.—FOWLING.

THE second of September is terrible in the annals of the French Revolution, for a massacre, the perpetrators of which were called Septembriseurs. Far are we from intending to compare the sufferings of a thinking and social creature like man with those of inferior animals; but inasmuch as he is their superior in thought and sympathy, he is bound to be consistent, for their sakes as well as his own; and if the birds had the settlement of almanacks, new and startling would be the list of Septembriseurs and their fusillades,—amazing the multitude of good-humoured and respectable faces that would have to look in the glass of a compulsory knowledge, and recognize themselves for slaughterers by wholesale, or worse distributors of broken bones and festering dislocations.

"And what" (a reader may ask) "would be the good of that, if these gentlemen are not aware of their enormities? Would it be doing any thing but substituting one pain for another, and setting men's minds upon needless considerations of the pain which exists in the universe?"

Yes;—for in the first place, these gentlemen are perhaps not quite so innocent and unconscious, as in the gratuitousness of our amazingly liberal philosophy we are willing to suppose them. Secondly, should they cease to give pain, they would cease to feel it in its relation to themselves: and lastly, as to the pain existing in the universe, people in general are not likely to feel it too much, especially the healthy; nor ought any body to do so, in a feeble sense, as long as he does what he can to diminish it, and trusts the rest to providence and futurity. What we are incited by our own thoughts or those of others, to amend, it becomes us to consider to that end: what we cannot contribute any amendment to, we must think of as well as we can contrive. The greater number of sportsmen are not a very thoughtful generation. No harm would be done them, by putting a little more consideration into their heads. On the other hand, all sportsmen are not so comfortable in their reflections, as their gaiety gives out; and the moment a man finds a contradiction in himself between his amusements and his humanity, it is a signal that he should give them up. He will be hurting his nature in other respects, as well as in this, if he does not take care: he will be exasperating his ideas of his fellow-creatures, of the world, of God himself; and thus he will be inflicting pain on all sides, for the sake of tearing out of it a doubtful pleasure.

"But it is effeminate to think too much of pain, under any circumstances." Yes,—including that of leaving off a favourite pastime. Oh—we need not want noble pains, if we are desirous of them, depend upon it,—pains of honourable endeavours, pains of generous sympathy, pains, most masculine pains, of self-denial. Are not these more manly, more anti-effeminate, than playing with life, and suffering like spoilt children, and cracking the legs of partridges?

Most excellent men have there been, and doubtless are, among sportsmen,—truly gallant natures, reflecting ones too,—men of fine wit and genius, and kind as mother's milk in all things but this,—in all things but killing mothers, because they are no better than birds, and leaving the young to starve in the nest, and strewing the brakes with agonies of feathered wounds. If we presume to think ourselves capable of teaching them better, it is only upon points of this nature, and because for want of early habit and example, our prejudices have not been enlisted against our reflection. Most thankfully would we receive the wisdom they might be able to give us on all other points. But see what habit can do with the best natures, and how inferior ones may sometimes be put upon a superior ground of knowledge, from the absence of it. Gilbert Wakefield we take to have been a man of a crabbed nature, as well as confined understanding, compared with Fox; yet in the public argument he had with him on this subject, he undoubtedly had the best of it, poorly as it was managed by him. The good-natured statesman could only retreat into vague generalities, and smiling admissions, and hope that his correspondent would not think ill of him. And who does? For our parts, inclined as we are for some reasons to like both the men, we love Fox always, almost when he is on the instant of pointing his gun, and are equally inclined to quarrel with the tone and manner of the other, even when in the act of abasing it. But what does this prove, except the danger of a bad habit to the self-reconciling instincts of a fine enjoying nature, and to the example which flows from it into so much reconducement to others? When a common, hard-minded sportsman takes up his fowling-piece, we only think of him as a kind of wild beast on two legs, pursuing innocently his natural propensities, and about to seek his prey, as a ferret does, or a wild cat; but the more of a man he is, the more bewildered and dangerous become our thoughts respecting the meeting of extremes; and when Fox takes up the death-tube, we sophisticate for his sake, and are in hazard of becoming effeminate to the subject, purely to shut our eyes to the cruelty in it, and let the pleasant gentleman have his way.

As to the counter-arguments about providence and permission of evil, they are edge tools which it has hitherto turned out to be nothing but a presumption to play with. What the mind may discover in those quarters of speculation, it is impossible to assert; but as far as it has looked yet, nothing is ascertained, except that the circle of God's privileges is one thing, and that of man's another. If we knew all about pain and evil, and their necessities, and their consequences, we might have a right to inflict them, or to leave them untouched; but not being possessed of this knowledge, and on the other hand being gifted with doubts, and sympathies, and consciences, after our human fashion, we must give our fellow creatures the benefit of those doubts and consciences, and cease to assume the rights of gods, upon pain of becoming less than men, and losing all real pleasure.

But not to touch upon this question more solemnly than we can help, especially when the gravest reflections upon it may be suggested in a lighter manner, we will take the liberty of laying before the reader an article which we wrote upon it some years back, in the New Monthly Magazine. We will give the whole of it, because it begins with a country picture, the great refreshment in all matters of sporting. And as we have done justice to the finer understandings that are to be found in connection with these pastimes, the reader will here see that we have not failed to do as much to the inferior ones, notwithstanding what we have just said of their least favourable sample.

A COUNTRY LODGING.—Dialogue with a Sportsman.

Poulton, September 20th.

On my way back to town the other evening from a visit, I had the misfortune, at the turning of a road, not to see a projecting gateway, till I came too near it. I leaped the ditch that ran by, but my horse went too close to the side-post; and my leg was so hurt, that I was obliged to limp into a cottage, and have been laid up ever since. The doctor tells me I am to have three or four weeks of it, perhaps more.

* Facio, factum (Latin)—to do, done. What is done in imagination, makes a greater or less impression according to the power to receive it; but it is unquestionably done, if it impresses us at all; and thus becomes, after its kind, a fact. A stupid fellow, utterly without imagination, requires tickling to make him laugh; a livelier one laughs at a comedy, or at the bare apprehension of a thing laughable. In both instances there is a real impression though from very different causes, one from "matter of fact," (if you please) the other from spirit of fact; but in either case the thing is done, the fact takes place. The moving cause exists somehow, or how could we be moved?

As soon as I found myself fixed, I looked about me to see what consolations I could get in my new abode. The place was quiet. That was one thing. It also was clean, and had a decent-looking hostess. Those were two more. Thirdly, I heard the wind in the trees. This was much. "You have trees opposite the window?"—"Yes, Sir, some fine elms. You will hear the birds of amorning." "And you have poultry, to take care of my fever with? and eggs and bacon when I get better? and a garden and a paddock, when I walk again, eh? and capital milk, and a milk-maid whom it's a sight to see carrying it over the field."—"Why, Sir," said my hostess, good-humouredly but gravely, "as to the milk-maid, I can say nothing; but we have capital milk at Pouldon, and good eggs and bacon, and paddocks in plenty, and every thing else that horse or man can desire, in an honest way."—"Well, Madam," said I, "I shall desire nothing of you, you may depend on it, unbecoming the dignity of Pouldon or the pretty whiteness of these window-curtains."—"I dare say we shall agree very well, Sir," said my good woman with a gracious smile.

The curtains were very neat and white, the rest of the furniture corresponding. There was a small couch, and a long-backed arm-chair, looking as if it was made for me. "That settee," thought I, "I shall move into that other part of the room:—it will be snugger, and more away from the door. The arm-chair and the table shall go near the window, when I can sit up; so that I may have the trees at the corner of my eye, as I am writing. The table, a small mahogany one, was very good, and reflected the two candles very prettily, but it looked bald. There were no books on it.

"Pray, Mrs. Wilton, have you any books?"

"Oh, plenty of books. But won't you be afraid to study, Sir, with that leg?"

"I'll study without it, if you can undo it for me."

"Dear me! Sir, but won't it make you feverish?"

"Yes, unless I can read all the while. I must study philosophy, Mrs. Wilton, in order to bear it: so if you have any novels or comedies—"

"Why, for novels or comedies, Sir, I can't say. But I'll shew you what there is. When our lady was alive, rest her soul! eight months ago, the house was nothing but books. I dare say she had a matter of a hundred. But I've a good set too below; some of my poor dear husband's, and some of my own."

"I see," said I, as she left the room. "that I shall be obliged to send to the clergyman. Nay, I'll behave in the most impudent manner, and send all round. 'Necessitas non habet leges,' as Peter Pindar says. This is the worst of books. A habit of reading is like a habit of drinking. You cannot do without it, especially under misfortune. I wonder whether I could leave off reading, beginning with a paragraph less a day?"

Mrs. Wilton returned with an arm full. "This, Sir," said she, giving me the top one, "our lady left me for a keep-sake."

It was Mrs. Chapone's Essays. "Pray," said I, "Mrs. Wilton, who was the lady whom you designate as the Roman Catholics do the Virgin? Who was Our Lady?"

Mrs. Wilton looked very grave, but I thought there was a smile lurking under her gravity in spite of her. "Mrs. V., Sir, was no Roman: and as to the Virgin, by which I suppose, Sir, you mean the—but however—oh, she was an excellent woman, Sir; her mother was a friend of the great Mr. Samuel Richardson."

"Oh ho!" thought I, looking over the books, "then we shall have Pamela."—"There was the Farrier's Guide, some Treatises on Timber and the Cultivation of Wood (my hostess was a carpenter's widow), Jachin and Boaz (which she called a strange fantastic book), Mrs. Glasse's Cookery, Wesley's Receipts, an old Court Calendar, the Whole Duty of Man, an odd volume of the Newgate Calendar, the Life of Colonel Gardner, and, as sure as fate, at the bottom of the heap, Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded. "Virtue Rewarded!" thought I: "I hate these eternal mercenary virtues; these bills brought to Heaven for payment; these clinkings of cash in the white pockets of conscience."

"You have one novel, at any rate, Mrs. Wilton."

"Sure, Sir, it is better than a novel. Oh, it is a book full of good fortune."

"Of good fortune! What, to the maid-servant!"

"To every body that has to do with it. Miss V. was—dubious like—which of the cottages to live in; and she fancied ours, because she found Pamela and Colonel Gardner in the corner cupboard."

"I dare say.—Now here," said I, when left to myself, "here is vanity at second hand. The old lady must take a cottage because she found a book in it, written by an old gentleman, who knew the old lady her mother."

With all my admiration of Richardson, Pamela had ever been an object of my dislike. I hated her little canting ways, her egotism eternally protesting humility, and her readiness to make a prize of the man, who, finding his endeavours vain to ruin her, reconciled her virtue and vanity together by proposing to make her his wife. Pamela's is the only female face to which I think I could ever have wished to give a good box on the ear. "And this," said I, "was the old maid's taste. It is a pity she was not a servant-maid."

While I was thus venting my spleen against a harmless old woman, in a condition of life which I had always treated with respect, and was beginning to regret that I had got into "methodistical" lodgings, my hostess, comes back again, with three more books, to wit, Paradise Lost, Thomson's Seasons, and a volume containing the whole of the Spectator in double columns. "Head of my ancestors!" cried I, uttering (but internally) a Chinese oath: "Here thou art at home again, Harry! This is sense. This is something like. The cottage is an excellent cottage; and, for aught I know, had the honour of being one of the many cottages in which my great grandfather's friend Sir Richard used to eschew the visits of the importunate."

There was a bed-room as neat as the sitting-room, and with more trees at the window. My leg was very painful, and I had feverish dreams. However, my horseback had made me nothing the worse for my dinner, and having taken no supper, my dreams, though disturbed, were not frightful. I dreamt of Pamela, and Dick Honeycombe, and my ancestor Nathaniel. I thought my landlady was Mrs. Harlowe, and that Dick being pressed to marry, said he would not have his cousin Pamela, but Nell Gwynn; which the serious Commonwealth officer approved, "because," said he, "of the other's immoral character." In one of my reveries, between sleep and awake, I hardly knew whether the rustling sounds I heard were those of the trees out-of-doors, or of old Mrs. Harlowe's petticoat.

In the morning, it was delightful to hear the sound of the birds. There is something exhilarating in the singing of birds, analogous to the brilliancy of sunshine. My leg was now worse, but not bad enough to hinder me from noticing the chaney shepherds and shepherdesses on the mantelpiece, or those others on the coloured bed-curtain; loving pairs with lambs, repeated in the same group at intervals all over the chimneys, as if the beholder had a cut-glass eye. The window of the sitting-room has a little white curtain on a rod. This, of the bed-room, is a proper casement with diamond panes; and you can see nothing outside but green leaves.

However ill I may be, I am always the worse for lying in bed. I contrived to get up and remove to the settee in the other room; at which the doctor, when he came, shook his head. But I did very well with the settee. It was brought near the window, with the table; and I had a very pretty look-out. Opposite the window you can see nothing but trees, but sitting on the left side, you have a view over a fine meadow to the village church, which is embowered in elms. There is a path and a stile to the meadow, and luxuriant hedge-row trees. I was as well pleased with my situation as a man well could be, who had a leg perpetually reminding him of its existence; but Pouldon is at a good distance from town, and I was thinking how long it would take a messenger to fetch me some books, when I heard a shot from a fowling-piece. I recollected the month, and thought how well its name was adapted to these Septemberers of the birds. Looking under the trees, I saw a stout fellow, in a jacket and gaiters and the rest of the costume of avicide, picking his way along the palings, with his gun re-prepared. "Ay," said I, "he has 'shot as he is used to do,' and laid up some poor devil with a broken thigh. There he goes, sneaking along, to qualify some others for the hospital, and they have none."

I threw up the window, to baffle his next shot with the noise. He turned round. It was Jack Tomkins. "Hallo! my boy," said he, "why where the devil have you got? D—n me, if I don't blow. You deserve it, Harry, for keeping so close. I'll tell Tom Neville and the rest, d—mme, if I don't. Snug's the word, eh? Is she pretty? Some delicate little devil, I warrant, fit for your verses and all that, eh?"

"She's too delicate for you, Jack; you'd frighten her."

"Oh, don't tell me. They're not frightened so easily. What the devil are you putting out of the way there? You may try to laugh as you please; but hang me, Harry—I mustn't come up, I suppose?"

"Pray do; and (lowering my voice) I'll introduce you to a little friend of mine, of the name of Leg. Jack! Jack! say nothing at the door—Most respectable woman—You understand me."

Jack (who is a man of fortune, and was at Trinity, though the uninitiated would not suppose it), clapped a finger significantly on one side of his nose, and knocked very much like a gentleman. Presently he came into the room grinning and breathing like an ogre. "My dear Honeycomb, how are you?—an unexpected pleasure, eh? The good lady tells me you have hurt yourself: something about a horse—what Bayardo the spotless, eh? (Here Mrs. Wilson left the room, and Jack burst out.) Oh, you devil! Well, where's Lalage? Where's Miss Leg—Fanny or Betty, or what the devil's her name?"

"The poor thing has a very odd name, Jack. What think you of Bad Leg?"

"Nonsense. Miss Bad Leg! impossible. I know of nobody of the name of Bad. Come, you're joking; and I can't stop long. I'll come back to dinner, if you like; but must be off now;—so introduce me. Is that the way there?"

"No, this is the way, Jack. Little Bad Leg, my dear creature, allow me to introduce my friend John Tomkins, Esquire, of Galloping Hall. John Tomkins—Bad Leg."

"Eh? pooh, pooh, Harry. This is one of your fetches. Come, come, I know your goes."

"Egad, Jack, it's neither my fetch nor my go, at present, I assure you. There is an old epigram—"

'I am unable,' yonder beggar cries,
'To stand or go.' If he says true, he lies:—

which is not true; for he may sit, as I am obliged to do at this present."

I had some difficulty in persuading my friend Tomkins that there was no other leg in the case than my own. "Well, Harry," says he, "I am heartily sorry for it, upon my soul; for now as you have caught me with my Joe Manton, I suppose I'm to be had up for fetching down a few birds; whereas if I could have fairly found you out in your tricks with the cottagers, d—n me if I couldn't have read you a bit of a lecture myself, by way of a muffler."

"Why, Jack, as you say, I have caught you in the fact, and I wonder at a fellow of your sense and spirit, that you're not above cutting up a parcel of tom-tits."

"Grouse, Harry, grouse, and partridges and pheasants, and all that. Tom-tits! let the cockneys try to cut up tom-tits."

"Well, to be sure there's a good deal of difference between breaking the legs of partridges and tom-tits. The partridge, too, is a fierce bird, and can defend itself. It's a gallant thing, a fight with a partridge."

"Eh? Nonsense. Now you are at some of your banter. But it's no joke, I assure you, to me, having a fine morning's sport. You can read and all that; but every man to his taste. However, I can't stop at present. Here's Needle, poor fellow, wants to be off. Glorious morning—never saw such a morning—but I'll come back to dinner, if you like, instead of going to the Greyhound. I gave a brace of partridges just now to the good woman; and I say, Harry, by G—d, if you get me some claret, I'll have it out with you—I will, upon my soul—I'll rub up my logic, and have a regular spar."

My friend Jack returned in good time, and had his birds well dressed. I was in despair about the claret, till the host of the Greyhound drew it out from a store which he kept against the month of September; and Jack being a good-humoured fellow, and having had a victorious morning, he did very well. Mrs. Wilton and the doctor had equally protested against my having company to dinner, being afraid of the noise and the temptation to eat; but I promised them to abstain, and that I would talk as much as possible to hinder Jack from being obstreperous; which they thought a dangerous remedy. I got off very well, by dint of talking while Jack ate; and such is vanity, that I was not displeased to see that I rose greatly in my hostess's opinion by my defence of the bird-creation. It was curious to observe how Jack shattered her, as she came in and out, with his oaths and great voice, and how gratefully she seemed to take breath and substance again under the Paradisaical shelter of my arguments. But I believe I startled her too, with the pictures I was obliged to draw. This is the worst of such points of discussion. You are obliged to put new ideas of pain and trouble into innocent heads, in the hope of saving pain and trouble itself. But we must not hesitate for this. The one is a mere notion compared with the other. It is soon got rid of or set aside by minds in health; and the unhealthy ones are liable to worse deductions, if the matter is not fairly laid open.

However, wishing to let Jack have his ease in perfection, as far as he could, I was for postponing the argument to another day, and seeing him relish his birds and claret in peace. But the more he drank, the less he would hear of it. "Besides," says he, "I've been talking about it to Bilson—you know Bilson, the Christ Church man—and he's been putting me up to some prime good arguments, 'faith. I hope I sha'n't forget 'em. By the by, I'll tell you a good joke about Bilson—But you don't eat any thing. What is your leg so bad as that comes to? You don't pretend, I hope, not to eat partridge, because of your love of the birds?"

"No, Jack; but I'd rather know that you had killed 'em than Bilson, because you are a jollier hand; you don't go to the sport with such reverend sophistry."

"That's famous. Bilson to be sure.—But stop, don't let me forget another thing, now I think of it. Bilson says you eat poultry. What do you say to that? You eat chicken."

"I am not sure that I can apologize for eating grouse, except, as I said before, when you kill 'em. Evil communications corrupt good platters. I can only say that no grouse should be killed for me, unless a perfect Tomkins—an unerring shot—had the bringing of them down. I could give up poultry too; but death is common to all; a fowl is soon despatched; and many a fowl would not exist, if death for the dinner-table were not part of his charter. I confess I should not like to keep poultry. There is a violation of fellowship and domesticity in killing the sharers of our homestead, and especially in keeping them to kill. It would make me seem like an ogre. But this is one sentiment: that violated by making a sport of cruelty is another. But I will not argue this matter with you now, Jack. It would be a cruelty itself. It would be inhospitable, and a popery. I wish to put wine down your throat, and not to thrust my arguments. Besides, as you say, I never shall convince you; so drink your claret, and tell me where you were yesterday."

"Why at Bilson's, I tell you, and so I must talk while I think of it. We had a famous joke with Bilson. Since he went into orders, he is very anxious not to swear; and so he laid a wager he'd never swear again; and yesterday, in the middle of dinner, while he was championing his bird, and cutting up your argument about cruelty, all of a sudden what does our vicar but clap his hand to his jaw as if he was going to give a view holla, and rap out the d—dest oath you ever heard. He had champed a shot, by G—d, with an old tooth. Now that's meat and drink to you, Harry, for all your tenderness."

"Why, it was only a shot in a black coat, Jack, instead of a black cock."

"That's famous. I'll tell him of that. Oh, Hal, your laugh is savage. See—you enjoy the sport now yourself?"

"It ought to be a lesson to him."

"Oh yes! mighty considerate persons you Tatler and Spectator men are, and would make fine havock with our amusements."

"Excuse me. It is you that make fine havock. I would have you amuse yourself to your heart's content, if you would do it without breaking the bones and hearts of your fellow-creatures."

"Fellow-creatures! and their 'hearts.' The hearts of woodcocks and partridges! Pooh, pooh! Bilson might have borne his pain better, I own, though it's a d—d thing, that sort of jar; but what he says, is very true;—he says, if you come to think of it, there must be pain in the world, and it would be unmanly to think of it in this light."

"Very well. Then do you, Jack, who are so manly, and so willing to encourage one's sports, stand a little farther, and let me crack your shin with this poker."

"Nonsense. That's a very different thing."

"Perhaps you'd prefer a good crack on the skull?"

"Nonsense."

"Or a thrust-out of your eye?"

"No, no: all that's very different."

"Well: you know what you have been about this morning. Go and pick your way again along the palings there; and leave me your fowling-piece, and I'll endeavour to shoot you handsomely through the body."

"Nonsense, nonsense. I'm a man, you know; and a bird's a bird. Besides, birds don't feel as we do. They're not Christians. They're not reasoning beings. They're not made of the same sort of stuff. In short, it's no use talking. There's no end of these things."

"Just so. This is precisely the way I should argue if I had the winging of you. Here I should say, is Mr. John Tomkins. Mind, I am standing with my manning-piece by a hedge."

"With your what?"

"With my manning-piece. You cannot say fowling-piece, when it is men that are to be brought down."

"Oh, now you're joking."

"I beg your pardon; you will find it no joke presently. Here, says I, is Mr. John Tomkins coming; or Here is a Tomkins. Look at him. He's in fine coat and waistcoat (we can't say feather, you know;) keep close: now for my Joe Manton: you shall see how I'll pepper him. 'Pray don't,' says my companion. 'A Tomkins is a Tomkins after all, and has his feelings as we have.' 'Stuff!' says I: 'Tomkinses don't feel as we do. They're not Christians, for they do not do as they would be done by. They're not reasoning beings, for they do not see a leg's a leg. They're not made of the same sort of stuff; and so if they bleed, it does not signify:—if they die of a torturing fracture, who cares? In short, it's no use talking. There's no end of these things. So here goes. Now if I hit him, he is killed outright, which is no arm to any body; and if I wound him, why he only goes groaning and writhing for three or four days, and who cares for that?'"

"Upon my soul, if I listen, you'll make a milk-sop of me. Consider—think of the advantages of fresh air and exercise; of getting up in the morning, and scouring the country, and all that."

"Excellent! but, my dear Tomkins, the birds are not bound to suffer, because you want fresh air."

"But it's the only time of the year, perhaps, that I can get out: and I must have something to do—something to occupy me and lead me about."

"The birds, Tomkins, are not bound to have their legs and thighs broken, because you are in want of something to lead you about."

"Well, you know what I mean. I mean that we must not look too nicely into these things, as somebody said about fish; or we should fret ourselves for nothing. The birds kill one another."

"Yes, from necessity; for the want of a meal. But they do not torture—or if they did, that would be because they did not reason as well as you and I, Tomkins."

"What I mean to say is, that there's pain in the world already: we cannot help it; and if we can turn it to pleasure, so much the better. This is manly, I think."

"Well said indeed. But to turn pain into pleasure, and to add to it by more pain, are two different things, are they not? To bear pain like a man, and to inflict it like a sportsman, are two different things."

"A sportsman can bear pain as well as any body."

"Then why does he not begin by turning his own pain into a pleasure? As it is, he turns his own pleasure to another's pain. Why does he not begin with himself?"

"How with himself?"

"Why you talk of the want of amusement and excitement. Now to say nothing of cricket, and golf, and boating, and other sports, are there no such things to be had as quarter-staves, single-stick, and broken heads? A good handsome pain there is a gallant thing, and strengthens the soul as well as the body. If there must be a certain portion of pain in the world, these were the ways to share it. But to sneak about, safe one's-self, with a gun and a dog, and inflict all sorts of wounds and torments upon a parcel of little helpless birds,—Tomkins, you know not what you are at, when you do it; or you are too much of a man to go on."

"I cannot think that we inflict those tortures you speak of?"

"How many birds do you wound instead of kill? Say, upon an average, twenty to one, which is a generous computation. How many hundred birds would this make in the course of the day? How many thousands in the course of a season? To bring them down, and then be obliged to kill them, is butchery enough: but to lame, and dislocate, and shatter the joints and bodies of so many that fly off, and leave them to die a lingering death in their agony,—I think it would not be unworthy of some philosophers and teachers, if they were to think a little of all this as they go, and not talk of the "sport" and the "amusement" like others; as if men were to be trained up at once into thought and want of thought, into humanity and cruelty. Really, men are not the only creatures in existence; and the laugh of mutual complacency and approbation is apt to contain very sorry and shallow things, even among the "celebrated" and "highly respectable." I don't speak of you, Jack; but of those who make a profession of thinking, which you know you are not under the necessity of doing. But what's the matter?"

"I've got the d—dest toothache come upon me. It's this cursed draught. Of all pains the toothache is the most horrible. I've no patience with it."

"I'll shut the door. There—now never mind the toothache, for I'll bear it capitally."

"You bear it! That's a good one. Very easy for you to bear it; but how the devil can I?—Hm! hm! (writhing about) it's the cursedest pain."

"Stay—here's some oil of cloves Mrs. Wilton has brought you. How does it feel now?"

"Wonderfully. The pain is quite gone. It was very bad, I assure you. You must not think I am wanting in proper courage as a man, because it hurt me so. You know, Harry, I can be as bold as most men, though I say it who shouldn't."

"My dear Jack, you have as much right to speak the truth, as I have. The boldest of men is not expected to be without feeling. An officer may go bravely into battle, and bear it bravely too, but he must feel it: he cannot be insensible to a shattered knee."

"Certainly not."

"Or to a jaw blown away—"

"By no means."

"Or four of his ribs jammed in—"

"Horrible!"

"Or a face mashed, and his nose forced in—"

"Don't speak of it!"

"Or his two legs taken off by a cannon-ball, he being left to fester to death on a winter's night on a large plain."

"Upon my soul, you make my flesh creep on my bones."

"A gallant spirit is not bound to feel all this, or even to hear of it, without shuddering, even though the battle may be necessary, and a great good produced by it to society."

"Certainly, certainly, God knows."

"It is only a woodcock or a snipe that ought to bear it without complaining: your partridge is the only piece of flesh and blood that we may put into such a state for no necessity, but purely for our sport and pleasure."

"How? What's that you say?"

"I say it is none but birds that we may, with a perfect conscience, lame, lacerate, maul, and blow their legs and beaks away, and leave, God knows where, to perish of neglect and torture, they being the only masculine creatures living, and not to be lowered into comparison with soldiers and gallant men."

"Hey?—Why as to that—Hey? What? 'Fore George, you bewilder me with your list of tortures. But how am I to be sure that a bird feels as you say?"

"It is enough that you know nothing certain. As you are not sure, you have no right to hazard the injustice, especially as you cannot help being sure of one thing; which is, that birds have flesh and blood like ourselves, and that they afford similar evidences of feeling and suffering. Allow me to read you a passage that I cut the other day out of an old review. It is taken from Fothergill's Essay on the Philosophy, Study, and Use of Natural History; a book which I shall make acquaintance with as soon as I can. Here it is."

"It may, perhaps, be said, that a discourse on the iniquity and evil consequences of murder would come with a bad grace from one who was himself a murderer. Who can describe that which he has not seen, or give utterance to that which he has not felt? Never shall I forget the remembrance of a little incident which occurred to me during my boyish days—an incident which many will deem trifling and unimportant, but which has been particularly interesting to my heart, as giving origin to sentiments, and rules of action, which have since been very dear to me."

"Besides a singular elegance of form and beauty of plumage, the eye of the common lapwing is peculiarly soft and expressive: it is large, black, and full of lustre, rolling, as it seems to do, in liquid gems of dew. I had shot a bird of this beautiful species; but, on taking it up, I found that it was not dead. I had wounded its breast; and some big drops of blood stained the pure whiteness of its feathers. As I held the hapless bird in my hand, hundreds of its companions hovered round my head, uttering continued shrieks of distress, and, by their plaintive cries, appeared to bemoan the fate of one to whom they were connected by ties of the most tender and interesting nature; whilst the poor wounded bird continually moaned, with a kind of inward, wailing note, expressive of the keenest anguish: and, ever and anon, it raised its drooping head, and turning towards the wound in its breast, touched it with its bill, and then looked up in my face, with an expression that I have no wish to forget, for it had power to touch my heart, whilst yet a boy, when a thousand dry precepts in the academical closet would have been of no avail."

"Well now, Harry, that's touching; d—mme if it isn't. He's right about the precepts. You have saved 'em from being dry, eh, with your claret; but all that you have said hasn't touched me like that story. A lapwing! Hang me if I shall have the heart to touch another lapwing."

"But other birds, Jack, have feelings, as well as lapwings."

"What do you say, though, about Providence? Bilson said some famous things about Providence. What do you say to that?"

"Oh, ho! what he

"Admits and leaves them Providence's care"—

Does he?—You remember the passage, Jack, in Pope:

"God cannot love (cries Blunt with tearless eyes)
The wretch he starves; and piously denies.

The humbler bishop, with a meeker air,
Admits, and leaves them, Providence's care."

"But we are Providence, Jack. Nay, don't start; I mean that our own feelings, our own regulated feelings and instructed benevolence, are a part of the general action of Providence, a consequence and furtherance of the Divine Spirit. You see, I can preach as well as Bilson. Humanity is the most visible putting forth of the Deity's hand; the noblest tool it works with. Or if this theology doesn't serve, recollect the fable of Jupiter and the Waggoner. Are we content with abstract references to Providence, when we can work out any good for ourselves, or save ourselves from any evil? Did Bilson wait for Providence to induct him to his living? Did he not make a good stir about himself? Push him into a ditch the next time you meet him, and see if he will not bustle to get out of it. Leave him to get out by himself, and see if he does not think you a hard-hearted fellow. Wing him, Jack, wing him; and see if he'll apply to Providence or a surgeon."

"Eh? That would be famous. I say—I must be going though; it's getting dark, and I must be in town by nine. Well, Harry, my boy, good by. I can't say you've convinced me; you know I told you I wasn't to be convinced; but I plainly told you I don't like the story of the lapwing; it makes the bird look like a sort of human creature; and that's not to be resisted, damme if it is. So I'm taken in about lapwings. Adieu."

"Well, Jack, you shall say that in print, and perhaps do more good than you are aware. Have you any objection?"

"Not I, 'faith; I'd say it any where, if it came into my head.—But how? In the Sporting Magazine?"

"Why I'm afraid we can hardly attain to such eminence as that, especially on such a subject."

"I was thinking so. Oh, I see—you'll pull your hive about my ears. Well, so be it. Adieu, Harry; I'll send you the books."

"Adieu, honest Jack, jolliest of the myrmidons of 'young-eyed Massacre.'"

CHARACTACUS.

From the Isle of the West the captive came,
Downcast his eyes, but not with shame;
The soldier is sad at the captive's chain,
As he thinks of his own far home again:
The fortune of battle hath chain'd his hand,
And led him away to a southern land;
But his lofty soul is unconquer'd still—
Fetters cannot subdue that brave one's will;
Though his chain is deep in his dungeon floor,
And the bolts are brass of his triple door,
And darkness is round him, and racks are nigh,
His heart is not craven, he fears not to die.

From his western isle to the Roman gate,
To swell out a triumph's long-drawn state,
At the van of the conqueror's chariot bound,
'Mid the jeer of the crowd and the soldiers round,
Had that warrior been led;—his face was pale,
But his blue eyes were bright, and his limbs were hale;
His stature was lofty, his carriage bore
The impress proud of his native shore,
That the haughty Roman, though conqueror he,
Look'd not with more kingly majesty.
O 'tis the hero's crown, if he fall
From the height of power in a victor's thrall,
To preserve the unshaken heart, and bear
Bravely the suffering that waits him there;

While the coward will fly to the dagger or bowl,
From the agony harrowing up the soul;
Which each new breath is a torture higher,
Each moment of time an age in fire:
The last glance of glory extinguish'd, forgot,
Man, life, and creation one hideous blot—
Loud pæans the deeds of the conqueror swell,
But who will the captive's triumph tell?

From his dungeon gloom to the glare of day
Is Caractacus led by his guards away.
His wrists are link'd with an iron chain,
But he hears its clank with unalter'd mien;
For his courage is firm as that man's should be
Who has learn'd to conquer adversity.
On his brow at times a deep thought made
A hue pass over of darker shade;
Mayhap 'twas a gleam of his island earth,
His green meads of Severn and native hearth.
In blood to the last he had done and dared,
And the Roman had deeply his vengeance shared;
While, though vanquish'd, 'twas only by those who gave
To the universe law, and to freedom a grave.

Claudius sat on the world's proud throne,
Round him his glittering warriors shone;
Lord of a thousand victories, he Concentred his empire's majesty;
That empire which stretches from Afric's pyres
To the icy North's impassive fires;
While Iberia and Mesopotamia display
The arc of its rising and setting day.
Purple and gold was the robe he wore,
With its rich folds piled on the marble floor.
Perfumes in clouds of incense arose,
Bearing the odours of amber and rose
To the coilings of fretwork and ribs of gold,
And paintings rich that their wreaths enfold.
The victor's bay bound the emperor's brow,
And shaded the lightning that flash'd below
From a deep eye, dark as a winter midnight,
When the hidden thought rush'd from its depth to light.
The adamant lip and the moveless limb,
Seem to comport with none but him.
Guards and patricians stand around,
And the lictors mark the imperial bound.

Sudden the tramp of feet draws nigh,
The portal arch fixes every eye.
All is still as eternity within,
Without is a rattling fetter's din,
At intervals clanking as it draws near,
Its sound of captivity, suffering, and fear.
He comes! he comes! to the Roman gaze
That meets him in silence and in amazement,
The Briton comes, with his stature tall,
Like a lion entrapp'd in the hunter's thrall,
That looks on his bondage and seems to say—
"I am a sovereign born—I am one to-day!"
He turn'd not his head from the victor's throne,
For his sight was placed upon him alone.
The grandeur around, and the southern's pride,
Drew not his princely glance aside.
Though his palace afar on his native plain
Was a rude hut built on the wild campaign;
Though earth was the floor, and mud the wall,
To him 'twas more worth than that gilded hall.
The wolf's rough hide o'er his shoulders cast
Caught the butterfly courtier's smile as he past,
But his carriage crush'd the vain sneer ere it broke,
For his limbs were knit like his native oak—
It would humble the stoutest Roman there,
One grasp of his iron arm to dare.

"I am conquer'd, a prisoner, my crown is with thee;
I fought that my country, my race might be free.
If this be a crime in a Roman eye,
Lictors, lead me forth, for this will I die.
Let to-morrow enthroned me in power again,
Again will I combat, although it be vain,
Thee, Claudius, or thine, and will gloriously die,
As honor requires in our far country;
There we brand a slave with a curse of scorn,
And deem none noble but the blessed free-born.
What would'st thou with me?—I have nothing now
Save my own stern will that the world shall not bow!"
Thus the captive said, and the Roman cried:—
"Go, his chains unloose, lest the universe wide,
While it sees us the victor in battle, may know,
We're vanquish'd in greatness of soul by a foe!"

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

I.—TRAGEDY IN THE FAMILY OF KYTE.

This frightful piece of domestic history had been ought upon the modern stage, the dramatist, in consequence of the hero's setting his house on fire, would probably have called it (not with thorough applicability, but that does not signify to a good play-bill) the "Sardanapalus of Private Life." It is impossible, of course, to pronounce complete judgments on the parties concerned, in this or any other tragedy. To judge all, it is necessary to know all. But the writer tells us, that if Lady Kyte had begun with a little less anger, it is probable that no tragedy would have taken place.

Loving-kindness does not always effect what it wishes;
but it is the only sure card to play, whether to do away evil or to lessen it. And that man must be stupid or a monster, who would not adore, above all other women, the wife that with a real love for his person, should have treated him kindly in a matter like this.

Sir William Kyte was a baronet of very considerable fortune and an ancient family, and on his return from his travels, had so amiable a character, and was reckoned what the world calls so fine a gentleman, that he was thought a very desirable match for a worthy nobleman's daughter in the neighbourhood, of great beauty, merit, and a suitable fortune. Sir William and his lady lived very happy together for several years, and had four or five fine children, when he was unfortunately nominated at a contested election to represent the borough of Warwick, in which county the bulk of his estate lay, and where he, at that time, resided. After the election, as some sort of recompense to a zealous partizan of Sir William, Lady Kyte took an innkeeper's daughter for her own maid; she was a tall, genteel girl, with a fine complexion, and seemingly very modest and innocent.
Molly Jones, for that was her name, attracted Sir William's attention; and after some time the servants began to entertain some suspicions that she was too highly in her master's favour; the housekeeper in particular soon perceived that there was too much foundation for their suspicions, and knowing that the butler had made overtures to Molly, she informed him of the circumstance, and his jealousy having rendered him vigilant, he soon discovered the whole affair, and found that it had proceeded much further than was at first apprehended. The housekeeper made use of the butler's name, as well as his intelligence to her lady; and this threw everything into confusion; Lady Kyte's passion soon got the better of her discretion: for, if instead of reproaching Sir William for his infidelity, she had dissembled her resentment till his first fondness for this new object had abated, she might probably have reclaimed her husband; who, notwithstanding this temporary defection, was known to have a sincere regard and esteem for his lady. The affair being now publicly known in the family, and all restraints of shame or fear of discovery being quite removed, things were soon carried to extremity between Sir William and his lady, and a separation became unavoidable. Sir William left Lady Kyte with the two younger children, in possession of the Mansion House in Warwickshire; and retired himself with his mistress, and his two eldest sons, to a large farmhouse on the side of the Cotswold hills. The situation was fine, plenty of wood and water, and commanded an extensive view of the vale of Evesham: this tempted him to build a handsome box there, with very extensive gardens planted, and laid out in the luxurious taste of the age; and not content with this, before the body of the house was quite finished, Sir William added two large side fronts, for no better reason than that his mistress happened to say, "what is a Kite without wings?" The expense of finishing this place, which amounted at least to £10,000., was the first cause of Sir William encumbering his estate; and the difficulties in which he was involved making him uneasy; he, as is too often the case, had recourse to his bottle for relief.
He kept what is called a hospitable table, and being seldom without company, this brought on a constant course of dissipation and want of economy, by which means his affairs in the course of a few years became almost desperate.

There was taken into the family about this time a fresh-coloured country girl, in the capacity of a dairy-maid, with no other beauty than what arises from the bloom of youth; and as people who once give way to their passions know no bounds, Sir William, in the decline of life, conceived an amorous regard for this girl, who was scarce twenty; this event produced still further confusion in the family. Mrs. Jones soon observed this growing passion in Sir William, and either from resentment or the apprehension, or perhaps the real experience of ill usage, thought proper to retire to Camdden, a neighbouring market-town, where she was reduced to keep a little sewing-school for bread. Young Mr. Kyte, whether shocked at this unparalleled infatuation of his father, or as was commonly said, finding himself exposed to the continual insults of his female favourite, sought an asylum and spent most of his time with a nobleman, a friend of his, in Warwickshire. Sir William, though he had now a prospect of being successful in this humble amour, and of indulging it without molestation, yet began at length to see the delusive nature of all vicious pursuits, and though he endeavoured to keep up his spirits, or rather to drown all thought by constant intoxication; in his sober intervals he became a victim to gloomy reflections; he had injured a valuable wife, which he could not now reflect upon without some remorse; he had wrong'd his innocent children, whom he could not think upon without the tenderest sentiments of compassion. His son, who had been a sort of companion to him for several years, had now left him through his ill usage, and as Mrs. Jones had for some time been useful to him, he was shocked at being deserted even by the woman for whose sake he had brought this distress upon his family; and he found himself almost alone in that magnificent, but fatal mansion, the erecting and adorning of which had been the principal cause of ruining his fortune. Tormented by these contending passions, he had for a week raised himself by constant inebriation to a degree of phrensy, and behaved in so frantic a manner that even his new favourite could bear it no longer, and had eloped from him. On the day on which he executed his fatal resolution, he sent for his son, and for his new mistress, with what intention can be only conjectured, but luckily neither of them obeyed the summons. Early in the evening, it being in the month of October, the butler had lighted two candles as usual, and set them upon the marble table in the hall. Sir William came down and took them up himself, as he frequently did; after some time, however, one of housemaids ran down stairs in a great fright, and said, "the lobby was still all in a cloud of smoke." The servants, and a tradesman that was in the house upon business, ran immediately up, and forcing open the door whence the smoke seemed to proceed, they found that Sir William had set fire to a large heap of fine linen, piled up in the middle of the room, which has been given by some old lady, a relation, as a legacy, to his eldest son. While the attention of the servants was entirely taken up with extinguishing the flames in this room, Sir William had made his escape into an adjoining chamber, where was a cotton-bed, and which was wainscotted with deal, as most finished rooms then were; when they had broken open this door, the flames burst out upon them with such fury that they were all glad to make their escape out of the house, the principal part of which sumptuous pile was, in a few hours burned to the ground, and no other remains of Sir William were found next morning, than the hip-bone and the vertebrae, or bones of the back, with two or three keys, and a gold watch, which he had in his pocket.

This was the dreadful consequence of a licentious passion, not checked in its infancy.

SPECIMENS OF CELEBRATED AUTHORS.

SECOND SPECIMEN OF ST. EVREMOND.

His opinion of the best food; and of the English and their comedies.

It is not easy to give a complete specimen of an author at once. His qualities are often various, and demand various samples. Those of St. Evremnod, for instance, are a gallant good-nature, a refined epicurism (in the ordinary sense of the word), great good sense in judging of common life, and now and then a disposition to banter; which last is said to have so pervaded his manners (that is to say, the spirit of it, or the disposition to undervalue and to look at the petty side of things), as to give him a "sneering physiognomy." There is a look of this kind in some of his portraits, though not all; and it is easy enough to suppose, that a man of St. Evremond's fine, but not profound, sense, falling upon the times he did, and on such a court as Charles the Second's however he may have accommodated himself to circumstances, may have had misgivings about human nature, calculated to give this turn to his countenance. Of the good-natured gallantry we have given a sample. The banter we must keep for another time. Here follow specimens of the refined epicurism, and the solid judgment. The first is part of a letter written to a friend in exile.

JUDICIOUS EATING (if you can afford it).

You'll tell me, perhaps, that I was not of so gay a humour in my own misfortunes, as I appear to be in yours; and that it is ill-breeding in a man to bestow all his concern upon his own misfortunes, and be indifferent to, nay, and even merry with the calamities of his friends.
I should agree with you in that if I behaved myself so;
but I can honestly affirm to you that I am little less concerned at your exile than yourself; and the little mirth which I advise you to, is in order to have a share of it myself, when I shall find you capable of receiving it.

As to what relates to my own misfortunes, if I have formerly appeared to you more afflicted under them than I seem to be at present, it is not because I was so indeed. I was of opinion that disgraces exacted from us the decorum of a melancholy air, and that this apparent mortification was a respect due to the will of our superiors, who seldom bethink themselves of punishing us, without a design to afflict us. But then you are to know that under a sad outside and mortified countenance, I gave myself all the satisfaction I could find in myself; and all the pleasure I could take in the conversation of my friends.

After having found the variety of that grave temper we learn from morality, I should grow ridiculous myself, if I continued so serious a discourse, which makes me proceed to give you some advice that shall be less troublesome than instructions.

Adapt as much as possibly you can, your palate and appetite to your health: 'tis a great secret to be able to reconcile the agreeable and necessary in two things, which have been almost always opposite. Yet after all,
to arrive at this great mystery, we want nothing but sobriety and niceness; and what ought not a man to do that he may learn to chuse those delicious dishes at his meals, which will keep both his mind and body in a good disposition, all the remainder of the day? A man may be sober without being nice, but he can never be nice without being sober. Happy is the person that enjoys both these qualities together! For thus his pleasure is ever inseparable from his diet.

Spare no cost to get Champagne wines, though you were 200 leagues from Paris. Those of Burgundy have lost all their credit with the men of good taste, and scarce do they preserve a small remainder of their old reputation with the citizen. There is no province that affords excellent wines for all seasons but Champagne. It furnishes us with the Vin d'Ay, d'Avenet, and d'Auville till the Spring; Tessy Sillery, and Versenat, for the rest of the year.

If you ask me which of all these wines I prefer, without being swayed by the fashion of the Tastes, which false pretenders to delicacy have introduced; I will tell you that the Vin d'Ay is the most natural of all wines, the most wholesome, the most free from all smell of the oil, and of the most exquisite agreeableness, in regard of its peach-taste which is peculiar to it, and is in opinion, the chief of all tastes and flavours.

Leo X., Charles V., Francis I., and Henry VIII. had each of them their house in or near Ay, in order to the more curious getting their quantities of wines. Amongst the greatest affairs of the world, in which those princes were more or less concerned, it was not the least of their cares to have the Vin d'Ay in their cellars.

Be not too desirous of rarities, but be nice in your choice of what may be had with convenience. A good, wholesome, natural soup, which is neither too weak nor too strong, is to be preferred for common diet before all others; as well as for the exactness of its taste, as for the advantage of its use.

Tender, juicy mutton, good sucking veal, white and curious barn-door fowls, well fed but not crammed; fat quail taken in the country; pheasant, partridge, and rabbit, all which have an agreeable natural savour in their taste, are the true meats which may help to furnish your table all the seasons of the year. The Wood-Hen is particularly to be esteemed for excellency, but it is not sought after where you or I are, by reason of its so great rarity.

If an indispensable necessity obliges you to dine with some of your neighbours, whom either their money or dexterity hath excused for serving in the Rear-van, commend the hare, the stag, the roe-buck, the wild-boar, but eat none of them: let even ducks and teal have your good word too. Of all brown meats, the snipe alone is to be commended, in favour of its taste, though it is somewhat prejudicial to health.

Look upon all mixtures, and kitchen compositions, called Ragouts, or kick-shaws to be little better than poison. If you eat but little of them they will do you but little hurt; if you eat a great deal, it is impossible but their pepper, vinegar, and onions must ruin your taste at last, and soon cause a alteration in your health.

Sauces, if you make them yourself, as simple and plain as possible, can do no harm at all. Salt and orange are the most general and the most natural seasoning. Fine herbs are wholesome, and have something in them more exquisite than spices; but they are not equally proper for everything. One must use them with judgment in meats where they are most agreeable, and distribute them with so much discretion that they may improve the proper taste of the meat, without making their own discerned.

Having thus discoursed to you of the qualities of wines, and the properties of meats, 'tis necessary to come to the most proper counsel for the adapting of the palate to the body.

Let nature incite you to eat and drink by a secret disposition, which is lightly perceived, and doth not press you to it through necessity. Without appetite the most wholesome food is capable of burting, and the most agreeable of disgusting us. With hunger the necessity of eating is a sort of evil which causes another after the meal is over, by making us eat more than we should. The appetite (vulgarly called a good stomach) prepares, if I may so speak, an exercise for our heat in the digestion: whereas greediness prepares labour and pain for it. The way to keep us always in good temper is to suffer neither too much emptiness, nor too much repletion, that so nature may never be tempted to fill itself greedily with what it wants, not impatient to discharge its load.

The English and the Comedy.

There is no comedy more conformable to that of the ancients, than the English, as for what relates to the manners. It is not a mere piece of gallantry, full of adventures and amorous discourses, as in Spain and France; but a representation of the ordinary way of living, according to the various humours, and different characters of men. It is an Alchymist, who by the illusion of this art, feeds the deceitful hopes of a vain Curioso. It is a silly credulous coxcomb, whose foolish facility is continually abused; it is sometimes a ridiculous politician, grave and composed, starched in everything, mysteriously suspicious, that thinks to find out hidden designs in the most common intentions, and to discover artifice in the most innocent actions of life. It is a whimsical lover, a swaggering bully, a pedantic scholar, the one with natural extravagancies, the other with ridiculous affectations. The truth is, these cheats and cul-de-sacs, these politicians and other characters so ingeniously devised, are carried on too far, in our opinion; as those which are to be seen upon our stage, are a little too faint to the relish of the English; and the reason of that perhaps, is, because the English think too much, and we, commonly, not enough.

And, indeed, we are satisfied with the first images of things; and by sticking to the bare outside, we generally take appearances for reality, and the easy and free for what is natural. Upon this head I shall observe, by the bye, that these two last qualities are sometimes most improperly confounded. The easy and the natural agree well enough in their opposition to what is stiff and forced; but when we are to dive into the nature of things, or the natural humour of persons, it will be granted me, that the easy will scarce carry it far enough. There is something within us, something hidden, that would discover itself, if we sounded the subject a little more. It is as difficult for us to enter in as for the English to get out. They become masters of everything they think on, though they are not so of their own thoughts. Their mind is not at rest, even when they possess their subject; they still dig when there is no more ore to be got; and go beyond the just and natural idea which ought always to be maintained, by carrying their inquiries too far.

The truth is I never saw men of better understanding than the French, who apply themselves to consider things with due attention; and the English, that can shake off their meditations, to return to that faculty of discourse and freedom of wit, which, if possible, ought always to be had. The finest gentlemen in the world are the French that think and the English that speak. I should insensibly run into two general considerations; and therefore must re-assume my subject of comedy, and observe a considerable difference which is to be found between theirs and ours. It consists in this, that being zealous to copy the regularity of the ancients, we still drive to the principal action, without any other variety than that of the means that brings us to it.

It is not to be denied but that the representation of one principal event ought to be the sole scope and end proposed in tragedy; for we cannot without some violence and pain find ourselves taken off from what employed our first thoughts. The misfortune of an unhappy king, the sad and tragical death of a great hero wholly confine the mind to these objects; and all the variety it cares for, is to know the different means that contributed to bring about this principal action; but comedy being contrived to divert and not to busy us, provided probability be observed, and extravagance avoided. Variety, in the opinion of the English, is an agreeable surprise, and change that pleases; whereas the continual expectation of one and the same thing, wherein there seems to be no great matter of importance, must of necessity make our attention flag. Thus instead of representing a signal cheat carried on by means all relating to the same end, they represent several cheats, each of which produces its proper effect. As they scarce ever stick to the unity of action, that they may represent a principal person, who diverts them by different actions; so they often quit that principal person, to shew that various things happen to several persons in public places. Ben Jonson takes this course in his Bartholomew Fair. We find the same thing in Epsom Wells,* and in both these comedies, the ridiculous adventures of these public places are comically represented.

There are some plays which have in a manner two plots, that are interwoven so ingeniously the one into the other, that the mind of the spectators, (which might be affected by too sensible a change,) finds nothing but satisfaction in the agreeable variety they produce. It is to be confessed that regularity is wanting here; but the English are of opinion that the liberties which are taken in order to please the better, ought to be preferred before exact rules, which dull authors improve to an art of tiring their audience.

Rules are to be observed for avoiding confusion; good sense is to be followed for moderating the flight of a luxurious fancy; but rules must not so constrain the mind as to fetter it; and a scrupulous reason ought to be banished, which adhering too strictly to exactness, leaves nothing free and natural.

They who cannot attain a genius which nature hath denied them, ascribe all to art which they may acquire; and to set a value upon the only merit they have, which is that of being regular, they employ all their interest to damn any piece that is not altogether so. As for those that love the ridicule; that are pleased to see the follies of mankind; that are affected with true characters, they will find some of the English comedies as much, or perhaps, more to their relish, than any they have ever seen.

Our Moliere, whom the ancients have inspired with the true spirit of comedy, equals their Ben Jonson in representing truly the various humorous and different ways of men, both observing in their characters a just regard to the peculiar taste and genius of their own nation. I believe they have both carried that point as far as the ancients ever did. But it is not to be denied but that they had a greater regard to their character than to the plot, which might have been better laid together, and more naturally unravelled.

A WORD ON "ENGLISH WOMEN VINDICATED."

To the Editor of the London Journal.

SIR,

For some reason or other I do not receive my London Journals till Saturday; but, nevertheless, I have caught a glimpse of the last No. through the window-panes of the booksellers, and perceive the attack—nay, let me use a gentler term, the mild reproof of the fair "Old Boy." Delighted am I to think that anything of mine has attracted the bright eyes of a lady, and grateful also that she has treated an old beau so considerably. Her letter is like a Barbary comfit—sweet and sugary outside, but of sufficient pungency within, to give it zest. I could bear such gentle brainings with a lady's fan every day of my life, and be thankful into the bargain. "Old Boy," however, must graciously condescend to pardon me if I make a remark or two on her letter. In these I will be as brief as possible.

In the first place, then, I never said that the place in which I beheld the deplorably dressed ladies was a bazaar, nor even a "fashionable shop," in the common sense of the term. It was no place for the sale of nick-nacks and gew-gaws—the frequenters of such shops are entitled to the full measure of "Old Boy's" censure—but it was a good, honest, downright boutique where ladies come to buy a yard of stuff, and then drive away in their carriages in a most laudable manner. Ill-dressed they certainly were, and of the "middle or poorer orders" they certainly were not, as the footmen with gold-headed canes at the door amply testified.

"Old Boy" says that French ladies are parchment skeletons. Undoubtedly there may be such between the Belgian frontier and the Pyrenees, but the average French women are better, fuller formed, and withal more graceful, than any three women out of six, from Regent's Park to St. James's. Of their faces I say nothing. What was the remark of a young Frenchman to me only the other day, on his first visit to England? "We should run after them at Paris for their faces—but, Mon Dieu! their feet, their tenons, how ugly!" It is seldom one sees an English woman of proper dimensions—she is either too thin and lank, or too fat and stumpy. There is with us no medium between the dome of St. Paul's, and London Monument.

My fair opponent seems mightily smitten with our delightful home parties. Sir, I have never stood in more need of Job's especial virtue, and your golden maxim, "make the best of what you have," than at some of the aforesaid delightful English home parties. If "Old Boy" is as enchanted with them as she professes to be, I never knew or heard of any one who, in the way of amusement, was grateful for so little, and that little so indifferent. English sprightliness, God help us, is a most soporific affair.

Lastly, French ladies, according to your correspondent, are never satisfied unless you make love to them. This information can at most be but second-hand—for can "Old Boy" as a woman, conscientiously say, that she ever beheld a gentleman make a "tender declaration" to a French lady, with her in the room? If she cannot, then she must have obtained the important proof of French levity and French female inferiority to us in intellectual pleasures, not from her own experience, but from the gossipings of others. Moreover those others must have been men, and in the assertions of men who kill time with love declarations, I put but little trust.

"Thou hast mis-spoke, mis-beard—tell o'er thy tale again."

I have been accused of being brusque. It is better to be brusque and sincere in your brusquerie, especially when a service is intended, than to be mealy-mouthed and false. It is my love for my countrywomen that prompted me to raise such an outcry against their style of dress. I am so enamoured of their faces, that I would their figure, air, carriage, and every thing else about them, were perfection. If we do not try we shall never mend, and if we never mend, we shall become the butt of the rest of Europe. The very "thick aneled, train-oil eating Russians," will excel us in the matter of dress and manners. Whatever brusquerie there is in me, I ask pardon for. It is not well to be harsh with men, much less with women—so I hope that "Old Boy" will cast a glance of sweet reconciliation on OLD CRONY.

Evergreen Lodge, August 14, 1834.

INTOLERANCE.

(From Dr. Bowring's "Minor Morals," lately published.)

"THERE was a very droll dispute at school to day, papa!" said George: "one boy insisted that a Latin verse was written one way in the original, another declared it was written another way: the quarrel became so hot that we expected it would have ended in blows; when one of the bigger boys recommended that each should bring his book: and it was found that each had quoted the passage correctly from his own copy, but they had different editions, and the text was different."

"It was," said Mr. Howard, "only a small display of that intolerance of which there are too many great exhibitions in the world. Each boy thought himself right, and had good reason for thinking so; but there was not the same reason for thinking the other wrong. He had seen his own book with his own eyes, and had, therefore, very sufficient evidence for himself; but he could not know what evidence the other had had. Hence the folly of expecting everybody to think as we think. They will think as we think, if the same reasons are given to them, and if those reasons influence them as they influence us. If they have other reasons unknown to us, or if our reasons appear to them not to warrant our opinions, they cannot think as we think: it is impossible, and there is no help for it.

"But what ought to be helped, and ought to be avoided, is our attempting to punish others because they do not see as we see, or think as we think. This is persecution.

"When I was in Lisbon, I was accompanied by a Monk to the church of St. Anthony. You have heard, perhaps, that the armorial bearings of that beautifully-situated city, are a vessel dismasted, but guided through the waters by two crows, one seated on the prow and the other on the stern of the ship. The device is in honour of a miracle said to have been wrought in favour of St. Anthony, the patron saint of the Tagus, who, when at sea, sailing on a mission to the heathens, fancied himself lost: for all the crew of the vessel in which he had sailed had perished of plague, and he was left, wholly ignorant of navigation, to the mercy of the waves. In his despair, he knelt down to pray, when he saw two black pinioned birds descend from heaven, one of which seized the rudder, and the other perched on the bow of the ship: by these he was safely conducted to Portugal. And among the majority of the Portuguese there is no more doubt of the miracle than of the ordinary events of which they have been witnesses themselves.

"Did you believe the story, papa?" enquired Edith.

"By no means; and, though I never said any thing which should show that I felt contempt for the credulity of the Portuguese, yet I have no doubt they considered me somewhat heretical."

"Come," said the monk, "with me to the Igreja de San Antonio, and I will give you such evidence as shall be irresistible." We walked together under the magnificent arches of the church,—between avenues of pillars, on many of which the miracles of the Saint were recorded, and we reached a narrow staircase at the foot of the tower. "Follow me," said the monk, "and fear not." I ascended after him the long, long winding stone steps, the darkness of the way being only lighted by distant gleams which broke through the narrow interstices left in the thick walls, and on reaching the top, the monk pointed out a huge cage, it was as large as an ordinary sized room, in which were two enormous black crows, gravely seated on a metal bar. "Look there, Senhor," said the monk, and bowed his head reverently before the crows; "those are the identical birds which brought St. Anthony hither. And do you doubt the miracle now?"

"I doubted it, and did not doubt the less in consequence of what I saw. And why did I doubt, Edith?"

"I suppose papa, because you did not think they were the real crows that brought St. Anthony to Lisbon." Even so, my love; and I did not believe that St. Anthony had been brought to Lisbon by crows at all; and the attempt to convince me that the two crows were still living, and had lived for many hundred of years, was one difficulty more to believe, and not one difficulty less.

"The monk's reasoning was what logicians call 'begging the question.' He took for granted, the very thing to be proved, that St. Anthony had been escorted by the crows, and thus fancied that his telling me the crows I saw were the real crows, was to weigh down all my experience of the habits of the animal, all my knowledge of natural history, and the very natural reflection, that it was much more likely that there should be a succession of crows provided by the monk and his brethren, as the old ones died, than that a perpetual miracle should be wrought in order to prove the truth of a very improbable story. Besides, I saw that the crows were richly and regularly fed, and I might have asked him why if the crows were miraculously preserved, all the expenses of nourishing them were not saved?"

"And did you not tell him, papa, that you could look through the whole of the imposture?" said George. "Did you not tell him that he was a rogue, and that you were not to be duped by his roguery?"

"Softly, my impatient boy; that would neither have been prudent nor courteous; it would have done neither me, nor him, nor any body good. No good to me, for I should have been exposed to some danger; the Monk would have looked upon me with hatred, because my expression of incredulity would have implied contempt for his opinions, or distrust of his honesty and veracity; it would have done him no good, for it was his interest to persist in the fraud, and as to the facts of the case, he knew more about them than I did; and no good to any body else, for no body else was present. But it may do good now to you and to others, for to others you may tell the story, as I may tell it to others."

"My purpose in telling the story was not to excite your scorn or dislike towards the Monk, who, though he could not believe, against the knowledge he had, that those identical crows really escorted St. Anthony up the Tagus, may have believed that St. Anthony was escorted by crows. I did not wish you to be angry with the Monk, or the Monk's tale, but I wish to ask you two questions. If I had really desired and tried to believe the story, could I have done so, in spite of myself?"

"No, indeed, papa, that would have been impossible," said the children at once.

"You would not have been so foolish."

"And if I could not have believed it, even though I wished to believe it, could I do so because the Monk, or any other person, wished one to believe it?"

"Oh no! no!" they all repeated again and again.

Well then, my children, the lesson I wish to teach you is this:—Never be angry with any person, merely because his opinion is not your opinion; never be angry because you cannot persuade him to change his opinion; and above all, never do him any injury, or hesitate about doing him a good, because his opinion and yours are different. Nobody can believe what he likes, however he may try to do so; at all events, if he hears all that is to be said on all sides of a question. Still less can any body believe according to the likings of others. Where you doubt, inquire. In your own opinion seek nothing but truth, because truth, after all, is the great thing. In your conduct to others, be guided by the rule that you should never cause useless pain. In the minds of the best men there is, always has been, and always, perhaps, will be, much difference of opinion as to what is true, but everybody knows and feels what is kind, and truth itself is most likely to be found when it is sought for by tolerance and benevolence.

ACCOUNT OF THE ASSASSINS.

(From Part 19 (just published) of the Penny Cyclopaedia,—a publication which for compressed fulness and variety of information, executed with the greatest tact and judgment, and brought up to the most recent enquiries, may compete with the very costliest of its name-sakes. We have long had it upon our conscience that we did not say this before, and have now a particular reason for regretting that we did not do so. But this must not prevent our doing it.)

Assassins, a military and religious order, formed in Persia in the eleventh century. It was a ramification of the Ismaelites, who were themselves a branch of the great Mohammedan sect of the Shiites, the supporters of the claim of Ali's posterity to the caliphate. But among the Ismaelites there were many who were Mussulmans only in appearance, and whose secret doctrine amounted to this; that no action was either good or bad in itself and that all religions were the inventions of men. These unbelievers were formed into a secret society by one Abdallah, a man of the old Persian race, who had been brought up in the religion of the Magi, and was a hater of the Arabs and of their faith. After several bloody insurrections against the Abbaride caliphs, the Ismaelites succeeded in placing on the throne of Egypt a pretended descendant of Ismael, the seventh Imaum in the line of Ali, from whom the Ismaelites had taken their name. This descendant, whose name was Obeid Allah Mehdee, was the founder of the Fatemite dynasty, so called from Fatema, Mohammed's daughter. Under the protection of these princes a lodge of the secret doctrine was established at Cairo, and its members spread over a great part of Asia. Their ostensible object was to maintain the claims of the Fatemite caliphs to universal dominion, and to urge the destruction of the caliphs of Bagdad as usurpers. One of the adepts, Hassan Ven Sabah, thought of turning these instruments to his own advantage. He had filled high offices under the Sultan of the Seljuicide Turks, but, on being disgraced, he went to Egypt, where he was received with distinction by the caliph, became a zealous adherent of the Ismaelite lodge; and, after many vicissitudes and wanderings, obtained possession, by the aid of his brethren of the hill-fort of Alamoot (or culture's nest), situated to the north of Casvin, in Persia, and there, (A. D. 1090), established an independent society, or order, consisting of seven degrees, with himself at the head as Sheikh at Jebel, i. e. sheikh of the mountain. Under him came three dai al Kehir, the grand priors of the order; 3rdly, the dais, or initiated masters; 4thly, the refekes, or companions; 5thly, the fedafees, or devoted; 6thly, the laseeks, aspirants or novices; 7thly, the prophane or common people. Hassan drew out for the dais, or initiated, a catechism consisting of seven heads, among which were, implicit obedience to their chief; secrecy; and lastly, the principle of seeking the allegorical, and not the plain sense in the Koran, by which means the text could be distorted into anything the interpreter pleased. This did away effectually with all fixed rules of morality or faith. But this secret knowledge was confined to a few; the rest were bound to a strict observance of the letter of the Koran. The most effectual class in the Koran were the fedavees—youths often purchased or stolen from their parents when children, and brought up under a particular system of education, calculated to impress upon their minds the omnipotence of the sheikh, and the criminality as well as utter impossibility of evading his orders, which were like the mandates of heaven itself. These fedavees were clothed in white, with red bonnets and girdles, and armed with sharp daggers, but they assumed all sorts of disguises when sent on a mission. Mario Polo gives a curious romantic account of the garden at Alamoot, to which the fedavee designed for an important mission, was carried in a state of temporary stupor, produced by powerful opiates, and where, on awakening he found everything that could excite and gratify his senses. He was made to believe that was a foretaste of the paradise of the prophet, reserved for his faithful and devoted servants, and thus became willing to encounter death, even under the most appalling forms, in order to secure a permanent seat in the abode of bliss. Marco Polo's narrative is confirmed by Arabian writers, and Von Hammer inclines to believe it true in the main; others attribute the visions in the garden to the effects of the intoxicating preparation administered to the fedavees. The name of hushish, which is that of an opiate made from hemp-leaves, is supposed to have been the origin of the word "Assassins;" others derive the latter from Hassan ben Sabah, the founder of the order. The word becoming familiar to the crusaders was by them carried to Europe where it was used as synonymous with that of Sicarius, or hired murderer, but the Italians have adopted it to signify a robber on the high road, without necessarily implying the crime of murder.

The assassins, either by force or treachery, gained possession of many other castles and hill-forts in Persia. The Sultan Melek Shab attacked them, the doctors of the law excommunicated them, but the fedavees carried secret death among their enemies; the Sultan's minister, Nigam ul Mulk, was stabbed, and his master soon after died suddenly, it was supposed by poison. The Assassins spread into Syria, where they acquired strong holds in the mountains near Tripoli; and the Sultan of the Seljuicides was glad to come to an agreement by granting them several districts. Hassan ben Sabah, having extended his order over great part of the Mohammedan world, died at Alamoot in 1124, after thirty five years' reign. He bequeathed his authority of Keah Buzoorg Oomeid, one of the dais of the order. Buzoorg renewed the war with the Seljuicides, and Abboos Wefaut, his Dai al Kehir in Syria, entered into a temporary alliance with Baldwin II. King of Jerusalem, through the agency of Hugo de Pagens, grand master of the Templars, against their common enemies the Seljuicide Turks. After this, the Assassins were sometimes on friendly terms, but oftener at variance, with the Christian princes of Syria and Palestine, as well as with their Mohammedan neighbours. To accomplish their object, they never scrupled to resort to assassination. In 1126 the prince of Mosul was stabbed as he entered the Mosque by Assassins disguised as Dervises; soon after, a caliph of Bagdad was killed likewise, and also a Sultan of Cairo, notwithstanding his Fatemite.

The Syrian, or western branch of the Assassins, however, continued to exist for some years later under their Dai al Kehir, Massayad, not far from Beyroot, was their principal strong hold. The history of this branch is the most familiar to Europeans, being much interwoven with that of the Crusaders and of the great Sultan Sala-eddeen. The latter was several times in danger from the daggers of the Assassins. The Dai al Kehir Sinan, a man who had a reputation for Sanctity, sent in 1173, an embassy to Almeric, the Christian King of Jerusalem, offering, in his name and that of his people, to embrace Christianity, on condition that the Templars, who were their neighbours, would remit the annual tribute of forty thousand gold ducats which they had imposed on them, and live in future in peace and good neighbourhood towards them. Almeric was delighted with the offer, and dismissed the envoy with honour. The envoy, however, on his return to his territory, was killed by a party of Templars, led by Gaultier du Mesnil. After this, the Assassins resorted again to their daggers, which they had laid aside for many years. Among others, Conrad, Marquis of Tyre and Montferat, was murdered by two fedavees in the market-place of Tyre, 1192. The reasons of this murder which some have ascribed to Richard of England, have been the subject of a long controversy, which Von Hammer does not succeed in elucidating. The assassins kept the Christians of Tripoli in continual fear. They levied contributions on the Christian princes for the safety of their lives; and they even demanded it of St. Louis, King of France, on his passing through Acre on his return from the Damietta expedition. Louis, however, indignantly refused. At last the Syrian Assassins were conquered, and their stronghold taken, by Bibars, the Mamluke Sultan of Egypt, fourteen years after the destruction of the Eastern branch by the Monguls. Many, however, found refuge in the mountains of Syria, and became mixed with the Yezed Koords; and some of the tenets of the order are believed to still linger among them.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

WHEN any one, whose judgment we respect, expresses approbation of an "article" of our writing, it gives it such a gloss in our eyes, that we are sometimes moved, in our vanity, to look at it again, in order to see what has pleased him, and read it by the glad light of companionship. For writing an article, and reading it over afterwards, are two very different things. In writing you give yourself up to your faith in the subject; you are absorbed in it; you do not think of criticism or objection; you are wrapped all round as in a bower of your own building, pleased with the task for its own sake, perhaps with the sense of power. We do not say it is always so; but generally, and when one is in the humour. But on reading over the article when it comes from the printer, the feelings are often very different. You doubt parts of it, perhaps dislike others; we do not mean for their want of truth, but their want of merit,—of spirit. You suspect the public will not like it; that it is dull, common-place; that there is no reason why you should have called their attention to such old stories. You doubt, however true you may have been, whether the public will see the truth with your eyes, or care to see it no better painted. And then the necessity of correcting the press horribly aids these suspicions. It is going over your impulses in cold blood, examining the foot prints you have made in the vivacity of your first impressions; it seems as if you were going to retrace them mechanically in the public eye; and this too, without being sure that they are worth tracing at all.

Conceive then what our pleasure must be, when those who have a right to judge, pronounce our little Journal to have done well, both in spirit and letter; acknowledge the veracity with which we profess to love the objects of our worship, and acquit us of having done them dishonour; nay, recommend our recommendations of them; and above all, though of various parties themselves, and therefore habitually disposed (as it might be thought) to countenance no neutral ground of any sort taken up by one who has fought hard in partizanship himself, unite heartily in approving this cultivation of one sequestered spot in the regions of literature, where party itself is negated as of inferior good to the progress of mankind, and love enshrined as the only final teacher of all knowledge and advancement? No new religion, truly; an ancient and most proclaimed one; and too sacred and wonderful to have justice done it in these small chapels built for conventional persuasion. Yet herein, we conceive, lies our merit, whatever it may be. It is our ambition to be one of the sowers of a good seed in places where it is not common but would be most profitable, to be one of those who should try to render a sort of public loving-kindness a grace of common-life, a conventional, and for that very reason, in the higher sense of the word, a social and universal elegance. We dare to whisper in the ears of the wisest, and therefore of the all-hearing and the kindest-judging, that we would fain do something, however small and light, towards Christianizing public manners. If this effort, lightly as we presume to aid it, be too much for us,—if it be far too premature, too impracticable, too absurd,—if the old ways of advancing or benefitting mankind, are better, or not yet to be dispensed with,—and if the wise see nothing in this portion of our impulses but a mistake generated partly by suffering and partly by great animal spirits and an inveterate sanguineness, yet they will see, at any rate, that our mistake is a thing inclusive, that there are good things of necessity inside it,—and that if we end in doing nothing but extending a faith in capabilities of any sort, and showing some thousands of our fellow-creatures that sources of amusement and instruction await but a touch in the objects around them, to start up like magic, and enrich the meanest hut, perhaps the most satiated ennui, we shall have done something not unworthy to receive the countenance of their unanimity. A ship, going on a voyage of discovery, is privileged from attack, by great nations. A little fairy vessel, laden with cargoes of pleasant thoughts, would, if it could appear, doubtless receive no less the grace of their exemption.

We are constantly receiving letters telling us how rejoiced the writers are to see a paper of this sort set up, how it confirms or renews their hopes, how it brings back a feeling of youth to the old, makes considerate the petulance of the young, and brightens the aspect of the most familiar objects. Do we take too much credit for this! May heaven so prosper our undertakings, as we can truly say No. An author after a certain time of life, and long struggles, and discoveries painful to his self-love, and (we must add) after discovering that the best thing in him is the love of what is apart from him, and which has no more to do with himself than with every one else,—perhaps also we should say, after being used to the praises of the good-natured,—grows comparatively unambitious of eulogies on a purely literary account. He has learned to make deductions from their applicability to him; and above all, he has learnt (but with pleasure, not with pain) to make deductions from the enthusiasm of the good-hearted, and to know, or think he knows, how much may remain his due, after the proper allowances for the colouring reflected from their own pleasure and their own natures. People like our Journal because they like the things it talks about, and because they see a writer who believes in them, and has a cheerful religion. It is a difficult thing to state the amount of what liking may remain, for ourselves, personally or in a literary point of view; because, on such an occasion, candour and modesty run an equal chance of looking like an affectation. All self-reference runs a hazard of that cast; nor should we have made any, if it had not been impossible to touch upon the nature of a publication like this without it. Suffice to say, that without pretending not to be deeply sensible of approbation from some persons, on any score, by far the greater part of our delight on seeing the progress of this Journal has arisen from the additional proof it has afforded of the natural good-heartedness of men of all parties. Men only mistrust one another, because they think mistrust universal, and that others will not do them justice. They are better than they take each other for, often than they take themselves for; and many a man who feels his reputation in some things to be beyond his deserts, knows that he is mistaken and undervalued in others. If all the world (with a few diseased or monstrously educated exceptions) could see each other just as they are, they would lay down their recriminations with blushes, and embrace each other with pity and regard. The only thing they want is to be candid and compare notes, or to act lovingly as if they had done so; and thus when they see a man who has suffered enough and enjoyed enough so to act, they hail him and believe in him, because they believe in themselves. They feel that he does them justice,—does justice to the natures of most, and the capabilities of all; and therefore they come willingly forth to warm their hands and their hearts, at the fire which he has taken upon him to light.

In addition to the acknowledgments we have made to periodicals, whose continued encouragement is delightful to us, we have now to offer our best thanks to others of all parties, and shades of party, and such as do honour to their respective causes by their zeal and talents,—some of them of the first order,—to the Atlas, to the True Sun, to the Glasgow Argus, the Northern Herald (Belfast), the Western Independent (Paisley), the Northampton Mercury (not Herald, as was formerly mistaken), the Leeds Mercury, the Birmingham Journal, the Scotsman, the Dublin papers, with others which we have heard of but not seen, and are afraid of misnaming. The fiercest and most anarchy-loving Radicals (as they are supposed) have, with equal warmth and modesty, commended the humanities and the graces advocated by this Journal, in the person of one of their most popular champions, Mr. Cleave; even the uproarious Fraser, whose comfort doth not lie too much on the side of the dulcet, trieth to conclude a sour smile with a sort of sweetness; and lo! the very Jupiter of the Olympus of Toryism, Christopher North himself, parting on either side from him his muttering thunders and his admonished gods, and dressing his looks at the thought of the everlasting Love, bursteth through those cloudy inferiorities, and descendeth in sunshine on our bit of the Golden Age. Metaphor apart, most heartily do we forget old enmities,—most heartily have we long forgotten them, since we found in what loving corners of the heart enmities themselves may grow out of mistakes, and what identity of object may be pursued by different opinions. A man of genius, such as that of the editor of Blackwood, cannot, by the very tenure of his genius, by the poetry of his nature, but desire all the best and noblest things for the world, whatever he may think of the amount of their possibility; and so desiring, he cannot but hail any belief in them, in the sincerity and durability of which he has become convinced; for he knows that such a belief is good for its own sake, and its own poetry, even should it end in producing no happier prose. There are a few words, at the beginning of his notice of this Journal, connecting us with the dearest of our friends, for which alone we should be inclined to love him, nine parts out of ten, had he said even nothing further: and he will not take it amiss, if we add, that we had another friend, with whom he would have shared a mutual admiration had he known him, and with whose writings should we ever find him getting better acquainted (for we can only think he has hitherto but impatiently glanced, not steadily looked at him), we shall love him the remaining tenth. He will know whom we mean; one, who was idly said to be killed by the criticism of the Quarterly Review; but whose end, though assuredly none the happier for want of success, was long visible in a frame of extreme sensibility, and delicacy of organization, and was hastened by affectionate vigils at the bed of a dying brother. Alas! hard are the trials through which we go: there is no doubt of that; and harder the thought that we might have done more to lessen those of others, and hasten better times; but in construing things kindly, we acquire a right to think kindly of ourselves; and Mr. Keats's Life was neither so short nor so unhappy as many might suppose it. He lived ten years to another's one. His thoughts, for the most part, were steeped in the riches of a generous heart and a luxuriant imagination. Good God! why are not all men of genius of one mind, like natural brothers? and why do they not make a point of knowing one another, and preventing unworthy impressions? They would carry the world before them (God willing). And so they will, we trust, some day, spinning it like ivory, with easy fingers; for goodwill is surely God's will, and "peace" and "goodwill" are to increase, both according to reverend prophecies and to new signs. Happy they, meanwhile, who can piece out imperfect pretensions with perfect love, casting out the fear even of being considered vain and assuming.

TABLE-TALK.

Admiration and Contempt. Of unwise admiration much may be hoped, for much good is really in it; but unwise contempt is itself a negation; nothing comes of it, for it is nothing.—Carlyle.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We are obliged to Mr. I. J. for the extract from the review of Mr. Landor's book; but another gentleman, who possesses a copy of the book itself, has been kind enough to lend it us.

We fear we cannot gratify our friend D. G. in the regular addition to our plan which he proposes. It is much easier to wish to be able to do these things, than to do them.

The "Return," from the German of Mückler, shall be inserted. Also the letters of J. D. and E. E. upon Goethe. We shall have much pleasure also in publishing the sonnet to Earine, but do not at present exactly understand the connexion between the last three words of the twelfth line and the context.

We regret that we were unable to avail ourselves of the ticket sent us for the shew of Dahlias at the Zoological Gardens. But we shall forget neither the subject, nor the sender.

T. D.'s paper shall be carefully read.

What is the age of TENTATOR? and of the correspondent who writes on "Gallantry?"

Mr. W. of Kensington has obliged us. We will refer to the book he mentions.

We shall gladly take up the subject recommended by W. J.

OBJECTS OF THE LONDON JOURNAL.

MONTAIGNE says, that he delights to ring the word "pleasure" in the ears of philosophers who affect to despise it, and who are as fond of it as any men, after their fashion. Since the setting up of this cheerful and most Christian journal, we have known but two instances of objection to it; and to these we answer, that the very grounds of their objection are those which have procured us two hundred approbations. One of these objections was in a criticism, begging us not to "affect" so much sentiment (as if, because the writer would have "affected" so much, had he shown it, that therefore we did);—the other implied that we were invariably too pleased, and with not enough reason,—that we fetched our satisfaction out of too many common things, and did not succeed after all. For the success, we can luckily refer to other readers: and as to the rest, it was our plan and system, and forms the very essence, utility, and prosperity of our journal. Our object was to put more sunshine into the feelings of our countrymen, more good will and good humour, a greater habit of being pleased with one another and with everything, and therefore a greater power of dispensing with uneasy sources of satisfaction. We wished to create one corner and field of periodical literature, in which men might be sure of hope and cheerfulness, and of the cultivation of peaceful and flowery thoughts, without the accompaniment of anything inconsistent with them; we knew that there was a desire at the bottom of every human heart to retain a faith in such thoughts, and to see others believe in the religion and recommend it; and heartily have anxious as well as happy readers in this green and beautiful England responded to our belief. We condemn no other publication, conducted honestly, on different principles. There is a noble as well as ignoble warfare, and the time for either, for aught we know, may not have gone by. We condemn none of the mysterious struggles of humanity, even the most passionate, some of them perhaps nobler and more necessary than our ceasing to struggle in that sort; on the contrary, in "sympathizing with all," how can we leave them out? But, as far as our own system of action goes, we may be allowed to cultivate a variety of endeavour, if it be only as a variety, and to confine ourselves to the hope of winning and persuading. There are green fields in the world, as well as fields of battle; and in making a grove, or a park, or other domestic elysium, people do not contemplate the introduction in it of fight and contest and sour speeches. A man may say if he pleases, "I cannot live in your peaceful grounds, with their trees and sunshine, where all which is alive is happy or comforted, and the tragedies are nothing but old stories: I must go and get up a sensation at the police office, or the hospital, or the butcher's, or read a lampoon, or some writing worse than my own, or get up a superiority to somebody somehow, in order to keep myself in heart with myself." Let him go. Nay, we will go with him, provided he will let us find things to be a little better than he takes them for, even himself; for the reader will bear us witness that we avoid no places for their homeliness, and can vindicate the supposed "weed" as well as the accepted flower. But it does not follow that our ground is not a good ground, for all this; or that people have not reason to like it; especially as they are apt to have troubles enough elsewhere, and all but the very restless or thoughtless like to have some sequestered spot to repose in,—personally, if they can get it,—mentally, if they have not wealth or leisure enough, or a green neighbourhood. The London Journal is a sort of park for rich and poor, for the reflecting and well-intentioned of all sorts; where every one can be alone, or in company, as he thinks fit, and see, with his mind's eye, a succession of Elysian sights, ancient and modern, and as many familiar objects to boot, or hear nothing but birds and waterfalls, or the comforted beatings of his own heart,—all effected for him by no greater magician than Good Faith and a little reading. Good Faith is his host, and Reading the page that brings books to his host; and Love has ordained, that Good Faith, and a little reading, shall be able to do such wonders for us, as reading's biggest brothers with no faith at all, shall have no notion of. Children and men co-exist in the world; and the child and the man must co-exist in the little world of man's individuality, in order that he may see at once manfully and with delight. "Except ye become as little children," &c. We would not lightly apply so great a text; but the greatness of the text includes every degree of loving applicability; and as there is nothing in the world which is not supernatural in one sense,—as the very world of fashion itself rolls round with the stars, and is a part of the mystery and the variety of the shews of the universe,—so nothing, in a contemptuous sense, is small, or unworthy of a grave and calm hope, which tends to popularize Christian refinement, and to mix it up with every species of social intercourse, as a good realized, and not merely as an abstraction preached. What! Have not philosophy and christianity long since met, in the embrace of such loving discoveries? And do not the least and most trivial things, provided they have an earnest and cheerful good will, partake of some right of greatness, and the privilege to be honoured? if not with admiration of their wisdom, yet with acknowledgment of the joy which is the end of wisdom, and which it is the privilege of a loving sincerity to reach by a short road. Hence we have had two objections, and two hundred encouragements; and excellent writers of all sorts, and of all other shades of belief, have hastened to say to us, "Preach that, and prosper." Have not the Times, and the Examiner, and the Atlas, and the Albion, and the True Sun, and twenty other newspapers, hailed us for the very sunniness of our religion? Does not that old and judicious Whig, the Scotsman, waive his deliberate manner in our favour, and "cordially" wish us success for it? Does not the radical Glasgow Argus, in an eloquent article, "fresh and glowing" as his good will, expressly recommend us for its pervading all we write upon, tears included? And the rich-writing Tory, Christopher North, instead of objecting to the entireness of our sunshine, and requiring a cloud in it, does he not welcome it, aye, every week, as it strikes on his breakfast-cloth, and speak of it in a burst of bright-heartedness, as "dazzling the snow?"

Of a truth, it would not be difficult for us, old soldiers as we are, and accustomed to rougher labours in former times, to summon up a little of our old battle-grip, and lay a young gentleman or so double on the green sward, after the fashion of Entellus or Abraham Cann. Easily could we take him in hand, and lift him off his ground, and lock up his meditated "fibbing," and so trussing head and heels together, make a soft present of him to his mother earth. But cui bono? Where would be the good of it, even to himself? And why hurt the better use of his faculties, which we hope he will turn to handsomer account? Has not every man and every cause, in this imperfect state of things, a side on which he or it may be assailed, so far as to make him ridiculous (if there is the wit to do it) or uncomfortable, or to vex or injure him in some way or other? And shall we violate our principles, even out of resentment, and join in keeping up so old a story, and (as it appears to us) so useless a ground of re-action,—helping to sow new hostilities by very reason of our objecting to old? Not we. We are willing to be differed with to whatever honest extreme, and to answer, as well as we can, all objections, which we have no reason to believe disingenuous; but nothing but a matter of life and death to our Journal shall induce us to be hostile with anybody; and after these announcements, coupled with the hazards of all sorts which we have encountered in old times, we think it will be held something a little worse than superfluous to assail us after a hostile fashion. We are at peace with all; and as we seek the common good, and sail under white banners, we gladly receive the encouragement, and feel ourselves under the protection, of all who honestly pursue it, even by rougher means. It is not of endeavours such as we are, without arms, insulting nobody, and offending no public manners, that generous warriors will make an exception to their letters of license.

Still blow then, ye fair winds, and keep open upon us, ye blue heavens,—or rather, still shine in the whiteness of thy intention, thou fair flag, even against the blackest cloud, and still hail us as ye go, all gallant brother voyagers, and encourage us to pursue the kindly task which Love and Adversity have taught us, touching at all curious shores of reality and romance, endeavouring to make them know and love one another, to learn what is good against the roughest elements, or how the suffering that cannot be remedied may be best endured, to bring news of hope and joy and exaltation from the wings of the morning and the uttermost parts of the sea, making familiar companions, but not the less revered on that account, of the least things on earth and the greatest things apart from it,—of the dust and the globe, and the divided moon, of sun and stars, and the loneliest meetings of man's thought with immensity, which is not too large for his heart, though it be for his knowledge, because knowledge is but man's knowledge, but the heart has a portion of God's wisdom, which is love.

Have we none but bright subjects to talk of? No: no more than the sun-beam strikes upon none but bright objects, though it helps to make them bright. But may we not shine, if we can, upon the dullest, and show there is more in it than the dull suspect? May we not shine upon coldness, and warm it? Upon sorrow, and comfort it? May we not also endeavour to add confidence to joy, and show it how rich it is in the commonest coin of the visible? And is not this, instead of confining ourselves to one view of anything, not rather throwing the universal light of day (hitherto insufficiently valued) upon objects of all sorts, not excepting the darkest as well as the commonest? Does the human heart, in its struggles, require such comfort, or does it not? And is not its comfort extended (at least with all minds wise enough to be generous, and to know a good when they see it) by the very sight of so much belief in good, especially when unconquered by suffering?

We trust, that as this is the first, so it will be the last time we shall think it advisable to touch upon a point that forces us upon one of those appearances of egotism, which the egotistical are so ready to denounce; but as we have really no misgivings about the matter, we shall conclude this article, while we are about it, with some beautiful and affecting verses which have been addressed to us, and which have seasonably arrived to contribute to that very confidence, which, on any other occasion perhaps they might have dashed: for the praise from a friend, which is triumphantly seized upon as a shield against objection, might well beget a blushing doubt if only worn as an ornament. But see how little this gentleman, who is one of the most accomplished persons of our acquaintance, a wit, a scholar, and a musician, doubts the desirableness of our mode of conveying comfort; and with what instinctive beauty, like the flowers of which he writes, his thoughts issue out of their dark ground, and climb upon the stalk of their natural ascendancy, and stand in consummate elegance, giving out the fragrance of their hearts, and looking with pensive superiority upon the earth from whence they rose. Great, unquestionably, are his troubles, greater, in some respects, from the very prime of his life, and from the natural and acquired advantages he possesses; but assuredly the greater will be his triumph over them; for is he not able to bring beauty out of sorrow, to seize the smallest occasions for the greatest comfort, and to gather to him the hearts of his friends in sympathy and in zeal? It has been observed of the deaf, that they are not apt to be so cheerful as the blind; and it is true, and for an obvious reason. Being able to help themselves on many occasions, they are too much left to shift for themselves on all, and are thus too often deprived of the sweetest advantage of society, conversation; whereas, the blind man, helpless in all other respects, is helped not only to a double portion of that one, but to a ten-fold measure of love and service at all times. Let him keep it in God's name, and repay us twenty-fold with the delight of his blind eyes. But as deaf men, for these most pardonable reasons, are apt to be caustic and resentful, so we know not a more amiable sight on earth, than one, who in requiring a good measure of this help to consolation, cultivates the graces of patience and the willingness to be pleased, and without affecting to be insensible to his evils, turns them into attractions of love and reverence, and takes out of the endeavour to entertain him all pain, but that of not being able to convince him that he does not give any. It is true, in the instance before us, as much entertainment is brought as can be received, and the merit is thus lessened as far as a consciousness to that effect cannot but prevail over an undue modesty. Nor, considering his good faith in all other respects, do we despair of convincing our friend that he has no reason to doubt any one's gladness to reciprocate entertainment with him. But we are keeping our readers from better things than prose. We make no apology of any general sort for publishing the verses, because, setting aside even their merit as such, we take them to be high evidences of the good which the design of this journal is doing with all ingenuous readers, and because the extension of a common sympathy, on any just grounds whatsoever, is one of its main objects.

TO A LITTLE BUNCH OF FLOWERS,
THE PRESENT OF L. H.

Sweet little family of happy birth,
Beautiful children of the earth!
Since ye are parted from the dewy breast
Of her that bore ye, and no more shall know
Provident Mother, let me careful show
How much I love you—serving as is best
Your simple wants;—here in this little fount,
Filled from the clearest waters of the brook,
Merge all your thirsty mouths, and from below
Sup upwards till the juicy spirit mount;
So your recruited heads shall overlook
With fresher beauty and a livelier grace
Your narrow dwelling place.

You the mild morning sun with temperate ray,
Shall visit rising, placed within this nook
That meets his kind but not his angry eye;
Here shall soft gales from open casement play,
And scatter all your sweetness as they fly;
And I your sober cup
Each day will new fill up
With the pure element ye love to quaff.
Here live and laugh;
And, if I promise well, you shall not say
Old Nature was a better nurse than I.
My little tender flowers, with all my care,
I fear, I fear, you soon must droop away!
Not long the sun, not long the vigorous air
Will be of power to save you from decay.

Emblem of fate too like! your fate I share.
As fade your rifled leaves, so fades my heart,
Clipped from the stem of hope whereon it grew;
Nor aught of sunshine now, nor pleasures new,
Nor Fortune's real favours could impart
The strength that from those early hopes it drew.
For where is now light-hearted laughing ease,
Where the bright flow of social spirits gay,
The thought harmonious with the blessed day,
The power of pleasure, and the power to please?
Where is content, and the free careless mind,
And trusting joy that never looked behind,
And perseverance rising from each fall,
And health—and health—the parent of them all?

Oh! gone—for ever gone; and in their room
Deafness—Disease—and morbid sense I find,
And solitary gloom!
If that my life be short, the need is more
To pray that it in kindness may be passed;
Like you, ye flowers, I fain would learn the way
To cherish still some sweetness to the last.
Then teach me;—teach me for his sake for whom Ye are so sweet,—the friend to whom I turn
As the scared dreamer to the morning light,
Nor ever turn in vain, for shining store
Of thoughts, and happy words, and visions bright
Of Love and Goodness conquering in the night
Of Truth, of rich contentment to be sought
Amid the fields and in the poet's lore,
And gentle lessons, little flowers, from you.
Say what the secret of your virtue is,
Teach me your sweet philosophy and his.
For whether 'twere the same that Plato drew
From the old wisdom, or his pupil taught,—
The doctrine quaint of old Diogenes,
Of Epicurus mild, or Zeno stern,—
Gentle or hard—did he but love it too,
That would I learn.

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 3rd, to Tuesday the 9th September.

WOODS AND NUTTING.

As this is a season when woods are in the perfection of their woodiness, underwood and all, and people like to fancy themselves inside of them, if they have not the luck to be able to go there, we give this week a letter of Gray's, in which he describes himself as enjoying such a spot; and have followed it with the welcome contribution of a correspondent on Nutting. The letter is dated "September," but mentions no day of the month; so it suits our month, and does not contradict our week. There is pleasant mention of Southern, at the end of it.

GRAY TO HORACE WALPOLE.

September, 1737.

I was hindered in my last, and so could not give you all the trouble I would have done. The description of a road, which your coach-wheels have so often honoured, it would be needless to give you; suffice it that I arrived safe at my uncle's, who is a great hunter in imagination; his dogs take up every chair in the house, so I am forced to stand at this present writing; and though the gout forbids him galloping after them in the field, yet he continues still to regale his ears with their comfortable noise. . . . He holds me mighty cheap, I perceive, for walking when I should ride, and reading when I should hunt. My comfort amidst all this is, that I have at the distance of half-a-mile; through a green lane, a forest (the vulgar call it a common), all my own, at least as good as so, for I spy no human thing in it but myself. It is a little chaos of mountains and precipices; mountains, it is true, that do not ascend much above the clouds, nor are the declivities quite so amazing as Dover cliff; but just such hills as people who love their necks as well as I do, may venture to climb, and crags that give the eye as much pleasure as if they were more dangerous; both vale and hill are covered with most venerable beeches, and other very reverend vegetables, that like most other ancient people, are always dreaming out their old stories to the winds.

And, as they bow their hoary tops, relate,
In murmuring sounds, the dark decrees of fate;
While visions, as poetic eyes avow,
Cling to each leaf, and swarm on every bough.

At the foot of one of these squats me (if penseroso), and there I grow to the trunk for a whole morning. The timorous hare and sportive squirrel gambol around me like Adam in Paradise, before he had an Eve; but I think he did not use to read Virgil as I commonly do there. In this situation I often converse with my Horace, aloud too, that is, talk to you; but I do not remember that I ever heard you answer me. I beg pardon for taking all the conversation to myself, but it is entirely your own fault. We have old Mr Southern at a gentleman's house a little way off; he is now seventy-seven years old, and has almost wholly lost his memory; but is as agreeable as an old man can be; at least I persuade myself so, when I look at him, and think of Isabella and Oroonoko. I shall be in town in about three weeks. Adieu.

NUTTING DAY.

(For the London Journal.)

We never look upon an apple-stall in one of the hot, dusty streets of the metropolis, in Autumn, nor see on it the finely clustered heap of filberts, retailing at "a penny a pint" to the lucky urehin who possesses so much of this world's wealth, but we think upon our joyous nutting days at school. We bring straightway before our "mind's eye" the portly figure of our reverend pedagogue, as on a fine September evening he would announce to our greedy ears that he had given us the morrow for "nutting day." What hasty packing up of bags! Virgil without the boards, Ovid ditto title-page and preface, and our huge dictionary, of which we were so proud, are gladly and unceremoniously thrust away from "human ken" for a day; and then our search at home for our nutting-bag, laid away since last season, and our journey to the pleasant copse to cut a hooked stick, so that we may have nothing left to do in the morning. Then, when the morning arrived, what eager peeping out to see if the day were fine; verily our toilet then was soon made, and our nice brown bread and milk neglected when compared with our usual repast thereof on a school day; how carelessly did we thrust the packet of bread and cheese, made up for us by our prudent landlady, into our aforesaid nutting-bag; for, in truth, we were too much filled with pleasurable anticipations to be able to contain such an earthly commodity as food. We well remember the select companions who composed our party; methinks we hear them even now extolling the merits of the copse to which we were bending our steps, describing the thickness of the clusters, and debating at what place we ought to ford the river. Now are our shoes and stockings pulled off and carefully tied to the button of our jacket—and now we cross the broad cooling river, holding the youngest by the hand to prevent the stream from knocking him over. Now have we arrived, and joyously look on the rich mellow-tinted bushes, drooping with the weight of the ripe fruit; the elder boys suppress the hurrah of the younger ones, for fear of attracting other parties to rob us of the spoil. Now do we separate, but a peculiar whistle will bring us soon together again. The pliant boughs bend under the influence of our stick, and start back relieved of the weight which before oppressed them; nimbly our fingers go to work, and our bag, widening like an alderman's stomach, and our aching shoulders, tell us that we shall soon have as much as our limbs can bring away with ease. Hark! our companions whistle; they, too, have been busy, and call on us to rejoin them. Whither shall we go to eat our repast?—why under the shade of the fine elm which grows at yonder curve of the river, and where we can get our cups filled from the clear spring which runs hard by.

Our bread and cheese, rather crushed by the concussion of boughs pressing against our pockets, is relished with a gusto we did not think possible when we took it in the morning; and by and by we are joined by merry troops, returning home after a successful expedition, and we hear many accounts of adventurous doings in preserves, and chases by the gamekeepers; and, chatting in such-like manner, we return to the village, displaying our treasures to the natives, and cracking our nuts and jokes in all the light-heartedness of youth and health.

J. S.

We think we cannot do better than conclude this sylvan week with descriptions of another lover of nutting, and some foreign kindred of his, from the pens of Mr and Mrs Howitt. The authors designed them for young readers; but we hardly need repeat, that good young reading is good reading for any age.

THE SQUIRREL.

From "Sketches of Natural History," by Mary Howitt.

The pretty red Squirrel lives up in a tree,
A little blithe creature as ever can be:
He dwells in the boughs where the Stockdove broods,
Far in the shades of the green summer woods;
His food is the young juicy cone of the pine,
And the milky beech nut is his bread and his wine;
In the joy of his nature he frisks with a bound,
To the top-most twigs, and then down to the ground,
Then up again, like a winged thing,
And from tree to tree, with a vaulting spring;
Then he sits up aloft, and looks waggish and queer,
As if he would say, "Ay, follow me here!"
And then he grows frettish, and stamps his foot,
And then independently cracks his nut;
And thus he lives the long summer thorough,
Without a care or a thought of sorrow.
But small as he is, he knows he may want,
In the bleak winter weather when food is scant:
So he finds a hole in an old tree's core,
And there makes his nest, and lays up his store;
Then when cold winter comes and the trees are bare,
When the white snows are falling, and keen is the air,
He heeds it not, as he sits by himself,
In his warm little nest, with his nuts on his shelf.
O wise little Squirrel! no wonder that he,
In the green summer woods is as blithe as can be.

THE MIGRATION OF THE GREY SQUIRRELS.

By William Howitt.

When in my youth I travelled,
Throughout each north country,
Many a strange thing did I hear,
And many a strange thing see.

I sat with the small men in their huts,
Built of the drifted snow;
No fire had we but the seal oil lamp,
No other light did know.

There were hundreds then in the hollow holes
Of the old, old trees did dwell,
And laid up their store, hard by the door,
Of the sweet mast as it fell.

But soon the hungry wild Swine came,
And with thievish snouts dug up
Their buried treasure, and left them not
So much as an acorn cup!

Then did they chatter in angry mood,
And one and all decree,
Into the forests of rich stone pine
Over hill and dale to flee.

Over hill and dale, over hill and dale,
For many a league they went;
Like a troop of undaunted travellers,
Governed by one consent.

But the Hawk and Eagle, and peering Owl,
Did dreadfully pursue;
And the further the grey Squirrels went,
The more their perils grew.
When lo! to cut off their pilgrimage,
A broad stream lay in view.

But then did each wond'rous creature shew
His cunning and bravery;
With a piece of the pine bark in his mouth
Unto the stream came he.

And boldly his little bark he launched,
Without the least delay;
His bushy tail was his upright sail,
And he merrily steered away.

Never was there a lovelier sight
Than that grey Squirrels' fleet;
And with anxious eyes I watched to see
What fortune it would meet.

Soon had they reached the rough mid-stream,
And ever and anon
I grieved to behold some small bark wrecked,
And its little steersman gone.

But the main fleet stoutly held across,
I saw them leap to shore;
They entered the woods with a cry of joy,
For their perilous march was o'er.

OUR READERS WHISKED TO THE CONTINENT,

For so we may say they will find themselves, while perusing the following extracts from Reminiscences of the Rhine, Switzerland, and a Corner of Italy, just published, from the pen of a lady. She calls them "Slight" Reminiscences; but why so? They are solid pictures, whenever she chose to make them such; the slightness is in the tone; and with all due deference to the modesty which suggested the epithet, she would have felt it to be less applicable to her recollections, had she less condescended to a certain light and bantering air, exacted by the world of fashion from those who are wise enough to be pleased with anything, and of whose wisdom it is jealous. Our authoress is a genuine painter, having feeling, force, beauty, imagination, and colouring. Why should she always, or generally, mix up a certain conventional levity, of the undervaluing order, with her gravest impressions; or at least think it necessary to follow them up with something of that sort? Her occasional world may be the world of fashion, but her real world is the great world of nature and heaven and the domestic affections; and she should never condescend to mix up the tone of the two things. We should take her, by the variety of her powers, and the happy readiness of her style,—her command of words,—to be a sister of Mrs Gore; but Mrs Gore seems to have the serious welfare of matters more at heart, without such perhaps being really the case. Our authoress is full of feeling and grace and gaiety. We like her so much, that we want to have no fault discoverable in her (of the unsympathizing sort) not even the use of some slang phrases, that have got into the circles. The volumes have some spirited sketches in them, which do credit to the amateur artist—we hope, her husband; for writing of one sort, and writing of another, would thus go handsomely together. We must not omit the very pleasant dedication,—we will not say "brief as woman's love," but sweet as woman's love. It is as follows:—"To the Dear Companion of my Journey and my Life, these Pages are affectionately inscribed."

The Rhine.—[We never saw the Rhine so well painted to our taste before.] Two or three miles higher up than Coblenz, the river makes a superb sweep in the midst of delicious scenery; castles rising on one crag, and ruins hanging on another. The Lahn, issuing from its fresh-cradle, throws itself into the Rhine, just opposite to the village of Kappellau, and flowing between the sweet island-looking peninsulas of Oberlahnstein and Niederlahnstein, with their churches and trees, villages and ruins, forms a picture full of gentle beauty.

We have now a garden country, thickly planted with fruit-trees, to Rahens, an old Swissish kind of town or rather village. Painted houses of all shapes, looking as if an enormous weight had fallen down on their roofs, and pressed them out of their fair proportions.

Still moving on through a continued garden. Hills of all shapes and various beauty, and, now and then a castle, or rather its ruins in a bold position at the opening of a green or wooded gorge, with a village or church at its base, stand out shouldering the heavens. A soft, half-sunny day, lights and shadows, but no glare; perhaps the most favourable sky for scenery.

The valley soon narrows; sometimes the mountains descend abruptly to the river, leaving just space enough for the road, and again retreat, as if to make way for a stripe of vines, or an orchard meadow. At this moment something very large and flat sweeps slowly round a wooded projection: it is a raft floating down from Switzerland to some port of Holland. It passes heavily along, though favoured by the current, and aided by many hands; I counted 130 persons, all, or nearly all, employed in its navigation. A wooden construction in the centre serves as a place of shelter for both men and merchandize. Forests of timber are thus floated down the Rhine from the valleys of the Murg, the Neckar, &c. This was but a small affair; the large rafts are sometimes a thousand feet long, and peopled as thickly as Noah's ark. The passage must be a dull one for any but an inveterate draughtsman, who may sketch at his ease, and linger upon the minutiae as he would upon a picture suspended before him on a wall. And so may all those who struggle up the Rhine in the passage boat, which must, however, be the favourite mode of conveyance here, for we have scarcely met a traveller or seen a carriage since we left Gottisberg. The pilgrims of idleness or fashion, who draw or drive through Switzerland, swearing 'tis wondrous fine, or beshrewing the rumbling cars, noisy inns, and impracticable mountains, seem to overlook the Rhine—heaven bless them for it. One may still stand at a window here, and look at something more interesting than the parties that spread themselves over all the attainable spots on the Oberlands; English ladies in their long cloaks, voyaging shoes, and dragged petticoats; German students in their caps of defiance; artists, amateurs, and all the miscellaneous rabble that defy classification.

At Boppard, a town (every cluster of cottages in this beautiful Rhenish calls itself a town) of the narrowest lanes I ever passed through in a four-wheeled carriage, we found ourselves again in the midst of gardens and vines, trained prettily into trellised walks and southern-looking alcoves. To the left, ruins rise upon dark rocks, and stretch their fragments from point to point out of the shattered crags. Towns and villages lie basking on the river's brink, mingled with foliage and the mouldering remains of the turreted walls, within which even the most insignificant appears to have been enclosed in the by-gone day of its strength.

At Salzig the river makes another noble bend, and the mountains, folding each other, take the bold character of wild lake scenery. We would willingly linger for some days at the clean and comfortable inn at St Goar, looking at the river rolling its broad tide proudly, as if conscious of all the charming things on its banks, and clambering up to the mouldering castles that make pictures of all the hills; but it is not feasible,—so much the better for the shy lizards who are sunning themselves on the old walls this bright day, and for the swifts and lapwings, hereditary possessors of the loopholes and buttresses, to whose unaccustomed ears the fall of footsteps would sound like battering rams. However, it is a bright and beautiful scene, even from the windows, and I sat in one with the shade on my side, and the sun on the landscape, indulging my dreaming propensities, and peopling the mountain solitudes with the friends of early days.

This is quite a beautiful place, such a gathering of castles. Above, the fortress of Rheinfels, bearing itself fiercely through in ruins; on the opposite mountain-ridge, Katz, a true painter's castle, in the right stage of picturesque decay, clustering its towers with the thousand hues of time upon them round the summit of a rocky height: and beneath, a green lap of land advancing gently into the river, with a bright looking village upon it, and a mixing up of boats moored in the sun, and cows reposing in the shade,—an harmonious blending of past and present, and their associations, which fills the eye and mind delightfully. Another castle (Mause) with the village of Wilnich below it, close up the valley.

That holy man, St Goar, had the true hermit instinct for the beautiful and romantic. It seems to have been left by the early fathers of the desert as a legacy to those who came after them to preach the faith. In Catholic countries, a stranger's attention is rarely attracted by a site of peculiar majesty or loveliness, that a monastery or its vestiges may not be seen or traced upon it. A little beyond the village of St Goar, we tried the effect of an echo, prodigiously vaunted by our conductor. The reverberating rocks returned the blast of a trumpet with electrifying fulness. It had all the essentials, I believe, of a fine echo, the dying fall, and countless reverberations. All here is dark and powerful; the black rocks, scanty vegetation, and narrowing river, continue the character of wild lake scenery, for which the garden gaieties of the Rhine, between Coblenz and St Goar, are now exchanged. But now again another charming picture stands out brightly in the evening sunbeams—the castle of Schonberg exquisitely perched above the town of Oberwessel, of whose tower and ramparts enough still remain to vouch for its former consequence. The tender green of the walnut falls in well here, and does all, or nearly all, the honours of the wooded scenery.

Another raft has just passed down, followed by a boat laden with vegetables, and a gay freight of bare-headed girls; some steering, others rowing, and all as merry as light hearts and sunny skies can make them. This alternation of bright touches with the sombre colouring of dark rocks and stern defiles, of the prismatic hues and mysterious gloom of nature, is fine and original. Cities and peopled fortresses sending out the fulness of life, and blending its agitation with the solitude of the mountain recesses, with the inaccessible rock and the crumbling ruin, are not the common elements of every day scenery; nor is the effect produced on the mind by their combination of an ordinary nature.

An island, with a tower upon it, has just brought out its legend from the loquacious D—. A pithy tale of some wicked priest or baron—I have forgotten which—seized upon by his harassed and exasperated vassals, and thrown into a cave to be devoured by rats,—a death imitating Don Roderick's in horror. But there is no end here to traditionary lore, to tales of marauding lords, fierce priests, and faithful but ill-fated lovers.

The village girls on the Rhine are often very handsome. I think it was at Coblenz, that we first observed their fine eyes and fine shapes, and their pretty mode of dividing the hair into long smooth tresses, platted and turned up round the back of the head, as the young women in the Venetian states are fond of wearing it; but they add a single full-blown rose, and look like Poussin's Arcadians, or the shepherdesses of the valley of Tempe. This beautiful hair is here the young female's chief embellishment; it is usually light coloured, and always glossy and luxuriant. At Bacharach, a sort of town, with carved doors, painted houses, vines and ramparts, we remarked some very pretty girls; one of tall stature, and barefooted, stood by the road-side with a pitcher on her head, holding a child by the hand, and talking to an old man who sat on a stone beside her; it was an antique bas-relief coloured into life. This Bacharach was the Rhenish Falernus; whether its vines still retain their ancient reputation, or have yielded to the superior strength or more exquisite perfume of the Hochem or Johannisberg, I know not. But the altar of Bacchus (a stone in the river, so called from tradition) still remains; the waters of the Rhine still ripple round it; and the vine dressers have not yet ceased to believe that an abundant vintage may be reckoned upon, whenever the face of the prophetic stone is visible above the wave.

Castles and villages thicken so upon us that we are as weary of asking their names, as the faithful D—is of answering us. It is now the supper hour, and every mountain is marked by thin wreaths of blue smoke, ascending slowly from its base. Troops of boys and girls are driving the cows down from the hills, and turning them into the cottages, which they appear to share with their master. The kine belong to Pharaoh's leah stock, but the children are Correggio's very best. I never saw so many bright happy little faces. They kiss their hands to us, as we pass, and when they find themselves noticed, drop quaint curtsies and try to throw a demure look into their beautiful and peculiarly shaped blue eyes.

Swiss, French, and Italian Females.—It was on the same evening, as we wandered about in the churchyard of Lungern, looking at the tombs decorated with buds and flowers, and medallions wrought in iron, painted and gilt, according to the wealth, vanity, or affectionate feeling of the survivors, that we met two handsome young women, inhabitants of Meyringhen, going onwards to their village, just as the day declined. I remember expressing my surprise at their venturing through the forests of the Brunig at so late an hour, for they could not have expected to reach Meyringhen till long after midnight. But our guides assured us that the most lonely path might be traversed at any hour in safety; midnight, they said, was the same as mid-day. I thought of Moore's exquisite 'rich and rare.' Those girls, too, had their jewels of silver and jewels of gold super-added to their beauty, which provoketh thieves sooner than either, as we are told by higher authority, but went their way fearlessly, in darkness and in solitude, sure to arrive unharmed. This is a cheering view of human nature, a setting off against the zebras of Grindelwald. It was charming to think of it, and to know that there is even now a spot, and a lonely one, where innocence is still held sacred, and honesty a part of natural growth, an innate feeling, not only theoretically reputable, but actually practised. I had a notion that this same honesty was a grafted virtue, like truth and temper, two qualities in which children, in an unsophisticated state, are usually deficient; but I was thinking, I suppose, of the pilfering Indians, or those tricking children of nature and coveters of glass beads and pen-knives, the Sandwich islanders, and willingly give up my hypothesis, as painful and perhaps unjust; for I know of few feelings more delightful than the kindly one which a favourable view of human nature diffuses over the mind, nor any to which the heart clings more fondly. Yet why should I conclude that the people of this valley are uninstructed? Have they not their pastors and their elders? And so, after all my golden reveries, and returns to primitive innocence, and innate principle, the same admirable property may be still the virtue of education.

The Swiss, planted as they are between Italy and France, which have each a foot in their territory, have nothing in common with either nation, as far as concerns the exterior. Nothing can be less French than a fair Swiss, unless it be a brown one. The light complexioned are more like the Scotch; they have a fresh, cold, clear look; the brown have not the rich eyes or mobility of countenance of the French; they are heavier, and produce less effect, even when they happen to have better features. It is astonishing with what poor tools a French girl contrives to make herself pretty, or at least to seem so; a Swiss peasant has no idea of this, she is as nature made her;

if a thought of display crosses her mind, it is expressed coarsely, it is the "cow dancing the courant,"—but in her simplicity she is often dignified. The women who work in the fields are in both countries black and baked, but when a French girl can afford to be smart, she asks but a pair of eyes, and the rest (usually coarse stuff) is somehow or other passed off by their eloquence. Both have frequently an expression of broad good humour, but in the one it is more personal, in the other more expressive.

Nor do the Swiss differ less from their other neighbours the Italians. There is sometimes a serious earnestness, an undressed fixedness of thought in the expression of an Italian countenance that is fine and natural, and a character of simple goodness. One occasionally meets with a childish sparkle, in some of the young faces, charming in its way; many are vacant and heavy, some hideous, from features, expression, and nastiness; but in the villages and vineyards, one not unfrequently sees single figures, and even groups, that look as if they had sate in Egypt under the tents of the patriarchs, and had come along with the stream of time, without a breath on their freshness, in all the natural grandeur and decent boldness of antique simplicity,—with a purity of outline, and a breadth and richness of drapery and colouring worthy of the old masters who painted with the book of Genesis open before them. I have never met with this style of figure in Switzerland; beauty is here rosy, quaint, round; or, if of a higher cast, which is rare, apt to verge on the masculine or stern.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

THREE TRAGEDIES OF CIVIL WAR.

We need not disclaim any antipathy to parties among our ancestors, much less to the erring or non-erring individuals of whom they were composed, when we draw upon the sympathies of our readers with the sufferings occasioned by mistakes on all sides. Even in the fiercest and most unrelenting exercise of the human will may sometimes be discerned the perversion of a thwarted desire for sympathy; and its worst evidences are not unaccompanied with something which finds an excuse for it in imperfections of education or parentage (we mean, of course, in the moral and physical sense, and not in the conventional). Let us be thankful when the moral storms of the world turn manifestly to good; and let us hope as much of the rest, and trust that its new lights will show us how they may be dispensed with by and by. There may be discoveries (we trust they are now making) which will render moral as well as physical electricity harmless, and enable what is called the "anger of heaven" to be known only in its beneficence of operation.

The following passages are taken from a little volume full of the Tory pepper and mustard of lampoon, entitled the Jacobite Minstrelsy of Scotland. We have long wished to meet again with the history of the affecting incident which moved Shenstone to write his ballad of "Jemmy Dawson," and here we found it, and seized upon it for our readers. We shall put the prose first, and the poetry afterwards, like a dirge over its grave. By the way, nobody thinks the worse of Shenstone's hero for being called "Jemmy;" though when Mr Wordsworth re-published his Lyrical Ballads, he absolutely thought himself obliged to leave out half the first line of one of them, because he had addressed his brother in it, as he was wont, by the title of "Dear brother Jem!" So reasonable is custom at one time, and so ridiculous at another, upon the same point!

XXXII.—EXECUTION OF CAPTAIN DAWSON.

SHENSTONE's ballad is commemorative of the melancholy and peculiarly hard fate of a youthful victim, who was sacrificed to the harsh and unrelenting policy of the government, at the period of its triumph in 1746. He was the son of a gentleman of Lancashire of the name of Dawson, and, while pursuing his studies at Cambridge, he heard the news of the insurrection in Scotland, and the progress of the insurgents. At that moment he had committed some youthful excesses which induced him to run away from his college, and either from caprice or enthusiasm, he proceeded to the north, and joined the Prince's army, which had just entered England. He was made an officer in Colonel Townly's Manchester regiment, and afterwards surrendered with it at Carlisle. Eighteen of that corps were the first victims selected for trial, and among these was young Dawson. They were all found guilty, and nine were ordered for immediate execution, as having been most actively and conspicuously guilty. Kennington Common was the place appointed for the last scene of their punishment, and, as the spectacle was to be attended with all the horrid barbarities inflicted by the British law of treason, a vast mob from London and the surrounding country assembled to witness it. The prisoners beheld the gallows, the block, and the fire, into which their hearts were to be thrown, without any dismay, and seemed to brave their fate on the scaffold with the same courage that had prompted them formerly to risk their lives in the field of battle. They also justified their principles to the last, for, with the ropes about their necks, they delivered written declarations to the sheriff, that they died in a just cause, they did not repent of what they had done, and that they doubted not but their deaths would be afterwards avenged. After being suspended for three minutes from the gallows, their bodies were stripped naked and cut down, in order to undergo the operation of beheading and embowelling. Colonel Townly was the first that was laid upon the block, but the executioner observing the body to retain some signs of life, he struck it violently on the breast, for the humane purpose of rendering it quite insensible to the remaining part of the punishment. This not having the desired effect, he cut the unfortunate gentleman's throat. The shocking ceremony of taking out the heart and throwing the bowels into the fire, was then gone through, after which the head was separated from the body with a cleaver, and both were put into a coffin. The rest of the bodies were thus treated in succession; and, on throwing the last heart into the fire, which was that of young Dawson, the executioner cried, "God save King George!" and the spectators responded with a shout. Although the rabble had hooted the unhappy gentlemen on their passage to and from their trials, it was remarked that at the execution their fate excited considerable pity, mingled with admiration of their courage. Two circumstances contributed to increase the public sympathy on this occasion, and caused it to be more generally expressed. The first was, the appearance at the place of execution of a youthful brother of one of the culprits of the name of Deacon, himself a culprit and under sentence of death for the same crime; but who had been permitted to attend this last scene of his brother's life, in a coach along with a guard. The other, was the fact of a young and beautiful female, to whom Mr Dawson had been betrothed, actually attending to witness his execution, as commemorated in the ballad. This singular fact is narrated, as follows, in most of the journals of that period.

"A young lady of good family and handsome fortune, had for some time extremely loved, and been equally beloved by Mr James Dawson, one of those unfortunate gentlemen who suffered at Kennington Common for high treason; and had he been acquitted, or, after condemnation, found the royal mercy, the day of his enlargement was to have been that of their marriage.

"Not all the persuasions of her kindred could prevent her from going to the place of execution; she was determined to see the last hour of a person so dear to her; and, accordingly, followed the sledges in a hackney coach, accompanied by a gentleman nearly related to her, and one female friend. She got near enough to see the fire kindled which was to consume that heart she knew was so much devoted to her, and all the other dreadful preparations for his fate, without being guilty of any of those extravagancies her friends had apprehended. But when all was over, and she found that he was no more, she drew her head back into the coach, and crying out, 'My dear, I follow thee—I follow thee. Sweet Jesus, receive both our souls together,' fell on the neck of her companion, and expired in the very moment she was speaking.

"That excess of grief, which the force of her resolution had kept smothered within her breast, it is thought, put a stop to the vital motion, and suffocated, at once, all the animal spirits."

Come listen to my mournful tale,
Ye tender hearts and lovers dear;
Nor will you scorn to heave a sigh,
Nor need you blush to shed a tear.

And thou, dear Kitty, peerless maid,
Do thou a pensive ear incline:
For thou canst weep at every woe,
And pity every plaint—but mine.

Young Dawson was a gallant boy,
A brighter never trode the plain;
And well he loved one charming maid,
And dearly was he loved again.

One tender maid, she loved him dear,
Of gentle blood the damsel came;
And faultless was her beauteous form,
And spotless was her virgin fame.

But curse on party's hateful strife
That led the favoured youth astray,
The day the rebel clans appeared,—
Oh, had he never seen that day.

Their colours and their sash he wore,
And in the fatal dress was found;
And now he must that death endure,
Which gives the brave their keenest wound.

How pale was then his true-love's cheeks,
When Jemmy's sentence reach'd her ear!
For never yet did Alpine snows,
So pale or yet so chill appear.

With falt'ring voice, she weeping said,
'Oh Dawson, monarch of my heart,
Think not thy death shall end our loves,
For thou and I will never part.

'Yet might sweet mercy find a place,
And bring relief to Jemmy's woes;
Oh, George! without a pray'r for thee,
My orisons would never close.

'The gracious prince that gave him life
Would crown a never-dying flame;
And every tender babe I bore
Should learn to lip the giver's name.

'But though he should be dragg'd in scorn
To yonder ignominious tree,
He shall not want one constant friend
To share the cruel fate's decree.'

O, then her mourning coach was call'd;
'The sledge mov'd slowly on before;
Though borne in a triumphal car,
She had not lov'd her fav'rite more.

She follow'd him, prepar'd to view
The terrible behests of law;
And the last scene of Jemmy's woes
With calm and stedfast eyes she saw.

Distorted was that blooming face,
Which she had fondly lov'd so long;
And stifled was that tuneful breath,
Which in her praise had sweetly sung;

And sever'd was that beauteous neck,
Round which her arms had fondly clos'd;
And mangled was that beauteous breast,
On which her love-sick head repos'd;

And ravish'd was that constant heart
She did to every heart prefer;
For though it could its King forget,
'Twas true and loyal still to her.

Amid those unrelenting flames,
She bore this constant heart to see;
But when 'twas moulder'd into dust,
'Yet, yet,' she cried, 'I follow thee.'

'My death, my death alone can shew
The pure, the lasting love I bore;
Accept, Oh Heaven! of woes like our's,
And let us, let us, weep no more.'

The dismal scene was o'er and past,
'The lover's mournful hearse retir'd;
The maid drew back her languid head,
And sighing forth his name—expir'd!

Though justice ever must prevail,
The tear my Kitty sheds is due;
For seldom shall she hear a tale,
So sad, so tender, yet so true.

XXXIII.—CRUELTY TOWARDS A WHIG.

One morning, in those evil days, a man of the name of John Brown, having performed the worship of God in his family, was going with a spade in his hand to make ready some peat-ground. The mist being very dark, he knew not where he was till the bloody Claverhouse compassed him with three troops of his horse, brought him to his house, and there examined him, who, though he was a man of stammering speech, yet answered both distinctly and solidly, which made Claverhouse examine those whom he had taken to be his guides through the muirs, if they had heard him preach? They answered, 'No, no, he was never a preacher.' To which he replied, 'If he has never preached, meikle has he prayed in his time.' He then said to John, 'Go to your prayers, for you shall immediately die.' When he was praying, Claverhouse interrupted him three times. One time that he interrupted him, he was praying that the Lord would spare a remnant, and not make a full end in the day of his anger. Claverhouse said, 'I gave you time to pray, and you are begun to preach.' He turned on his knees, and said, 'Sir, you know neither the nature of prayer nor preaching, that call this preaching;' then continued without confusion! His wife standing by, with her children in her arms that she had brought forth to him, and another child of his first wife's, he came to her and said, 'Now, Marion, the day is come, that I told you would come, when I first spoke to you of marrying me.' She said, 'Indeed, John, I can willingly part with you.' Then he said, 'This is all I desire; I have no more to do but to die.' He kissed his wife and bairns, and wished purchased and promised blessings to be poured upon them, and gave them his blessing. Claverhouse ordered six soldiers to shoot him; the most part of the bullets came upon his head, which scattered his brains upon the ground. Then said Claverhouse to the hapless widow, 'What thinkest thou of thy husband now, woman?' To which she answered, 'I thought ever much of him, and now as much as ever.' He said, 'It were justice to lay thee beside him.' She replied, 'If ye were permitted, I doubt not your cruelty would go that length; but how will ye make answer for this morning's work?' 'To men,' said he, 'I can be answerable; and, for God, I will take him in mine own hand.' Claverhouse mounted his horse, and left her with the corpse of her dead husband lying there; she set the bairn on the ground, and gathered his brains, and tied up his head, and straightened his body, and covered him with her plaid, and sat down and wept over him. It being a very desert place where never victual grew, and far from neighbours, it was some time before any friends came to her: the first that came was a very fit hand, that old singular Christian woman, in the Cumberhead, named Elizabeth Menzies, three miles distant, who had been tried with the violent death of her husband, at Pentland, afterwards of two worthy sons, Thomas Weir, who was killed at Drumclog, and David Steele, who was suddenly shot afterwards when taken. The said Marion Weir, sitting upon her husband's grave, told me, that before that, she could see no blood but she was in danger to faint, and yet she was helped to be a witness to all this, without either fainting or confusion, except when the shots were let off, her eyes were dazzled. His corpse was buried at the end of the house where he was slain.—Peden's Life.

XXXIV.—CRUELTY TOWARDS A JACOBITE.

In the rising of 1745, a party of Cumberland's dragoons was running through Nithsdale in search of rebels. Hungry and fatigued, they stopped at a lone widow's house, and demanded refreshment. Her son, a youth of sixteen, dressed up a dish of long kale and butter for them, and the good woman brought her new milk, that she told them was all her stock. One of the party enquired, with seeming kindness, how she lived. 'Indeed,' said she, 'the cow and the kale yard, wi' God's blessing, are a' my mailen.' Without another word being spoken, the heartless trooper then rose, and with his sabre killed the cow and destroyed all the kale. The poor woman and her son were thus in a moment thrown destitute upon the world. She herself soon died of a broken heart, and the disconsolate youth wandered away beyond the inquiry of friends or the search of compassion. In the continental war which followed some years after, when the British army had gained a great and signal victory, some of the soldiery were one day making merry with their wine, and recounting their exploits: a dragoon roared out—'I once starved a Scotch witch at Nithsdale; I killed her cow, and destroyed her greens; but,' added he, 'she could live for all that, on her God, she said!' 'And don't you rue it?' cried a young soldier, starting up at the moment. 'Don't you rue it?' 'Rue it! rue what?' said the other: 'why should I rue aught like that?' 'Then, by heaven you shall rue it,' exclaimed the youth, unsheathing his sword, 'that woman was my mother. Draw, you brutal villain, draw!' They fought on the instant. The youth passed his sword twice through the dragoon's body; and, while he turned him over in the throes of death, exclaimed, 'Wretched man! had you but rued it, you should only have been punished by your God!'

We shall conclude these tragical stories, by way of relief, with an exquisite off-hand lampoon (at least it has all the air of being such) upon Frederick Prince of Wales, son of George the Second, a prince whom people of all parties are now agreed in thinking no very great worthy, nor superior to what a lively woman has here written upon him; for if we understand Horace Walpole rightly, who says the verses were found among her papers, they were the production of the Honourable Miss Rollo, probably the daughter of the fourth Lord Rollo, who was implicated in the rebellion. Frederick was familiarly termed Fekkie and Fed.

"Here lies Prince Fed,
Gone down among the dead.
Had it been his father,
We had much rather;
Had it been his mother,
Better than any other;
Had it been her sister,
Few would have missed her;
Had it been the whole generation,
Ten times better for the nation;
But since 'tis only Fed,
There's no more to be said."

THE PERCEPTION OF BEAUTY AND NOBLENES

NOT A MATTER OF RANK.

TASTE, if it mean anything but a paltry connoisseurship, must mean a general susceptibility to truth and nobleness; a sense to discern, and a heart to love and reverence all beauty, order, goodness, wheresoever or in whatsoever forms and accompaniments they are to be seen. This surely implies, as its chief condition, not any given external rank or situation, but a finely gifted mind, purified into harmony with itself, into keenness and justness of vision; above all, kindled into love and generous admiration. Is culture of this sort found exclusively among the higher ranks? We believe it proceeds less from without than within, in every rank. The charms of Nature, the majesty of Man, the infinite loveliness of Truth and Virtue, are not hidden from the eye of the poor, but from the eye of the vain, the corrupted, and self-seeking, be he poor or rich. 'In old ages, the humble minstrel, a mendicant, and lord of nothing but his harp and his own free soul, had intimations of these glories, while to the proud baron in his barbaric halls they were unknown. Nor is there still any aristocratic monopoly of judgment more than of genius. For as to that Science of Negation which is taught peculiarly by men of professed elegance, we confess we hold it rather cheap. It is a necessary, but decidedly a subordinate accomplishment; nay, if it be rated as the highest, it becomes a ruinous vice. This is an old truth, yet ever needing new application and enforcement. Let us know what to love, and we shall know also what to reject; what to affirm, and we shall know also what to deny: but it is dangerous to begin with denial, and fatal to end with it. To deny is easy; nothing is sooner learnt, or more generally practised: as matters go, we need no man of polish to teach it; but rather, if possible, an hundred men of wisdom to shew us its limits, and teach us its reverse.

Are the fineness and truth of sense, manifested by the artist, found, in most instances, to be proportionate to his wealth and elevation of acquaintance? Are they found to have any perceptible relation either with the one or the other? We imagine not. Whose taste in painting, for instance, is truer and finer than Claude Lorraine's? and was not he a poor colour-grinder, outwardly the meanest of menials? Where again, we might ask, lay Shakspeare's rent-roll; and what generous peer took him by the hand, and unfolded to him the 'open secret' of the universe; teaching him that this was beautiful, and that not so? Was he not a peasant by birth, and by fortune something lower; and was it not thought much, even in the height of his reputation, that Southampton allowed him equal patronage with the zany, jugglers, and bearwards of the time? Yet compare his taste, even as it respects the negative side of things; for, in regard to the positive, and far higher side, it admits no comparison with any other mortal's,—compare it, for instance, with the taste of Beaumont and Fletcher, his contemporaries, men of rank and education, and of fine genius like himself. Tried even by the nice, fastidious, and in great part false, and artificial delicacy of modern times, how stands it with the two parties; with the gay triumphant men of fashion, and the poor vagrant link-boy? Does the latter sin against, we shall not say taste, but etiquette, as the former do? For one line, for one word, which some Chesterfield might wish blotted from the first, are there not in the others whole pages and scenes which, with palpitating heart, he would hurry into deepest night. This too, observe, respects not their genius, but their culture; not their appropriation of beauties, but their rejection of deformities,—by supposition, the grand and peculiar result of high breeding. —Thomas Carlyle.—(From an admirable article upon German Literature in the Edinburgh Review of 1827.)

A LADY'S PORTRAIT OF HERSELF.

WE gave, in one of our Romances of Real Life, a sample of this self-painting, from the pen of the famous Mademoiselle d'Orleans who married the Duke de Lauzun. It is a curious exercise of the judgment; and for more reasons than one, is apt to be more candid than might be supposed at the first thought of it. Suppose it sets some of our fair (or unfair) readers upon trying their hand.

Charlotte Saumaise de Chasan, niece of the learned Claude Saumaise, (says Miss Hays in her female Biography), was born in Paris, in 1619. She received an excellent education under the direction of her uncle, whose cares were rewarded by her proficiency in every elegant acquirement. She espoused, while yet in early life, M. de Flecelles, count de Bregy, lieutenant general of the army, counsellor of the sword of state, envoy extraordinary to Poland, and afterwards ambassador to Sweden. Celebrated for her wit, her beauty, and her talents, the countess was highly esteemed at court, and generally admired. She corresponded with Anne of Austria, to whom she was lady of honour; also with the queen of England; with Christina, queen of Sweden; and with the most distinguished and illustrious characters of Europe. Benserade addressed to this lady a complimentary epistle. The portrait she has drawn of herself is too curious to be omitted.

My person, says Madame de Bregy, perfectly well proportioned, is neither too large nor too small. I have a certain negligent air which convinces me I am one of the finest women of my size. My hair is brown and glossy, my complexion brunette, clear and smooth. My features are regular, and the form of my face oval. My eyes are fine; a certain mixture in their colour renders them bright and sparkling. My nose is well formed; my mouth, though not small, agreeable; and my lips of a good colour. My teeth, exquisitely white and well arranged, are the finest in the world. My neck is beautiful, nor need I blush to display my hands and arms. My air is lovely and delicate. My glass persuades me that I see nothing superior, if equal, to the image which it presents me. My appearance is youthful, my dress neat and tasteful. Such is my exterior form.

Others possibly are the best judges of our minds, since there is no mirror that reflects them faithfully. I am, nevertheless, persuaded that mine does not disgrace my person. It appears to me that I possess judgment to estimate things properly, though not by acquired knowledge. My mind is at once penetrating, delicate, solid, and reasonable. I profit little by the wit of others, and succeed better when guided by my own discernment than by the rules of art; I, therefore, use only my native good sense. I have frequently heard it observed (though, I confess, not without doubts of its truth), that, in conversation with me, time passes more rapidly than in other society; and that, on serious subjects, my sentiments are worthy of being adopted. Of my humour I shall speak with the same sincerity. I love praise, and return, with interest, the compliments paid to me; and, though somewhat haughty and scornful, I can be soft and conciliating. I neither oppose nor contradict the opinions of others, and I keep my own reserved. I can with truth say that I was born modest and discreet, while pride has preserved in me these qualities. I am not only proud, but indolent; and these defects have been productive of others. I take no pains to court favour, not even by flattery. I neither trouble myself to seek pleasure or amusement; yet to those who are at the pains to procure them for me I hold myself greatly obliged. I appear lively and gay, but in moderation. I take care to offend no persons, unless they wilfully call it upon themselves; and even then I avenge myself by railery rather than by serious anger. I have no turn for intrigue; yet, should I engage in one, I am convinced I should conduct myself with prudence and discretion. I am resolute, persevering to obstinacy, and secret to excess. In one respect, I own myself the most unjust of human beings: I wish evil to those who conform not to my desires. Such as are desirous of forming a friendship with me must be at the trouble of making all the advances. In return, I make them amends, and omit no opportunity of doing them service; I defend them against their adversaries, I speak in their praise, and sanction nothing which might prove detrimental to their interest. Time, which effaces impressions from the minds of others, gives strength to mine. I am truly disinterested, but not easily duped. I never choose a friend because he can do me a service; but should he neglect the opportunity when it occurs, I regard him no longer—he forfeits my friendship. I have not sufficient virtue to disregard wealth and honours, but enough to be satisfied and resigned to my lot. To say truth, I am neither good nor bad enough to serve myself. I am not devout, though I have through life desired to become so. I am greatly affected by the merits of others, and apt to over-rate my own; but my presumption extends but to the qualities of the heart. I am long in deliberating; but, when once resolved, it is difficult to divert me from my purpose. I strictly observe a promise, and do not easily pardon a breach of faith in others. In asking favours for myself, I cannot persist. I had rather resign my expectations than obtain them by servility. My attachment and fidelity are secured by gratitude rather than by hope. Many of my faults proceed from pride; none from meanness. If unable to conquer the pride which governs my actions, I direct it to those purposes which capacitate me to appear without blushing.

Confessions of this nature, (says Miss Hays,) notwithstanding the egotism they may display, are always interesting. Madame de Bregy preserved her charms and her talents to an advanced age, and died at Paris April 3, 1693. She was interred with her husband at St Gervais, and an epitaph inscribed over their remains.

ANIMAL MAGNETISM.

AN article on this subject in the second volume of the Penny Cyclopædia, just published, refers to one in the Foreign Quarterly Review, from which we had some time ago made an extract for publication, and which we here give our readers. "There is more in heaven and earth" than is "dreamt of" in most people's "philosophy," those of the philosophers themselves not excepted; and like the German poet, with whose wisdom we have been lately adorning our pages, we are not fond of seeing any speculation, interesting to man's nature, prejudged or hastily ridiculed. The possibilities of truth, however, may be ill-treated by another sort of haste and presumption; and in the curious instance before us, a genuine philosopher and quack seems exposed, in all the knavery of his solemn trifling.

Hell, a Jesuit, had rendered himself very celebrated by the number of his magnetic cures, and about the year 1774 communicated his experiments and success to Mesmer, under whom the theory was to assume a new form, and the practice to become so extended as to attract universal attention, exercise the ingenuity and research of physical enquirers, and obtain the honour of a special investigation from the French Royal Academy of Sciences, and other learned bodies.

Mesmer had commenced his career by publishing, in 1766, a dissertation on "The Influence of the Planets on the Human Body," in which he maintained, that, as the sun and moon cause and direct on our globe the flux and reflux of the sea, so these exercise on all the component parts of organized bodies, and particularly on the nervous system, a similar influence, producing in them two different states, which he termed intension and remission, and which seemed to him to account for the different periodical revolutions observable in several maladies in different ages, sexes, &c. The property of the animal body, which rendered it susceptible of this influence, he termed animal magnetism. Hell's observation seemed to him to throw new light on his theory, and having caused the Jesuit to make him some magnets of a peculiar form, he determined on a set of experiments which should give some certainty to his ideas. Expect a miracle, and it will be sure to happen. Mesmer has the good fortune to meet with a young lady called Oesterline, suffering under a convulsive malady, the symptoms of which exactly coincided with his new theory. The attacks were periodical, and attended by a rush of blood to the head, causing severe pain, followed by delirium, vomiting, and syncope. How far these attacks were connected with the state of the moon he does not mention, but he soon succeeded in reducing them under his system of planetary influence, so that he was enabled to foretell the periods of accession and remission. Having thus discovered the cause of the disease, it struck him that his discovery would be perfect, and lead to a certain mode of cure, if he could ascertain "that there existed between the bodies which compose our globe, an action equally reciprocal and similar to that of the heavenly bodies, by means of which he could imitate artificially the periodical revolutions of the flux and reflux before mentioned." Of course, as he only wanted this little matter to complete so great a theory, he could not fail to find it; and he soon announced that this material influence did exist, but in some way, for which he does not clearly account, his own body had come to be the principal depôt in which it centred, and from which it could be communicated to all others. Thus, when M. Ingenhousy came with him to see Mademoiselle Oesterline in a fit, he found that he might touch any part of her body without appearing to produce in her sensation; but when Mesmer, taking him by the hands, communicated to him animal magnetism, and then sent him back to make fresh trials, he found that now the simple pointing of his finger was sufficient to cause convulsive motions.

Henceforth animal magnetism was distinctly and definitely separated from mineral magnetism; and though Mesmer continued for some time to use magnets in his experiments, it was not on account of their own inherent power, but of the quality which he attributed to them of being conductors of the newly discovered influence: in 1776 he discontinued their use altogether. Finding his discoveries rather undervalued at Vienna, where they had been ridiculed by Stoerk and Ingenhousy, whom, in turn, Mesmer denominated "petty experiment-maker to the ladies of the court," he set out on an experimental tour through Swabia and Switzerland, where he found a formidable rival in father John Joseph Garner, already celebrated for casting out devils, which he held to be the primary causes of most diseases. Mesmer, however, showed much of that tact which has distinguished his followers in similar difficulties, and in place of questioning the truth of Father Garner's cures, at once adopted them as facts, and declared them to be the evident results of the great power he had so lately discovered. He succeeded himself in healing an ophthalmia and a gutta serena, with due certificates of which achievements he returned to Vienna. Here he undertook to cure Mademoiselle Paradis of blindness and convulsions, and after magnetizing her for some time, declared her perfectly recovered. Barth, the oculist, went to see her, and declared her blind as ever, and her family found on her return home that the convulsions continued as before. This was a sad mistake; but Mesmer, whose great talent was unblushing effrontery, pronounced it a false report, got up to injure his fame, and asserted that the girl was quite well, and "that her family forced her to imitate convulsions and feign blindness." The cool impudence of this was a little too much, and Mesmer found it convenient to leave Vienna, and after some consideration determined that his next appearance should be at Paris. Here, as M. Virey informs us, he commenced modestly; he addressed himself to the savans and physicians, and explained to them his system, without, however, making any converts; he then sought for patients, and pretended to have made some cures, but as he did not attract much attention, he published his "Memoir on the Discovery of Animal Magnetism," the same work from which we have already quoted. In this he announces twenty-seven general propositions, asserting not only the existence of a magnetic fluid, as before described, but of an anti-magnetic, which was so powerful in the bodies of some persons that their very presence was sufficient to prevent the operation of the magnetic power even in others. The utility of this new power is quite obvious, as it afforded him a ready means of accounting for the failure of any of his experiments. He now addressed himself to M. le Roi, president of the Académie des Sciences, and various negotiations were set on foot for a public inquiry into his system, which Mesmer always managed to break off when they were coming to anything decisive. It was not, however, until Deslon, a French physician of some eminence, had announced himself a convert, and joined Mesmer in the practice of magnetism, that it acquired much renown. Their method of operating was as follows:

In the centre of the room was placed a vessel of an oval or circular shape, about four feet in diameter and one deep. In this were laid a number of bottles disposed in radii, with their necks directed outwards, well corked and filled with magnetized water. Water was then poured into a vessel so as to cover the bottles, and occasionally pounded glass or filings of iron were added to the water. This vessel was termed the baquet. From its cover, which was pierced with many holes, issued long, thin, moveable rods of iron, which could be applied by the patients to the affected part. Besides, to the ring of the cover was attached a cord which, when the patients were seated in a circle, was carried round them all, so as to form a chain of connexion; a second chain was formed by the union of their hands, and it was recommended that they should sit so close as that those adjoining should touch by their knees and feet, which was supposed wonderfully to facilitate the passage of the magnetic fluid. In addition to this, the magnetists went round, placed themselves en rapport with the patients, embraced them between the knees, and gently rubbed them down along the course of the nerves, using gentle pressure over different regions of the chest and abdomen. The effect of such treatment on delicate women might have been foretold, but it was not left to work alone.

The house which Mesmer inhabited was delightfully situated. His rooms were spacious and sumptuously furnished, stained glass and coloured blinds shed "a dim religious light," mirrors gleamed at intervals along the walls, a mysterious silence was preserved, delicate perfumes floated in the air, and occasionally the melodious sounds of the harmonica or the voice came to lend their aid to his magnetic powers. His salons became the daily resort of all that was brilliant and spirituel in the Parisian fashionable world. Ladies of rank, whom indolence, voluptuous indulgence, or satiety of pleasures, had filled with vapours or nervous affections—men of luxurious habits, enervated by enjoyment, who had drained sensuality of all that it could offer, and gained in return a shattered constitution and premature old age—came in crowds to seek after the delightful emotions and novel sensations which this mighty magician was said to dispense. They approached with imaginations heated by curiosity and desire; they believed because they were ignorant; and this belief was all that was required for the action of the magnetic charm. The women, always the most ardent in enthusiasm, first experienced yawnings, stretchings, then slight nervous spasms, and finally, crises of excitation, according as the assistant magnetizers (jeunes hommes beaux et robustes comme des Hercules) multiplied and prolonged the soft passes or attouchemens, by which the magnetic influence was supposed to be communicated. The emotions once begun were soon transmitted to the rest, as we know one hysterical female, if affected, will induce an attack in all other similarly predisposed in the same apartment. In the midst of this strange scene entered Mesmer, clothed in a long-flowing robe of lilac-coloured silk, richly embroidered with golden flowers, and holding in his hand a long white wand. Advancing with an air of authority and magic gravity, he seemed to govern the life and movements of the individuals in crises. Women panting were threatened with suffocation,—they must be unlaced; others tore the walls or rolled themselves on the ground with strong spasms in the throat, and occasionally uttering loud shrieks,—the violence of the crises must be moderated. He approached, traced over their bodies certain lines with his wand; they became instantly calm, acknowledged his power, and felt streams of cold or burning vapours through their entire frames according to the directions in which he waved his hand.

Mesmer now was in a fair way; he had obtained notoriety, he was the subject of general conversation; money, which he eagerly coveted, was flowing on him, and he was even offered a handsome pension and the order of St Michael, if he had made any real discovery in medicine, and would communicate it to physicians nominated by the king. This scrutiny was exactly what Mesmer most dreaded; accordingly, in place of accepting the offer, he suddenly affected wonderful magnanimity, spoke of his disregard of money compared with his love of science, his philanthropy, and his desire to have his great discovery acknowledged and patronized by government; then, breaking off the negotiation, set off abruptly for Spa, where he had the mortification to hear that Deslon had succeeded to his business, and all his emoluments at Paris. To console him for this misfortune, Bergasse, one of his patients, proposed opening a subscription of 100 shares, at 100 louis each, the profits of which should be offered to him on condition that he would disclose his secret to the subscribers, who were to have it in their power to make what use they pleased of it. Mesmer readily embraced the proposal and returned to Paris, where the subscription was soon filled; and, the generosity of the subscribers exceeding their promises, he received no less a sum than 340,000 livres. Among his pupils were La Fayette, d'Epremenil, and M. Bergasse, to whom he was indebted for the whole plan.

Numerous writings now appeared on each side. M. Count de Gebelin, author of the "Monde Primitif," professed himself cured by magnetism, and became one of its most enthusiastic supporters, but, unfortunately dying soon after, revealed to a post-mortem examination that his kidneys were in a complete state of disorganization of long standing, and that therefore the magnetic cure had no existence but in his imagination. About the same time, Berthollet, the celebrated chemist, who had gone so far as to become one of Mesmer's pupils, announced in a pithy advertisement, that the whole was a piece of quackery, and it is said even went so far as to threaten his master with a caning for having imposed on him. But it was at length determined that a serious examination should take place, the king directed the attention of the Académie des Sciences, to the subject, and a committee of investigation was appointed, of which Bailly, Franklin, Lavoisier, and others, were members. Mesmer at once perceived his danger, refused all communication with the commissioners, and absented himself from the inquiry. His presence, however, was not required. M. Deslon, who had long assisted in his practice, known his theory, and produced the same effects, was either more sincere or more silly than his master. He laid open to the commissioners all the proceedings, displayed all his varieties of convulsions, crises, and cures, and enabled them to convince themselves and every rational person that Mesmer was a bold charlatan, and Deslon a clever dupe. Their report, which presents one of the most beautiful examples of judicious experiment and clear logical deduction, has been so often reprinted, and so generally quoted, that it is unnecessary for us to do more than to repeat its conclusions.

"It shows that there is no proof of the existence of a universal fluid, or magnetic power, except from its effects on human bodies; that those effects can be produced without passes or other magnetic manipulations; that those manipulations alone are insufficient to produce the effects, if employed without the patient's knowledge; that, therefore, imagination will, and animal magnetism will not, account for the results produced."

The commissioners also notice the effect of the attouchemens in sensitive patients, and of imitation in inducing many crises to follow the first.

We have now done with Mesmer: this report annihilated him.

UTILITY AND BEAUTY--SPIRIT OF THE FINE ARTS.

THIS is another specimen of the goodness of the Penny Cyclopædia. The Diffusers of Knowledge are accused of taking a merely mechanical and unphilosophical view of utility. But they here more than disprove the charge. The only objection to be made to this excellent article is referable perhaps to its closing remark about music; which is an art that in its union with words in general may reasonably, take, we think, the higher place, inferior as it is to poetry in the abstract. For when music is singing, the finest part of our senses takes the place of the more definite intellect, and nothing surely can surpass the power of an affecting and enchanting air in awakening the very flower of emotion. On this account, we can well understand a startling saying attributed to the great Mozart; that he did not care for having excellent words to his music. He wanted only the names (as it were) of the passions. His own poetry supplied the rest.

"The fine arts are generally understood to comprehend those productions of human genius and skill, which are more or less addressed to the sentiment of taste. They are first employed in embellishing objects of mere utility, but their highest office is to meet our impression of beauty, or sublimity, however acquired, by imitative or adequate representation. The capacity of the human mind for receiving such impressions, whether directly from nature or through the medium of the arts, depends greatly on civilization, and that leisure which supposes that first wants are satisfied; but there exists no state of society, however ignorant, in which some symptoms of taste and some attempts to arrest the beautiful are not to be met with, the difference between such efforts and the most refined productions is a difference only in degree; the fact of the existence of the arts in some form may be always taken for granted, and it would only remain to regulate their influence and direct their capabilities aright.

"The arts are peculiarly interesting as human creations. They are composed of nature operating on human sympathies, and reflected through a human medium; and as nations, like individuals, present ever-varying modification, so the free growth of the fine arts partakes of all these varieties, and may be compared to the bloom of a plant, true to its developing causes whatever they may be, and nurtured in the first instance by the soil from which it springs. In barbarous or degenerate nations, the sentiment of the beautiful has ever been attained only in the lowest degree, while a false excitement founded on a suppression of the feeling of nature, may be said to have usurped the place of the sublime. We smile at the simple attempt of the savage to excite admiration by the gaudiness of his attire; but we should shudder to contemplate the scenes which his fortitude or obduracy can invest with the attributes of sublimity. The just value of life, the characteristic of that civilization which reduces the defensive passions to their due limits, at the same time naturally elevates the sources of gratification by pointing out the pleasures of the mind as distinguished from those of the sense; and the perception of the beautiful is in its turn the cause, as it is in some degree the result, of the rational enjoyment of life.

"The great use of the arts is thus to humanise and refine, to purify enjoyment, and, when duly appreciated, to connect the perception of physical beauty with that of moral excellence; but it will at once be seen that this idea of usefulness is in a great measure distinct from the ordinary meaning of the term as applicable to the production of human ingenuity. A positive use results, indeed, indirectly from the cultivation of the formative arts, precisely in proportion as their highest powers are developed: for it will be found that at all times when the grandest style of design has been practised with success, and particularly when the human figure has been duly studied, the taste thus acquired from the source of the beautiful has gradually influenced all kinds of manufactures. Again, as illustrating science, the fine arts may be directly useful in the stricter sense, but this is not the application which best displays their nature and value. The essence of the fine arts begins, where utility in its narrower acceptance ends. The abstract character of ornament is to be useless. That this principle exists in nature we immediately feel in calling to mind the merely beautiful appearances of the visible world, and particularly the colours of flowers. In every case in nature where fitness or utility can be traced, the characteristic quality or relative beauty of the object is found to be identified with that fitness:—a union imitated as far as possible in the less decorative part of architecture, furniture, &c.; but where no utility, save that of conveying delight (perhaps the highest of all) exists, we recognize the principle of absolute beauty. The fine arts in general may be considered the human reproduction of this principle. The question of their utility, therefore, resolves itself into an inquiry as to the intention of the beauties of nature. The agreeable facts of the external world have not only the general effect of adding a charm to existence, but they appeal to those susceptibilities which are particularly human, and it becomes necessary to separate the instinctive feelings which we possess in common with the rest of the creation, from that undefinable union of sensibility and reflexion which constitutes taste, and which, while it enlists the imagination as the auxiliary of beauty, is, in its highest influence, less allied to love than admiration. It is this last feeling which the noblest efforts of the arts aspire to kindle, which not only elevates the beautiful, but reduces ideas of fear and danger to the lofty sentiment of the sublime, which, as its objects become worthier, is the link between matter and mind, and which tends to ennoble sympathy and encrease self-respect.

"With regard to the classification of the arts, those are generally considered the most worthy in which the mental labour employed and the mental pleasure produced are the greatest, and in which the manual labour or labour of any kind is least apparent. This test would justly place poetry first; but the criterion should not be incautiously applied: for in architecture, where human ingenuity is most apparent, and even where the design is very simple, a powerful impression on the imagination may be excited from magnitude, proportion, or other causes. In such cases, however, it will still be evident, that we lose sight of the laborious means in the absorbing impression of the effect, and the art thus regains its dignity. It would be an invidious as well as a difficult task to assign the precise order in which painting, architecture, sculpture, and music, would follow poetry and its sister, eloquence; but it may be remarked, that the union of the arts is a hazardous experiment, and is often destructive of their effect. The drama itself, which unites poetry with many characteristics of the formative arts, and with music, is in constant danger of violating the first principle of style, viz. the consistency of its conventions, and in the more intimate union of poetry and music, the latter, though the inferior art, is too independent and too attractive to be a mere vehicle, and accordingly usurps the first place."

BETTY BOLAINE.

A SONG.

O Betty Boline! with the days that have been,
Thy figure grotesque, and the crowd it drew after,
Are gone from the streets where thy satins were seen,
Where thy coming along tickled grief into laughter.

The world was then bursting on me but a scion,
And all things were wonders for childhood to dwell on,
Now far from the city where thou wert a lion,
My fancy still teems with the forms it first fell on.

Old miserly maiden—so motly, so stately!
Thy issuing forth was the signal of muster,
We measured our footsteps by thy steps sedately,
And we stared and we dogg'd thee like lambs in a cluster.

Thy lace, and thy trimmings—thy mantle—thy skirt—
Thy high heels—thy buckles—thy bonnet and plume,
Long centuries ago perhaps moved in a court,
Or they fell from some spectre sent back to her tomb.

O Betty, thy gaze was on vacancy roll'd;
For the eye of thy mind was on robbers that roam—
Upon bolts—upon chests—upon silver and gold;
And 'twas only thy body that wandered from home.

Lone was thy passion, and strong was the flame.
It fed thee—it sheltered—it clad thee in armour,
To turn back the arrows of scorn as they came;
And it poured over thy pillow the song of the charmer.

Thro' the march of long years, on thy wall, on thy ceiling,
The sunbeam, the moonbeam, by turns took their sleep;
Say, O shade of Boline, did not spirits come stealing

Around thy lone couch, drawn by stillness so deep?
Didst thou pierce to the verge of a world that is hidden?

Did the air assume shape at thy mortal behest?
Didst thou pay back thy spirit in friendships forbidden
For life's thousand charities banished thy breast?

O Betty Boline! Though thy history sink,
Though thy wardrobe, unhonoured, be scattered like chaff;

With the proudest—the bravest thou still art a link,
Who couldst throw o'er thy shoulder the world and its laugh!

[Poor Betty, who has remained in our correspondent's memory since childhood, in the shape of a fantastic spectre in a faded fine dress, appears to have been an old maid. Probably the same imagination and the same imprisoned feelings, which made her become a spectacle and a miser, would have rendered her a natural and happy woman under different circumstances.—Edit.]

GOETHE.

To the Editor of the London Journal.

Dear Sir,

August 12th, 1834.

Allow me most sincerely to congratulate you upon the successful establishment of your London Journal, calculated as it is, in so eminent a degree, to further the object your writings have long shewn you to have at heart—the advancement of your fellow countrymen (and country women too) in knowledge and happiness. * * * [Our warm-hearted correspondent here expands into a strain of approbation, which the more delightful it is to us, the more difficult it becomes to repeat.] * * * Your papers on German literature—here you have opened a source inexhaustible indeed, and admirably you avail yourself of it—every lover of German literature must thank you for your remarks on the character of Goethe, so much talked of, and so little understood in this country; but on this subject, you must allow me a remark also. I agree with nearly all that you have said about him, and I particularly admire your candid avowal of your changing and dubious feeling; but I carry my admiration still further than you do (I allude to your qualifying remarks as to his political character and conduct, and yet my opinions on politics, as on many other matters, coincide, I believe, very much with yours, and, indeed, I am not indebted to you with respect to their formation): in the first place, I cannot remember anything in those works of Goethe, with which it is my good fortune to be acquainted, which shew that he was opposed to “the abstract theory of the advancement of society,” without reference to the designs and plans of the revolutionists of his own day. Will you be kind enough to point out to me any passages which lead you to form this opinion? But if, as it appears to me, this political “inertia” of Goethe’s really had reference to the revolutionary plans which, during his time, were so rife in Germany, did he not pursue precisely that course which, under all the circumstances, was pre-eminently the best? Is it not the bane of almost all revolutionary movements that they are premature? that they are set in motion by a few active spirits long before the great bulk of the people are morally and mentally prepared for change? and can a mind of gigantic mould, like that of Goethe, be more nobly, more usefully employed, than in cultivating, morally and intellectually, the minds of his fellow countrymen? in raising the national character, in conferring upon his country the inestimable benefit of a great national literature (and Goethe, as the great model, the master spirit of his age, did scarcely less), and thus laying the surest and most lasting basis of a brilliant futurity? Had those richly endowed men, who exercised so powerful an influence upon the first French revolution, thus employed themselves, might not these still, notwithstanding all drawbacks, inestimable advantages, which are accruing and will accrue from that event, have been obtained, perhaps indeed at a period somewhat later, but at how much less dreadful a cost? When again we consider the actual condition of that little state, of which Goethe was the ornament, and remember the character of the rule of its excellent and truly magnanimous monarch, and how under that rule it was steadily advancing in the only path to true greatness, can we think, with patience, of political intrigue and violent revolution? If we cannot, what must Goethe have thought of them? And where shall we find nobler patriotism than that displayed by Goethe upon the memorable approach of the French, described, I think, by Baron Falk, and so vividly translated by Mrs Austin, in what you justly term her “delightful characteristics?”

Pardon, dear Mr Editor, the unreasonable length of this; but, on such a subject it is difficult to stop, even though one’s thoughts should have neither novelty nor value to recommend them. There are several other points on which I wished to say a word to you, but pressing matters demand my attention, and thus your patience will be spared.

Believe me, dear sir, yours most respectfully,

E. E.

GOETHE AND LA FAYETTE.

Mr Editor,

In the 19th Number of your excellent Journal, speaking of Goethe and La Fayette, you say “there is no comparison between the powers of these two great men.” Goethe, undoubtedly, was a man of far greater literary attainments than La Fayette; but whose mind was the more pure and exalted—who did more for the great and glorious work of Universal Freedom? It is not the powers a man has, it is the use he turns them to. Goethe seems to have had no feeling towards the advancement of his native Germany from the abject state in which it was, and is, but sat himself down contentedly, without endeavouring to effect a change.

There is one excuse for his not endeavouring to effect a change. He was born and brought up in the old system, was the favourite of a Duke, and it was his interest to remain as he did.

But what can be more noble than the disinterested conduct of La Fayette, born in France, when he saw the glorious cause of Freedom required him; he went to America to render his valuable assistance to the heroic Americans? What could be more disinterested than this? Who could turn his powers to a better purpose?

We are sent into the world to benefit one another, to do the greatest good we can—and he who turns his powers to the best purpose is far superior to him who, having those powers, allows them to lie dormant. Goethe has done nothing towards the advancement of Freedom—La Fayette has done all he was able.

J. D., A CONSTANT READER.

August 16th, 1834.

[We give insertion to these two letters, in fairness, because we touched upon the politics of Goethe ourselves. But as we did it in no controversial spirit (such not being the object of our Journal) our correspondents, and others interested in the question, will not take it amiss, if we here close the discussion on the political part of Goethe’s character. We cannot refer at the moment to the proofs required by E. E. We took our impression from what appeared to us to be the whole tone of Goethe’s mind, whenever it touched on the subject. His friends in general, if we are not mistaken, have the same impression. But we never confounded an objection to violent revolutions with an objection to improvement. We only doubted how far Goethe would have approved any change connected with Governments. However, we must not re-open the subject ourselves. With regard to La Fayette, we certainly thought his head of a far finer character to that of Goethe’s, though not so his heart, where the happiest wisdom lies. And the greatest intellects, in our opinion, do not rank at the very top of their species, any more than the means rank above the end. The instinctive wisdom of the heart can realize, while the all-mooting subtlety of the head is only doubting. It is a beautiful feature in the angelical hierarchy of the Jews, that the Seraphs rank first, and the Cherubs after; that is to say, Love before Knowledge.—Edit.]

TABLE TALK.

Modern German Nobleman.—We should change our notion of the German nobleman: that ancient, thirsty, thick-headed, sixteen-quartered Baron, who still hovers in our minds, never did exist in such perfection, and is now as extinct as our own Squire Western. His descendant is a man of culture, other aims, and other habits. We question whether there is an aristocracy in Europe, which, taken as a whole, both in a public and private capacity, more honours art and literature, and does more both in public and private to encourage them. Excluded from society! What, we would ask, was Wieland’s, Schiller’s, Herder’s, Johannes Müller’s society? Has not Goethe, by birth a Frankfurt burgher, been, since his twenty-sixth year, the companion not of nobles but of princes, and for half his life a minister of state? And is not this man, unrivalled in so many far deeper qualities, known also and felt to be unrivalled in nobleness of breeding and bearing; fit, not to learn of princes in this respect, but by the example of his daily life to teach them?—Carlyle.

MR. D’ISRAELI AND ALBERTUS MAGNUS.

Hampstead, 22d Aug. 1834.

SIR,—I may as well begin by confessing that for the last one and twenty weeks, I have been longing to freight a sheet of note-paper with some of the secret produce of my little hermitage, and boldly to launch it into the dense sea of smoke beneath me, till it should be landed at your busy wharf, and garnered under your eye. I would have sent you a smile, but all the world has been smiling on you: a sonnet, but you are growing formidable to sonnetteers: a tale of true adventure, but I wished not only to be, but to seem true: at last my mind is made up, and I am going to send you a little indignation. I might find it in my heart to upbraid you with the overrunning extent of some of your selections, which provoke me whenever they curtail the pure flow of your own wit; but, Sir, it is against the nature of these extracts that I now more seriously protest. You have burned incense on the shrines of art, poetry, and truth, and believe me the chiffonnier which Mr D’Israeli has built for his fame to stand upon is unworthy of you. I take the first sentence of your last extract (L. J. p. 165) as a specimen. The name of Albertus Magnus was not De Groot, but he belonged to the Bolstadt family, and was born at Lavingen,* in Suabia, not in Holland as this bastard-Dutch appellation seems to imply. Albertus is never styled Grotius, nor was Hugo Grotius ever styled Magnus. In fact, the name Groot has nothing to do with the Philosopher of Cologne, and the word Groot has nothing to do with the idea of greatness, except in Low Dutch. That Albertus Magnus deserved his surname, those who have read “Stella Clericorum” know.† In that number I fear that Mr D’Israeli cannot be counted; but he might have known that Thomas Aquinas was the pupil, not the master, of this great man: it was Albert who first discovered the intellectual energies of the future Doctor, and who strengthened the early piety of the future Saint. Everybody knows that when the schoolfellows of the young Aquinas called him “the ox,” from his apparent stupidity, Albert replied that “he was an ox who would astonish the world with his bellowing.”

Your extract goes on to mention the “Opus Magus” of Roger Bacon; but the title of that work is “Opus Majus,” in contra-distinction to the Opus Minus, and Opus Tertium of the same author. The two latter exist only in manuscript, the former was published a century ago by Dr Jebb: but they were all writings of solemn science, energetic freedom, and dignified truth, unmingled with the conceits which Mr d’Israeli dreams of: by the change of a letter (perhaps by a misprint), the name of a great work, which may be termed the first British Instauration, is converted into the barbarous denomination of a book of necromancy.

Yours very sincerely,

ICONOCLAST.

* Or Lawingen.

† The treatise “De Secretis” was written by Heinrich von Sachsen, one of Albert’s pupils.

[We are loth to admit controversial matters, and hard words into this our most peaceful journal, even though tempted by able correspondents; though, as Mr D’Israeli is not very tender himself in such matters, he might be prepared for a little rough handling, and possibly take a pleasure in it. We have thought it best, however, to omit a passage at the close of this letter, especially as the mistake in the preceding paragraph originated with the London Journal, and not with Mr D’Israeli; being, as our correspondent conjectured, an error of the press. In future, we have reason for believing, these errors will be much less numerous than we regret to say they have been. As to Mr D’Israeli’s book, we cannot but be thankful to a work which has furnished us so many extracts on subjects so curious; but we are conscious of having made both these, and extracts from other works, of late, somewhat too long; and mean to improve in that respect; as our present number, we trust, will testify.—Edit.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The verses from Pinkney’s Green next week.

We should be glad to hear, on other subjects, from MARK LEMON. Those of the two papers sent us do not happen to suit our journal. The articles are left for him at the publisher’s.

IMPENNIS will not be forgotten. Nor Les Deux Amis.

To judge from the ease, vivacity, and untiredness of the rhymes of our old acquaintance, Mr Wilson, of Hatton Garden, he ought to be one of the best dancers extant. We heartily wish success to his Ball, though we are unable to attend it.

DANCING AND DANCERS.

WHILE Tory genius boasts of its poetic Wilson, and ornithology of his brother, and the fine arts of Wilson "the English Claude," the minor graces insist upon having their Wilson too in the person of the eminent Mr Thomas Wilson, author of several dramatic pieces, and inductor of ladies and gentlemen into the shapely and salutary art of dancing.

This old, though doubtless at the same time ever-young acquaintance of ours, who has done us the honour for several years past of making us acquainted with his movements, and inviting us to his balls, which it has not been our good fortune to be able to attend, always sends us, with his invitations, a placard of equal wit and dimensions, in which he takes patriotic occasion to set forth the virtues of his art. He does not affect to despise its ordinary profits, income-wards. That would be a want of candour, unbefitting the intireness of his wisdom. On the contrary, dancing being a liberal art, he is studious to inculcate an equally liberal acknowledgment on the part of those who are indebted to it. But being a man of a reflective turn of leg, and great animal spirits, he omits no opportunity of shewing how good his art is for the happiness as well as the graces of his countrymen, how it renders them light of spirit as well as body, shakes melancholy out of their livers, and will not at all suffer them to be gouty. Nay, he says it is their own faults if they grow old.

We hardly dare to introduce, abruptly, the remarks on this head which form the commencement of his present year's Exposé. But the energy of Mr Wilson's philanthropy forces its way through his elegancies; the good to be done is a greater thing, in his mind, even than the graces with which he invests it; and in answer to his question, "Why don't every body dance?" he says, in a passion of sincerity which sweeps objection away with it,—"Because the English prefer the pleasures of the table and sedentary amusements, with their gout, apoplexy, shortness of breath, spindle-shanks, and rum-puncheon bellies," (pardon us, O Bacchus of Anacreon!) "to the more wholesome and healthy recreation of dancing. If you ask a person of fifty (says he) to take a dance, the usual reply is, 'My dancing days are gone by; it's not fit amusement for people of my time of life,' and such like idle cant; for idle cant it really is, as these pretences are either made as excuses for idleness, or to comply with the usual fastidious customs of the day. They manage things better in France, as Yorick says; for it would be quite as difficult, amongst that polite and social people, to find a person of fifty who did not dance, as it is in gloomy, cold, calculating Old England, to find one who has good sense enough to laugh at these fastidious notions, with a sufficient stock of social animal spirits to share in this polite and exhilarating amusement. Moreover, if we wanted a sanction to continue to dance as long as we are able, I could here give a list (had I room) of a hundred eminent persons, who did not consider it a disgrace to dance, even at a very advanced age; amongst the number, Socrates, one of the wisest men and greatest philosophers that ever lived, used to dance for his exercise and amusement when he was upwards of seventy. Read this, ye gormands and card-players of fifty, and if you are wise, and would leave the gout, and a thousand other ills beside you, come and sport a toe with me, at 18, Kirby street, Hatton garden:—

For you'll meet many there, who to doctors ne'er go,
Who enjoy health and spirit, from sporting a toe;
Who neither want powder, pill, mixture, nor lotion,
But a partner and fiddle to set them in motion."

Truly, we fear that the tip-end of Mr Wilson's indignant bow strikes hard upon many a venerable gout, and that these dancing philosophers of Kirby street have the advantage of a great many otherwise sage people who take pills instead of exercise, and think to substitute powders and lotions for those more ancient usages, yclept the laws of the universe. Such, as Mr Wilson tells us, was the philosophy of Socrates. There can be no doubt of it; it was the philosophy of all his countrymen, the Greeks, with whom dancing formed a part of their very worship, and who had figures accordingly, fit to go to church and thank heaven with. Bacchus himself, with them, was a dancer, and a slender-waisted young gentleman. Such was also the philosophy of Mr Wilson's brother poet, Soame Jenyns, a lively old gentleman of the last century, who wrote a poem on the "Art of Dancing," from which Mr Wilson should give us some extracts in his next placard; (we wish we had it by us); and what is curious, and shows how accustomed these salutary sages are to consider the interests of the whole human being, spiritual as well as bodily, Mr Jenyns had a poetical precursor on that subject, who was no less a personage than a chief justice in the time of Elizabeth,—Sir John Davies, and who, like himself, wrote also on religious matters, and the Immortality of the Soul. Sir John, however, appears not to have sufficiently practised his own precepts, for he died of apoplexy at fifty-seven,—a very crude and juvenile age, according to Mr Wilson. But then he was a lawyer, and injudicious enough to be a judge, —to sit bundled up in cloth and ermine, instead of dancing in a "light cymar." Again, there was Sir Christopher Hatton, Chancellor in the time of Elizabeth, who is said to have absolutely danced himself into that venerable position, through a series of extraordinary steps of court favour, commencing in a ball-room,—and not improbably either; for, like some of his great brethren in that office, Sir Christopher appears to have been a truly universal genius, able, "like the elephant's trunk," to pick up his pin as well as knock down his tiger, and it is not to be wondered at if sovereigns sometimes get at a knowledge of the profounder faculties of a man, through the medium of his more entertaining ones. The Chancellor, however, appears to have turned his dancing to no better account, ultimately, than the Justice; for they say he died prematurely of a broken heart, because the queen pressed him for a debt,—an end worthier of a courtier than of a sage and dancer. This it is to acquire legal habits, and "make the worse appear the better reason," even to one's-self. Hatton should have been above his law, and stuck to his legs,—to his natural understanding, as a punster would call it; and then nothing would have overthrown him. Gray, with a poet's license, represents him as dancing after he was Chancellor. It is a pity it was not true.

My grave Lord Keeper led the brawls;
His seal and maces danc'd before him.
His high crown'd hat and satin doublet
Moved the stout heart of England's queen,
Though Pope and Spaniard could not trouble it.
Sir Christopher bequeathed his name to Hatton
Garden; so that Mr Wilson resides in fit neighbourhood, and doubtless has visions of cavaliers and maids of honour in ruffs, "sporting their toes" through his dreams by night.

Our artist's vindication of the juvenility of dancers at fifty, reminds us of a pleasant realization we experienced the other day of a stage joke, nay, of a great improvement on it,—a Romance of Real Life. In one of Colman's farces, an old man hearing another called old, and understanding he was only forty, exclaims "Forty! quite a boy!" We heard this opinion pronounced upon a man of sixty, by an old gentleman, who, we suppose, must be eighty, or thereabouts. It was in an omnibus, in which he was returning from a city dinner, jovial and toothless, his rosy gills gracing his white locks; an Anacreon in broad-cloth. Some friend of his was telling him of the death of an acquaintance, and in answer to his question respecting the cause of it, said he did not know, but that the deceased was "sixty years of age." The remark seemed hardly to be an indiscretion in the ears of the venerable old boy, he considered it so very inapplicable. "Sixty!" cried he, with a lisp that was really robust; "well, that's nothing you know, compared with life. Why, he was quite a boy."

Wilson. This must have been a dancer.

Edit. Or a rider.

W. Well, horseback is a kind of dancing.

Edit. Or a walker.

W. Well, walking is dancing too; that is to say, good walking. You know, my dear sir, people are said to "walk a minuet."

Edit. But they say dancers are not good walkers.

W. How, sir! Dancers not good walkers!! It is true, I must allow in candour, that some professional dancers are apt to turn out their toes a little too much; but not all, my dear sir—not the best: and, as to dancers in general, I will affirm, meo periculo (as the philosopher says), they walk exquisitely —à la merveille. Come and see my dancers walking into the ball-room, or my new dance of the "Rival Beauties," "thirty young ladies," sir, all moving to the sweet and peaceful battle at once. See how they walk, my dear sir. You would never forget it.

Edit. I shall never forget it, as it is, Mr Wilson. I see it, in imagination, painted in the beautiful red letters of your placard, and do not wonder that you are a man in request for Richmond parties, and records of it in verse.

Here Mr Wilson finishes the dialogue with a bow, to which it would be bad taste and an anti-climax to reply. There is a final and triumphant silence of eloquence, to which nothing can be said.

To return to the matter of age. There can be no doubt that dancers of fifty are a very different sort of quinquagenarians from sitters of fifty, and that men of the same age often resemble each other in no other respect. "The same is not the same." Some people may even be said to have begun life over again, at a time when the dissipated and the sullen are preparing to give it up. It is not necessary to mention such cases as those of Old Parr. Marmontel—a man of letters, of taste and fancy, and therefore, it is to be presumed, of no very coarse organization—married at fifty-six, and, after living happily with a family born to him, died at the age of seventy-seven. But though a man of letters, and living at a period when there was great license of manners, to which his own had formed no very rigid exception—he had led, upon the whole, a natural life, and was temperate. Besides, Nature is very indulgent to those who do not violently contradict her with artificial habits, excesses of the table, or sullen thoughts. She hates alike the extremes, not of cheerfulness, but of Comus and of Melancholy. A venerable gentleman of Norfolk, now living, married and had an heir born to his estate at a venerable age, which nobody thought of treating with jests of a certain kind; for he also had been a denizen of the natural world, and was as young, with good sense and exercise, as people of half his age—far younger than many. We remember the face of envying respect and astonishment with which the news was received by “a person of wit and honour about town” (now deceased), in whose company we happened to be at the moment, and who might have been his son three or four times over.

Query—at what age must a person take to venerable manners, and consent to look old if he does not feel so? Mr Wilson will say, “when he is forced to leave off dancing.” And there is a definite notion in that. If any one, therefore, wishes to have precise ideas on this point, and behave himself as becomes his real, not his chronological, time of life, we really think he cannot do better than study in Kirby street, or at Willis’s, and learn to know at what age it becomes him to be reverend, or how long he may continue laughing at those who remonstrate with him because they hobble. Linnaeus, in his travels, gives an account—ludicrous in the eyes of us spectators of the staid and misgiving manners of people at the same time of life—of two Laplanders who accompanied him on some occasion (we forget what), but who carried bundles for him, and had otherwise reason for being tired, the way being long. One of them was fifty, the other considerably older; yet what did these old boys, at the close of their journey, but, instead of sitting down and resting themselves, begin laughing and running about after one another, like a couple of antediluvian children, as if they had just risen! They wanted nothing but pinafores, and a mother remonstrating with them for not coming and having their hairs combed.

Most people are astonished, perhaps, as they advance beyond the period of youth and middle life, at not finding themselves still older; and, if they took wise advantage of this astonishment, they would all live to a much greater age. It is equally by not daring to be too young nor consenting to be too old, that men keep themselves in order with Nature, and in heart with her. We kill ourselves before our time, alike with artificial irregularities and melancholy resentments. We hasten age with late hours, and the table, and want of exercise; and hate it, and make it worse when it comes, with bad temper and inactive regrets.

A boy of ten thinks he shall be in the prime of life when he is twenty, and (as lives go) he is so; though, when he comes to be twenty, he shoves off his notion of the prime to thirty, then to thirty-five, then to forty; and when, at length, he is forced to own himself no longer young, he is at once astonished to think he has been young so long, and angry to find himself no younger. This would be hardly fair upon the indulgence of Nature, if Nature supplied us with education as well as existence, and the world itself did not manifestly take time to come to years of discretion. In the early ages of the world, the inability to lead artificial lives was the great cause of longevity; as in future ones, it is to be hoped, the appreciation of the natural life will bring men round to it. It would have put the pastoral, patriarchal people sadly out to keep late hours at night, and to sit after dinner “pushing about” the milk!

Nature, in the mean time, acts with her usual good-natured instinct, and makes the best of a bad business; rather, let us say, produces it in order to produce a better, and to enable us to improve upon her early world. She has even something good to say in behalf of the ill-health of modern times and the rich delicacy of its perceptions; so that we might be warranted in supposing that she is ever improving, even when she least appears to be so; and that your pastoral longevity, though a good pattern in some respects for that which is to come, had but a poor milk-and-water measure of happiness, compared with the wine and the intellectual movement of us intermediate strugglers. At all events, the measure, somehow or other, may be equal—and the difference only a variety of sameness. And there is much comfort in that reflection, and a great difficulty solved in it. Only Nature, after all, still incites us to look forward; and, whether it be for the sake of real or of apparent change, forward we must look, and look heartily, taking care to realize all the happiness we can, as we go. This seems the true mode of keeping all our faculties in action—all the inevitable thoughts given to man, of past, present, and future; and, with this grave reflection, we conclude our present dance under Mr Wilson’s patronage, intending to have another with him before long; and gravely, as well as gaily, recommending his very useful art, meanwhile, to all lovers of health, grace, and sociality.

Why do not people oftener get up dances at home, and without waiting for the ceremony of visitors and the drawback of late hours? It would be a great addition to the cheerfulness and health of families.

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 3d, to Tuesday the 9th September.

We have taken our country entertainment this week from our old and often-plundered friend, Mr Howitt, (who can well afford it), and have followed up the extract with vindications of the dignity of another friend of our’s, not in so high a class of things poetical, but far too lightly esteemed; to wit, the Elder tree. We take them, partly from the ‘Sylvia’ of Cowley’s friend, Evelyn, one of the most learned vindicators of plants vernacular, and partly from Evelyn’s friend, Mr Phillips, (who by the way, as an Irish critic would remark, ought to quote him, when he does so).

MR HOWITT ON SEPTEMBER.

The orchards are affluent of pears, plums and apples; and the hedges are filled with the abundance of their wild produce, crabs, black glossy clusters of privet, blackthorn and elder-berries, which furnish the farmer with a cordial cup on his return from market on a winter’s eve, and blackberries, reminding us of the Babes in the Wood.

Their little hands with blackberries,
Were all besmeared and dyed,
And when they saw the darksome night,
They sat them down and cried.

The hedge rows are also brightened with a profusion of scarlet berries of hips, haws, honeysuckles, viburnum, and briony. The fruit of the mountain-ash, woody night-shade, and wild service, is truly beautiful; nor are the violet-hued sloes and bullaces, or the crimson, mossy excrescences of the wild rose-tree, insignificant objects amid the autumnal splendour of the waning year.

Notwithstanding the decrease of the day, the weather of this month is, for the most part, splendidly calm; and Nature, who knows the most favourable moment to display all her works, has now instructed the geometric spider to form its radiated circle on every bush, and the gossamer spider to hang its silken threads on every blade of grass. We behold its innumerable filaments glittering with dew in the morning, and sometimes, such is the immense quantity of this secretion, that it may be seen floating in a profusion of tangled webs in the air, and cording our clothes as we walk in the fields, as with cotton. These little creatures, the gossamer spiders, it has long been known, have the faculty of throwing out several of their threads on each side, which serve them as a balloon to buoy them up into the air. With these they sail into the higher regions of the atmosphere, or return with greater velocity. By recent experiments it appears that the spider and its web are not, as it was supposed, of less specific gravity than the air, and by that means ascend. The phenomenon has been supposed to be electrical; but this is doubtful. It yet requires explanation.

There is now a brightness of the sky, and a diaphanous purity of the atmosphere, at once surprising and delightful. We remark with astonishment, how perfectly and distinctly the whole of the most extensive landscape lies in varied, solemn beauty, before us; while, such is the reposing stillness of nature, that not a sound disturbs the sunny solitude, save perhaps the clapping of pigeons’ wings, as they rise from the stubble. The clearness of vision may partly arise from the paucity of vapour ascending from the ground at this dry season, and partly from the eye being relieved from the intensity of splendour with which it is oppressed in summer; but be it what it may, the fact has not escaped one of our most beautiful poets:—

“There is a harmony
In Autumn, and a lustre in its sky,
Which through the summer is not heard or seen,
As if it could not be, as if it had not been.”

Now it is delightful among mountains. Mountains! How one’s heart leaps up at the very word! There is a charm connected with mountains so powerful, that the merest mention of them, the merest sketch of their magnificent features, kindles the imagination, and carries the spirit at once into the bosom of their enchanted regions. How the mind is filled with their vast solitude! how the inward eye is fixed on their silent, their sublime, their everlasting peaks! How our heart bounds to the music of their solitary cries, to the tinkling of their gushing rills, to the sound of their cataracts! How inspiring are the odours that breathe from the upland turf, from the rock-hung flower, from the hoary and solemn pine! How beautiful are those lights and shadows thrown abroad, and that fine transparent haze which is diffused over the valleys and lower slopes, as over a vast, inimitable picture!

At this season of the year, the ascents of our own mountains are become most practicable. The heat of summer has dried up the moisture with which winter rains saturate the spongy turf of the hollows; and the atmosphere, clear and settled, admits of the most extensive prospects. Whoever has not ascended our mountains, knows little of the beauties of this beautiful island. Whoever has not climbed their long and heathy ascents, and seen the trembling mountain-flower, the glowing moss, the richly-tinted lichens at its feet; and scented the fresh aroma of the uncultivated sod, and of the spicy shrubs; and heard the bleat of the flock across their solitary expanses, and the wild cry of the mountain plover, the raven, or the eagle; and seen the rich and russet hues of distant slopes and eminences, the livid gashes of ravines and precipices, the white glittering line of falling waters, and the cloud tumultuously whirling round the lofty summits; and then stood panting on that summit, and beheld the clouds alternately gather and break over a thousand giant peaks and ridges, of every varied hue,—but all silent as images of eternity: and cast his gaze over lakes, and forests, and smoking towns, and wide lands, to the very ocean, in all their gleaming and reposing beauty,—knows nothing of the treasures of pictorial wealth which his own country possesses.

[This is rather a rash assertion on Mr Howitt’s part, but luckily he has disproved it so well in all the rest of his book, that we need say nothing further about it.]

EVELYN’S ACCOUNT OF THE ELDER TREE.

This makes a considerable fence, if set of reasonable lusty truncheons, much like the willow, and (as I have seen them maintained) laid with great turpidity. These far excel those extravagant plantations of them about London, where the tops are permitted to grow without due and skilful laying. There is a sort of Elder which has hardly any pith; this makes exceedingly stout fences, and the timber very useful for cogs of mills, butchers’ skewers, and such tough employments. Old trees do in time become firm, and close up the hollowness to an almost invisible pith. But if the medicinal properties of the leaves, bark, berries, &c. were thoroughly known, I cannot tell what our countryman could ail, for which he might not fetch a remedy from every hedge, either for sickness or wound. The inner bark of Elder, applied to any burning, takes out the fire immediately: that, or in season the buds, boiled in water gruel for a breakfast, has effected wonders in a fever; and the decoction is admirable to assuage inflammations and tetterous humours, and especially the scurvy. But an extract, or theriaca (so famous in the poem of ‘Nicander’), may be composed of the berries, which is not only efficacious to eradicate this epidemical inconvenience, and greatly to assist longevity, but is a kind of catholicon against all infirmities whatever; and of the same berries is made an incomparable spirit, which, drunk by itself, or mingled with wine, is not only an excellent drink, but admirable in the dropsy. In a word, the water of the leaves and berries is approved in the dropsy, every part of the tree being useful, as may be seen at large in Bleucwitsius’s Anatomy thereof. The ointment made with the young buds and leaves in May, with butter, is most sovereign for aches, shrunk sinews, hemorrhoids, &c.; and the flowers, macerated in vinegar, not only are of grateful relish, but good to attenuate and cut raw and gross humours. Lastly, the fungus (which we call Jew’s-ears), decocted in milk, or macerated in vinegar, is of known effect in the angina and sores of the throat. And less than this I could not say (with the leave of the charitable physician), to gratify our poor woodman; and yet, when I have said all this, I do by no means commend the scent of it, which is very noxious to the air; and therefore, though I do not undertake that all things which sweeten the air are salubrious, nor all ill savours pernicious, yet, as not for its beauty,* so neither for its smell, would I plant Elder near my habitation; since we learn from Bessius ('De Aeris Potestate'), that a certain house in Spain, seated among many Elder trees, diseased and killed all the inhabitants; which, when at last they were grubbed up, became a very wholesome and healthy place. The Elder does likewise produce a certain green fly, almost invisible, which is exceedingly troublesome, and gathers a fiery redness where it attacks.

BOERHAAVE AND MR. PHILLIPS ON THE SAME SUBJECT.

So far Evelyn. But this is nothing to the veneration, which Mr Phillips, in his 'History of Fruits,' says was entertained for the Elder tree by the famous physician Boerhaave, who "seldom passed it without taking off his hat;" and as to its ill scent, and its hurtfulness as a shade, hear what is delivered by the same welcome historian, besides additional testimony to its virtues:—

"Sir J. E. Smith has remarked that this tree is, as it were, a whole magazine of physic to rustic practitioners."

"It is said, that if sheep that have the rot can get at the bark and young shoots of Elder, they will soon cure themselves."

"The wine made from Elder berries is too well known by families in the country, to need any encomiums; it is the only wine the cottager can procure, and when well made, is a most excellent and wholesome drink, taken warm before going to bed. It causes gentle perspiration, and is a mild opiate."

"If a rich syrup be made from ripe Elder berries, and a few bitter almonds, when added to brandy, it has all the flavour of the very best cherry brandy."

"The white Elder berries, when ripe, make wine much resembling grape wine."

"The buds and the young tender shoots are greatly admired as pickle."

"The leaves of the Elder tree are often put into the subterranean paths of moles, to drive those noxious little animals from the garden. If fruit-trees, flowering shrubs, corn, or other vegetables, be whipped with the green leaves of the Elder branches, it is said that insects will not attach themselves to them. An infusion of these leaves in water is good to sprinkle over rose-buds, and other flowers subject to blight and the devastations of caterpillars."

"The whole plant has a narcotic smell, and it is thought not prudent to sleep under its shade. It is probable that this tree, particularly when in blossom, may inhale more impure air than any others of slower growth. This would naturally be exhaled in the night, and possibly to the injury of those who continued to breathe the immediate air of the tree; but the author has resided in a cottage nearly surrounded with these trees, without perceiving any ill effects, although his children were daily playing and sitting beneath their shade, at a time when the branches were covered with blossom."

In short, the only circumstances we find against the character of the Elder tree are, that it is injurious to poultry, and the last thing which animals in general will brouse upon. But so are many other things, very good for men, and for animals too, in other ways. Elder might be kept out of the farm or cottage yard; but it is admirable everywhere else,—handsome, luxuriant, most useful,—a treasure, both in sight and substance, to the English village,—a capital comforter, and sander to bed, of tired and dried-up faculties,—(try a hot glass of it with toast.)—in fine, the Bearded Bacchus himself,—for this doubtless is the meaning of the word Elder.

* How! "not for its beauty!" Strange misgiving on the part of the unmisgiving Evelyn. An Elder tree is not so handsome as a lilac or syringa; but it is surely very handsome, and has a wholesome, buxom, half-brown look with it, very pastoral and rustic. Its thick blossoms are handsome in spring, and its black berries in autumn.—Ed.

Useless Resentment.—Give no expression, and, as far as you can avoid it, give no place in your mind, to useless resentment; not even where you feel that you are calumniated. If you are accused of bad conduct, past or intended, and it is in your power to disprove the accusation, do not fly into a passion, but give disproofs; to fly into a passion is naturally a guilty man's sole and therefore natural resource; disproofs are the only means of distinguishing your case from that of a guilty man.—Bentham.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XXXIV.—ESCAPE OF THE EARL OF NITHSDALE FROM THE TOWER.

THIS is another story of the Scotch rebellion against the succession of the House of Hanover, and is taken from the same book that furnished us with our romances of last week. As an interesting subject is apt to make us wish to know more of it, or to refresh our memories if we knew it before, we thought the reader would not dislike to see another specimen of the stirring adventures of that period. The Countess of Nithsdale, whose courageous affection saved the life of her husband, has had a sister heroine in our own times in the person of the Countess Lavalette, who, though she succeeded also as far as her husband was concerned, appears to have had an ultra-sensibility of temperament which risked more of her own peace, and thus enhanced the merit of the daring, for she is understood to have lost her senses in consequence of the alarm she underwent. The other day, meeting with one of those delightful old editions of the Spectator, the plain and sober type of which renders them so much pleasanter to read than the modern sharply cut letters and glaring paper, we rejoiced to open it upon a vignette representing the famous vacation of the town of Hensberg, when the Emperor Conrad the Third, who besieged it, gave permission to the female inhabitants to quit the place, taking with them as much as they could carry. Accordingly, they issued forth, each carrying her husband, which so affected the Emperor that he shed tears, pardoned the town, and took the Duke of Bavaria, who commanded it, into favour. Our present subject reminded us of the vignette, and the vignette induced us to read the paper containing the story over again, which so much gratified us, that it has made us devote one of our specimens of celebrated authors to it this week. We hope nobody will complain of the commonness of the admirable work from which it is taken, nor fancy that we do it to "fill up," which most assuredly we do not. We are more perplexed with abundance of materials, than the want of them. But commonly as the Spectator is to be met with, the circle of readers has been so largely and suddenly extended of late years, that there are, doubtless, many persons, capable of enjoying it, who are better acquainted with it by name than by its contents; and to such as know it well, we can only say that we hope they are as glad to see a choice bit of it again as we are, and to perceive the new beauties which are ever developing themselves to one's eyes as we advance in life and become more capable of appreciating the wit and knowledge of these fine writers. But to our romance.

The Earl of Nithsdale (says our authority) was one of those who surrendered at Preston. He was afterwards tried and sentenced to decapitation; but, by the extraordinary ability and admirable dexterity of his Countess, he escaped out of the Tower on the evening before his intended execution, and died at Rome, 1744. The subjoined narrative of the manner in which his escape was effected is so full of interest, that the reader can hardly be displeased at its length, more particularly as it exhibits a memorable instance of that heroic intrepidity to which the female heart can rouse itself on trying occasions, when man, notwithstanding his boasted superiority, is but too apt to give way to despondency and despair. The tenderness of conjugal affection and the thousand apprehensions or anxieties that beset it in adversity, the long pressure of misfortune, and the dread of impending calamity, tend uniformly to overwhelm the spirits and distract the mind from any settled purpose; but it is possible that those sentiments may be absorbed in a more energetic feeling, in a courage sustained by the conflicting influence of hope and desperation. Yet, even thus prepared, the mind may be inadequate to the attainment of a long and perilous enterprise; and, in the present case, we have the testimony of Lady Nithsdale herself, that she would have sunk at the prospect of so many and such fearful obstacles, had she not relied with firmness on the aid of Providence. The detail of her narrative will shew how greatly this reliance contributed to strengthen and regulate the tone of her resolution, not only in every vicissitude of expectation and disappointment, but in what is more trying than either, the sickening intervals of suspense and doubt.

Extract of a letter from Lady Nithsdale to her sister Lady Lucy Herbert, Abbess of the Augustine Nuns at Bruges:—

—On the 22d of February, which fell on a Thursday, a petition was to be presented to the House of Lords. . . . The subject of the debate was whether the King had the power to pardon those who had been condemned by Parliament. . . .

As the motion had passed generally, I thought I could draw some advantage in favour of my design. Accordingly, I immediately left the House of Lords and hastened to the Tower, where, affecting an air of joy and satisfaction, I told all the guards I passed by, that I came to bring joyful tidings to the prisoners. I desired them to lay aside their fears, for the petition had passed the House in their favour. I then gave them some money to drink to the Lords and his Majesty, though it was but trifling; for I thought that if I were too liberal on the occasion they might suspect my designs, and that giving them something would gain their good humour and services for the next day, which was the eve of the execution. The next morning I could not go to the Tower, having too many things on my hands to put in readiness; but in the evening, when all was ready, I sent for Mrs Mills, with whom I lodged, and I acquainted her with my design of attempting my lord's escape, as there was no prospect of his being pardoned; and this was the last night before the execution. I told her that I had everything in readiness, and I trusted she would not refuse to accompany me, that my lord might pass for her. I pressed her to come immediately, as we had no time to lose. At the same time I sent for Mrs Morgan, then usually known by the name of Hilton, to whose acquaintance my dear Evans had introduced me, which I looked upon as a very singular happiness. I immediately communicated my resolution to her. She was of a tall and slender make; so I begged her to put under her own riding-hood one that I had prepared for Mrs Mills, as she was to lend her's to my lord, that, in coming out, he might be taken for her. Mrs Mills was then with child, so that she was not only of the same height, but nearly as the same size as my lord. When we were in the coach, I never ceased talking that they might have no leisure to reflect. Their surprise and astonishment, on my first opening my design to them, had made them consent without ever thinking of the consequences. On our arrival at the Tower, the first I introduced was Mrs Morgan, for I was only allowed to take in one at a time. She brought in the cloths that were to serve Mrs Mills when she left her own behind her. When Mrs Morgan had taken off what she had brought for that purpose, I conducted her back to the staircase, and in going I begged her to send me my maid to dress me; that I was afraid of being too late to present my last petition that night, if she did not come immediately. I despatched her safe, and went partly down stairs to meet Mrs Mills, who had the precaution to hold her handkerchief to her face, as was very natural for a woman to do when she was going to bid her last farewell to a friend on the eve of his execution. I had indeed desired her to do it, that my lord might go out in the same manner. Her eyebrows were rather inclined to be sandy, and my lord's were dark and very thick; however, I had prepared some paint of the colour of her's to disguise his with. I also bought an artificial head-dress of the same coloured hair as her's, and I painted his face with white, and his cheeks with rouge to hide his long beard, which he had not had time to shave. All this provision I had before left in the Tower. The poor guards, whom my slight liberality the day before had endeared me to, let me go quietly with my company, and were not so strictly on the watch as they usually had been; and the more so, as they were persuaded, from what I had told them the day before, that the prisoners would obtain their pardon. I made Mrs Mills take off her own hood, and put on that which I had brought for her. I then took her by the hand, and led her out of my lord's chamber, and in passing through the next room, in which there were several people, with all the concern imaginable, I said, "My dear Mrs Catherine, go in all haste and fetch me my waiting-maid, she certainly cannot reflect how late it is; she forgets that I am to present a petition to-night, and if I let slip this opportunity, I am undone, for to-morrow will be too late. Hasten her as much as possible, for I shall be on thorns till she comes." Everybody in the room, who were chiefly the guard's wives and daughters, seemed to compassionate me exceedingly; and the sentinel officiously opened the door. When I had seen her out, I returned back to my lord, and finished dressing him. I had taken care Mrs Mills did not go out crying as she came in, that my lord might the better pass for the lady who came in crying and affected; and the more so because he had the same dress she wore. When I had almost finished dressing my lord in all my petticoats, I perceived that it was growing dark, and was afraid that the light of the candles might betray us; so I resolved to set off. I went out leading him by the hand, and he held his handkerchief to his eyes. I spoke to him in the piteous and most afflicted tone of voice, bewailing bitterly the negligence of Evans, who had vexed me by her delay. Then said I, "My dear Mrs Betty, for the love of God, run quickly, and bring her with you. You know my lodging, and if you ever made despatch in your life, do it at present, I am almost distracted with this disappointment." The guards opened the doors, and I went down stairs with him, still conjuring him to make all possible despatch. As soon as he had cleared the door, I made him walk before me, for fear the sentinels should take notice of his walk; but I still continued to press him to make all the despatch he possibly could. At the bottom of the stairs, I met my dear Evans, into whose hands I confided him. I had before engaged Mr Mills to be in readiness before the Tower to conduct him to some place of safety, in case we succeeded. He looked upon the affair so very improbable to succeed, that his astonishment when he saw us, threw him into such consternation that he was almost out of himself; which Evans perceiving, with the greatest presence of mind, without telling him anything, lest he should mistrust them, conducted him to some of her own friends, on whom she could rely, and so secured him, without which we should have been undone. When she had conducted him and left him with them, she returned to find Mr Mills, who by this time had recovered himself of his astonishment. They went home together, and having found a place of security they conducted him to it.

In the meanwhile, as I had pretended to have sent the young lady one message I was obliged to return up stairs, and go back to my lord's room in some feigned anxiety of being too late, so that everybody seemed sincerely to sympathize with my distress. When I was in the room, I talked to him as if he had been really present, and answered my own questions in my lord's voice as nearly as I could imitate it; I walked up and down, as if we were conversing together, till I thought they had time enough thoroughly to clear themselves of the guards. I then thought proper to make off also. I opened the door, and stood half in it, that those in the outward chamber might hear what I said; but held it so close that they could not look in. I bade my lord a formal farewell, for the night and added that something more than usual must have happened to make Evans negligent on this important occasion, who had always been so punctual in the smallest trifle; that I saw no other remedy than to go in person: that, if the Tower were still open when I finished my business, I would return that night; but that he might be assured I would be with him as early in the morning as I could gain admittance into the Tower; and I flattered myself I should bring favourable news. Then, before I shut the door, I pulled through the string of the latch, so that it could only be opened on the inside. I then shut it with some degree of force, that I might be sure of its being well shut. I said to the servant as I passed by, who was ignorant of the whole transaction, that he need not carry in candles to his master till my lord sent for them, as he desired to finish some prayers first. I went down stairs, and called a coach. As there were several on the stand, I drove home to my lodgings, where poor Mr Mackenzie had been waiting to carry the petition, in case the attempt had failed. I told him there was no need of any petition, as my lord was safe out of the Tower, and out of the hands of his enemies, as I hoped; but that I did not know where he was. I discharged the coach, and sent for a sedan chair, and went to the Duchess of Buccleugh, who expected me about that time, as I had begged of her to present the petition for me,—having taken my precautions against all events,—and asked if she were at home; and they answered that she expected me, and had another duchess with her. I refused to go up stairs, as she had company with her, and I was not in a condition to see any other company. I begged to be shown into a chamber below stairs, and that they would send her grace's woman to me. I had discharged the chair, lest I might be pursued and watched. When the maid came in, I told her to present my most humble respects to her grace, who, they told me, had company with her; and to acquaint her that this was my only reason for not coming up stairs. I also charged her with my sincerest thanks for her kind offer to accompany me when I went to present my petition. I added, that she might spare herself any further trouble, as it was now judged more advisable to present one general petition in the name of all: however, that I should never be unmindful of my particular obligations to her grace, which I would return very soon to acknowledge in person. I then desired one of the servants to call a chair, and I went to the Duchess of Montrose, who had always borne a part in my distress. When I arrived, she left her company to deny herself, not being able to see me under the affliction which she judged me to be in. By mistake, however, I was admitted—so there was no remedy. She came to me; and as my heart was in an extacy of joy, I expressed it in my countenance as she entered the room. I ran up to her in the transport of my joy. She appeared to be extremely shocked and frightened; and has since confessed to me, that she apprehended my trouble had thrown me out of myself, till I communicated my happiness to her. She then advised me to retire to some place of security, for that the king was highly displeased, and even enraged, at the petition I had presented to him, and had complained of it severely. I sent for another chair; for I always discharged them immediately, lest I might be pursued. Her grace said that she would go to court, to see how the news of my lord's escape was received.

When the news was brought to the king, he flew into an excess of passion, and said he was betrayed; for it could not have been done without some confederacy. He instantly despatched two persons to the Tower, to see that the other prisoners were still secured, lest they should follow the example. Some threw the blame upon one; some upon another; the duchess was the only one at court who knew it.

When I left the duchess, I went to a house which Evans had found out for me, and where she promised to acquaint me where my lord was. She got thither some few minutes after me, and told me, that when she had seen him secure, she went in search of Mr Mills, who, by the time, had recovered himself from his astonishment; that he had returned to her house, where she had found him; and that he had removed my lord from the first place, where she had desired him to wait, to the house of a poor woman directly opposite to the guard house. She had but one small room up one pair of stairs, and a very small bed in it. We threw ourselves upon the bed, that we might not be heard walking up and down. We subsisted on this provision from Thursday to Saturday night, when Mr Mills came and conducted my lord to the Venetian Ambassador's. We did not communicate the affair to his excellency; but one of his servants concealed him in his own room till Wednesday, on which occasion, the Ambassador's coach and six was to go down to Dover, to meet his brother. My lord put on a livery, and went down with the retinue without the least suspicion, to Dover, where Mr Mitchell (which was the name of the Ambassador's servant) hired a small vessel, and immediately set sail for Calais. The passage was so remarkably short, that the Captain threw out this reflection, that the wind could not have served better, if his passengers had been flying for their lives, little thinking it to be really the case. Mr Mitchell might have easily returned without being suspected of being concerned in my lord's escape; but my lord seemed inclined to have him continue with him, which he did, and has at present a good place under our young master.

This is as exact and as full an account of this affair, and of the persons concerned in it, as I could possibly give you, to the best of my memory, and you may rely on the truth of it. I am, with the strongest attachment, my dear sister, your's, most affectionately,

WINIFRED NETHSDALE.

The original MS. of this letter is in the possession of Constable Maxwell, Esq., of Terreagles, a descendant of the noble house of Nethsdale. As a proof of the interest which the public took in the extraordinary adventure which it details, the following memorandum may be quoted. "William Maxwell, Earl of Nethsdale, made his escape from the Tower, Feb. 23, 1715, dressed in a woman's cloak and hood, which were for some time after called Nithsdales."

HOPS.

Heardless, she left me on the dazzling height;
I saw far down beneath my feet the strand
Where busy mortals toil from morn till night,
In quest of that for which a bolder flight
On fancy's pinion I had dar'd to make:
My brain whirl'd round, and sick'ning at the sight,
I fell down headlong in the miry lake,
Whence creatures of earth's mould their earthly feelings take.

And now, what am I? grovelling here below,
Link'd to a chain 'twere vain for me to try
To snap asunder. Ever, as I go,
(Unskill'd, as yet, in apathy) I sigh
That thus, almost unfledged, I sought to fly
In quest of what to patient toil is given;
And ever and anon some passer by Points with his finger, saying, "How he's thriven,
That sought with seraphim to build his nest in heaven."

F. ST JOHN N.

[These are good lines; the last is a fine one. But why seek to build a nest in heaven alone? Why not begin with earth,—with a nest upon the ground, like the lark, lowly, and like a creature made partly for earth; and so vindicate the heavenly part of one's nature at due season, and rise on our wings and enjoy all the Nature around us? By hoping too much, we realize nothing. By realizing something first, we may hope and enjoy as we go, ad infinitum. Or, if we have yet realized nothing, why waste time and spirit in regret, instead of setting our shoulders to the wheel, and vindicating our right to have been mistaken by our hearty resolution to make up for it?]

OUR READERS WHISKED TO THE CONTINENT,

[In Reminiscences of the Rhine, Switzerland, and a Corner of Italy;—specimens of which are here continued from our last.]

Farewell to an old Sojourn.—It was a delightful day this last one. We dined again in the dear old room, with the kind-hearted Luigi Sada waiting on us, guessing our thoughts and anticipating our wishes. This mirror of gardeners, is one of the many things that we regret in quitting Bellaggio; we shall long remember his fine intelligent countenance, his dark Italian eyes, kindling with the strong expression of real feeling, as he bade us farewell,—kissing our hands with all the natural grace and kindly warmth of his country. Good Luigi!—we shall, I hope, all meet again under the shade of the vines, whose rich clusters promise a golden harvest. It would have been delightful to have witnessed the abundant vintage of beautiful Bellaggio, and the festive gaiety of its bacchanalia. But it must not be; already the shadows of night draw round us, and shut out the solitudes where we have passed days never to be forgotten. This is not a spot to be left with an every-day feeling of regret; it is not a common paradise of leaves and flowers, but a scene which deeply affects the imagination, and betters the heart. One cannot look from these airy terraces on the beautiful world around, and on that mysteriously sustained heaven, which makes its roof, without feeling the spirit purified, and the soul lifted above those mean aspirations,* which, while they seem to expand the mind, destroy the fine fibrous net-work which sheaths its delicate construction.

I always find the rhetoric of nature more heart-stirring than that of the schools, and I believe the love of nature is one of the affections which linger longest in the heart. How strongly, as we advance in life, is the vanity of those things which we most prized in youth, made manifest; what importance have we given to untried joys and distinctions, and even to the lightest trifles! A little while, and the most solid† amongst them seem like toys, not worth playing with. We find that feelings, opinion, modes, and even hearts change,—everything but nature; she alone is immutable, and for that reason, her spells are often the last broken. We confide in her promises, and know that she will never deceive us; everything else may be false—hope, love, beauty, friendship, fame,—but nature never. If we sow an acorn by the side of a grave, we are sure that an oak will overshadow it; if we return to the country of our birth, changed and forgotten, we find the same hills and streams, and even the same flowers—if man has not disturbed them—which we loved in childhood. Pæstum has still its roses, though its tombs have long been swallowed up in the general oblivion. These are the reasons why the love of nature has been known to ripen in the heart, amidst the ashes of other, and once warmer feelings. We love, and lean on things that we know will not break down, or forsake us. Of others—even those that flatter us most—we can too often spell the duration; but we are sure of nature, for she must outlive ourselves.

As we descended the hill, a little girl was coming up, with a flock of refractory sheep under her direction; they were somewhat in our path,—enough, I suppose, she thought, to impede us: for she seized L—'s arm with gentle violence, and kissed it as he passed, as if she would deprecate his anger by her sweet and humble action.‡

Italian Dancing.—The ballet (at Milan), considered as one of the best, if not the very best in Europe, is just now below mediocrity, as to dancers. The plunging and twisting, this evening applauded to the skies, would at Paris be scarcely tolerated at Franconi's. It was a ballet d'action, interspersed with pirouettes; the story from Lord Byron's Corsair, with very beautiful scenery, and a Gulnare, who had some feeling in her mute wretchedness. But Le Palarina was absent. I was disappointed, I may almost say, agreeably. I wished to have seen her again, yet recollecting what she had once made me suffer, was almost pleased to escape from the effect of her too powerful acting. It was long before I could shake of the recollection of her Gabrielle de Vergy.§ It haunted me like a crime; for many nights, I fell asleep, thinking of the death-shudder, the upright spring, the livid light in the hollow eye, when the cruel present is placed before her. I had read of broken hearts, and believed that such things

* These are the authoress's own italics. We notice the circumstance, because it shows how conscious she is of certain conventional tendencies that beset her by habit, and how superior to them she is by nature.—Ed.

† This, from the pen of a brilliant writer, apparently in possession of all the goods of fortune, is edifying. It is the luck of many of a less abundant lot to remain richer. We can safely assert, for one, that the blessings which appeared to us the most solid in the days of our youth, appear so still; and that we like precisely the same things we did then, without exception.—Ed.

§ Whose lover's heart was served up to her at supper, by an exasperated husband.—Ed.

had been; but this seemed the reality, the life spring suddenly snapped, just as quick intense agony might have done it. Yet still she has not the touching simplicity of Bigottini; she is more passionate, but perhaps less tender. There were little touches in Bigottini's acting,* so full of truth and feeling, that even Palarina's energetic wretchedness is less deeply affecting.

A Picture with a young Priest in it.—Breakfasted at Voghera, a decent little town, where a young priest seemed chief Adonis, and the peasants carry their poultry and fruit in baskets of a graceful shape, hung on each end of a long pole, which, thus loaded, in suspended across the shoulder; the effect is picturesque, and turns the clowns of Voghera into the classical rustics of Claude or Poussin.

This young priest is very amusing; there is something so naïf and conscious in his beausism. He salutes the women as they pass with a gracious smile, seasoned with a little touch of protection, but no Tartufferie; I dare say he writes madrigals, and with opportunity, and a friendly Pompadour, might make, in some thirty years hence, a very decent cardinal—à la de Bernis.† Adieu, flower of priesthood! and thanks for the five minutes' amusement your innocent antics have afforded us.

A Priest of another aspect.—A reverend father conveying home the fruits of his vineyard passes on foot, and bows to us courteously, while a friendly smile lights up his countenance. It is a thin kind face, that looks as if its owner would use the gifts of fortune sparingly himself, and share them freely with others; the "bon curé" of Marmontel (a character to which the heart always warms) transferred to Italy, where the heavy stall-fed face or the lank despotic one, is found swelling out or scowling from under the shade of a small three-cornered hat,—self-indulgence, or tyranny, or both, written in every line and wrinkle.‡ Whenever I see a countenance full of benevolent and cheerful feeling in this class of the clergy abroad, I always wish its owner had the home blessings which an affectionate family can alone diffuse—a wife or daughter smiling on his return, or a son sharing his labours and promising to perpetuate his virtues,—or at least that the singleness should be voluntary. It may be said that a parish priest has always an ample field for benevolent exertion. This is true, and he who tills and nourishes it in the spirit of truth and love, is indeed a benediction to his people; but it is hard to have one's path chalked out by others in such near-in-door concerns, particularly when the thing is irrevocable.

Italian Villas and their Scenery.—These terraces are one of the most charming features of Genoa. Many of them look upon the gardens and terraces of other houses, others to the mountains, or upon the sea, and some are so high that the street below looks not a span wide, and the passers like figures in a fantoccini. The best apartments are (as usual in Italy) up several flights of stairs, with windows opening on these marble terraces; and from this peculiarity comes, I suppose, the old story that the houses of Genoa are covered with gardens.

There is a great deal of character about the villas which the Genoese hang upon their hills, though the houses seem, in our English eyes, overgrown in proportion to their contracted domains, often little more than two or three terraces, suspended on arches and covered with orange trees, lemons, or acacias, mingled with the dark fig (more magnificent), or the paler olive; but their southern associations give them a colouring of poetry. They do not call up rural images of the familiar kind, such as are awakened by the sight of a hay-field, a green lane, or a thicket of hawthorn; we do not think of Madge or Cicely, of Hodge the ploughman, or the miller's boy, but of downright nymphs of antiquity, and swains to match them; disguised gods, who had much ado to hide their divinity under the shepherd's bonnet, while they sate upon the rocks piping to the fair, half-dressed, statue-like creatures, who peeped out upon them from the orange trees, and were caught in their nets like so many little fishes. Or if the mind flies away from the reprobate gods of old pagan story, as not having enough of intimate reality about them, in steps Shakespeare, leading Juliet and Desdemona, the tender Viola following with love's own smile shining in her eyes, and Beatrice fanning herself with the wing of a parrot. Then come Boccaccio and Da Porto, and Giraldi Cintio, with their legends of love and hate, such as sunny skies and passionate natures engender, and their rainbow tales of sad and joyous spirits.

* "Such as blowing out the lights in Clari, after vainly trying to withdraw her eyes from her lover's portrait."—Author's. This is a charming evidence of feeling indeed.

† Who rose to the heights of the church on the wings of the French loves and graces, and the favour of Madame de Pompadour!—Ed.

‡ We have seen, however, excellent faces among the priesthood of Italy, full of inextinguishable goodness. There are multitudes of bad ones, it is true,—the result of a tyrannical, and what Bentham would call a "lie-compelling" system. We may judge of what sort of character the exceptions must be, that remain good notwithstanding.—Ed.

There were certain simple arrangements of words which Madame de Staël could never hear without emotion, such as "Les orangers du royaume de Grenade, et les citronniers des rois Maures."* This seems fanciful, but it was a spring touched, a train of thought awakened, a remembrance, perhaps, of home striking on the heart in the hour of banishment, and sounding as the song of Sion would have done to the wanderers of Judaea, when they sat by the waters of Babylon and wept. I can easily imagine how the mention of orange groves and marble balconies might shake the soul of an Italian exile, who could listen without sympathy to a tale of sorrow unconnected with his own intense recollections.

Tears.—All strong passions, the angry ones excepted,† use the language of tears: I saw a boy in the street this morning remonstrating with a gentleman, who had probably given him less than he expected for some trifling service. I did not understand what they said, but their gestures were sufficiently indicative. The gentleman was inflexible, and the boy burst into tears: they were certainly tears of avarice; he looked well dressed and over-fed, but I never saw disappointed sordidness so legibly expressed as in the glance which he cast upon the modicum in his open palm. There are tears and tears: nothing can be more heart-touching or meaner than tears; how different the tears of my divine Hagar and this snivelling boy!

A Painter well Painted.—I once knew a clever man, who greatly admired Caravaggio, and used to place him on a line with Michael Angelo. Caravaggio too was a genius; one full of strong broad-shouldered ideas; a perturbed and gloomy spirit, throwing his dark soul out upon his canvass with startling effect; but he did not think or feel like Michael Angelo; his genius was not sublime; he painted like a coarse, bad man of monstrous capacity, but not like one who had unsealed the book of judgment, or lifted up the Pantheon and hung it in the air.

An Interloper among admirable Women, an uncharitable Sister of Charity.—But again to the Albergo dei Poveri. The women are under the superintendence of a community of sisters of charity. It is impossible to see these meritorious and self-devoted women, without feelings of sincere respect; but the venerables, who floated through the wards of the hospital in immense stiffened-out aureoles, were, to say the least, not conciliating. Virtue unretained often makes its way more surely than when it sends a herald before it to knock at our gate, and enforce homage by sound of trumpet. The sister who accompanied us took snuff with an uncharitable air, as if she smelt infection, and glanced us over as if she herself was safe in Abraham's bosom, and we at the purple and fine linen side of the gulf. She would insist on our inspecting some paltry needle-work, and when we declined purchasing, looked venomous. I have so sincere a veneration for these admirable women; the purity of their motives, their courage, zeal, and usefulness belong to so high an order of virtue, that I had almost looked upon them as beings of an intermediate class, with more of heaven than earth about them; consecrated to a mission of tenderness, and fulfilling it as angels might do; and could hardly forgive our cross vulgar old woman for disenchanting me, though it was but for a moment, for I soon returned to my allegiance.

A good Hint to Protestant Churches.—I love the Italian churches with their broad aisles, vast and unfretted—no pews, no divisions, no aristocratical screenings; all kneeling together, the high and mighty, and the lowly, on the same pavement; all sending up their thanksgiving or their prayer, to the same great being in whose eyes all are equal. No dread of vulgar contact, no dread of the tattered penitent. I shall never forget the impression made upon me on my first visit to St Peter's at Rome, by a young lady who came into the church, folded up in a cachemere, and followed by a servant in gorgeous livery; her appearance was that of a petite maitresse, as far as dress was concerned, but her air was devout and collected; she passed on slowly to the illuminated shrine of the saint, and inserted herself amidst a group of masons in their working dresses, kneeling with them on the pavement, and praying earnestly. This was beautiful, and similar acts of humility are performed every hour in the day, and in every church in Italy.

* The orange trees of the realm of Grenada, and the citron trees of the Moorish kings. Surely this was no domestic chord touched in the bosom of Madame de Staël, but her sympathy with pomp and ascendancy, and fine words,—with the poetry of power.—Ed.

† This is a strange mistake to be made by so discerning a writer, though creditable to her own nature. What! did she never see, or even read, of tears of anger and spite, and rage itself? There are passions of all sorts "too deep for tears;" but the same passions, when thrown upon a sense of their own suffering, may equally be seen weeping. Our fair traveller should have been present at a sermon which we had the pleasure of hearing at Genoa, in which the preacher, a friar, handled this subject with a masterly spirit, though in a florid style. He did not mince the matter with his hearers, male or female; and must have startled many a lachrymose egotism.—Ed.

Friends.—Nothing to be done at Sion; so having noted down that the lemon, the orange, the Indian fig, &c. ripen here, forgetting that they are in a Swiss valley, looked out of a window, and saw two young women meet and kiss each other over and over again, and always with a lingering press of hands as if the hearts were over them; perhaps they were, perhaps not. One was much prettier than the other, an inequality sorely against a communion of souls. I wish I were now as devout as I was five-and-twenty years ago, on the subject of friendship. I was then a sincere, an enthusiastic believer; the recollection is still dear to me. But the beautiful drapery in which imagination had enveloped her shadows, was soon torn away by the rude realities of life. Yet I still remember—who can ever forget them?—those delicious day-dreams, those illusions of a confiding nature, to which the heart clings so fondly, so tenaciously; and I still believe in the kind offices of friendship, though I have lost much of my faith in its sincerity. Many a one will do not only an amiable but a disinterested act by a friend, whose weak points they do not hesitate to lay open, and when ridicule has gone its length, quiet their consciences by drawing in with the salvo of "she is an excellent creature, after all, and I love her very sincerely."

"Dieu me garde de mes amis! Quant à mes ennemis, je m'en charge,"—was said in a wise, though bitter spirit. Yet there are no doubt some few susceptible of this fine sentiment in all its purity; indeed I know there are. But the word friendship is too often profaned by its application to vague, unsettled, or entirely worldly feeling; and the sentiment itself is not, I believe, often found in its strength, out of the close domestic circle, where all good feelings take root and flourish, where it is bound up with all the virtues and all the weaknesses of our natures, with love, tenderness, pride, and even with our selfishness and vanity.

As we quitted Sion, I saw the girls still standing in a corner, their eyes growing into each other's,* and their hands joined, as if they defied the powers of envy, jealousy, or distrust, to "rend their ancient love asunder." A cradle friendship probably. Ah! faith is given to the young, and doubt is inflicted on those who advance in life. But I talk of friendship only in the general acceptance of the word; of the closer and dearer ties of intimate kindred, the fire-side ties, who can speak from a more felicitous experience than myself? No one on earth, I believe; I say it in deep thankfulness of spirit, and with the devout and earnest hope of its faithful and long endurance.

[We must have one more batch of extracts, next week, from these interesting volumes.]

* How well said is this! Our charming authoress deserves all the faith and felicity which at the end of this extract, she still describes as belonging to her, notwithstanding her polite life experience, in which friends ridicule one another at all lengths behind their backs, and finish by calling their victims "excellent creatures, after all." God keep me from my friends!—I can take care of my enemies myself!—is indeed a wise saying for the friends of such friends; but the whole perplexity, as our authoress intimates, arises from an abuse of words. Any body can be convinced that there are real friends in the world by being one himself; and not behaving in the manner above mentioned, even if he has not had the luck (as we have had) of realizing friendship in its noblest form on the part of others.—Ed.

LETTER OF ARCHBISHOP HERING

(THEN BISHOP OF BANGOR)

TO A FRIEND, RESPECTING A SCENE IN WALES.

Kenington, September 11, 1730.

DEAR SIR,—I met your letter here on my return from Wales. I bless God for it, I am come home quite well, after a very romantic, and, upon looking back, I think it a most perilous journey. It was the year of my primary visitation, and I determined to see every part of my diocese, to which purpose I mounted my horse, and rode intrepidly, but slowly, through North Wales to Shrewsbury. I am a little afraid, if I should be particular in my description, you would think I am playing the traveller upon you; but indeed I will stick religiously to truth; and because a little journal of my expedition may be some minutes' amusement, I will take the liberty to give it you. I remember, on my last year's picture of North Wales, you complimented me with somewhat of a poetical fancy; that, I am confident, you will not now; for a man may as well expect poetical fire at Copenhagen, as amidst the dreary rocks of Merionethshire.* You find by this intimation that my landscapes are likely to be something different from what they were before, for I talk somewhat in the style of Othello—

"— of antres vast, and deserts wide, Rough quarries, rocks, and hills whose heads touch heaven."

* To this (says Dr Knox, very truly) his lordship's letter is one exception; and Ambrose Phillips's poem "from Copenhagen," published in the "Tatler," is another. Mr Haulitt refers somewhere to the letter before us, as an excellent one of the descriptive order.

I set upon this adventurous journey on a Monday morning, accompanied (as bishops usually are) by my chancellor, my chaplain, secretary, two or three friends, and our servants. The first part of our road lay across the foot of a long ridge of rocks, and was over a dreary morass with here and there a small dark cottage, a few sheep, and more goats, in view, but not a bird to be seen, save, now and then, a solitary heron watching for frogs. At the end of three miles we got to a small village, where the view of things mended a little, and the road and the time were beguiled by travelling for three miles along the side of a fine lake full of fish, and transparent as glass. That pleasure over, our work became very arduous, for we were to mount a rock, and in many places of the road, over natural stairs of stone. I submitted to this, which they told me was but a taste of the country, and to prepare me for worse things to come. However, worse things did not come that morning, for we dined soon after out of our own wallet, and though our inn stood in a place of most frightful solitude, and the best formed for the habitation of monks (who once possessed it) in the world, yet we made a cheerful meal. The novelty of the thing gave me spirits, and the air gave me appetite much keener than the knife I ate with. We had our music too, for there came in a harper, who soon drew about us a group of figures that Hogarth would give any price for. The harper was in his true place and attitude; a man and a woman stood before him, singing to his instrument wildly, but not disagreeably; a little dirty child was playing with the bottom of the harp; a woman in a sick night-cap hanging over the stairs; a boy with crutches fixed in a staring attention; and a girl carding wool in the chimney, and rocking a cradle with her naked feet, interrupted in her business by the charms of the music; all ragged and dirty, and all silently attentive. These figures gave us a most entertaining picture, and would please you or any man of observation; and one reflection gave me particular comfort, that the assembly before us demonstrated, that even here, the influential sun warmed poor mortals and inspired them with the love of music. When we had despatched our meals, and had taken a view of an old church, very large for that country, we remounted, and my guide pointed to a narrow pass between two rocks, through which, he said, our road lay. It did so; and in a little time we came at it. The inhabitants call it in their language, "the road of kindness." It was made by the Romans for their passage to Carnarvon. It is just broad enough for a horse, paved with large flat stones, and is not level, but rises and falls with the rock at whose feet it lies. It is half a mile long. On the right hand, a vast rock hangs almost over you; on the left, close to the path, is a precipice, at the bottom of which rolls an impetuous torrent, bounded, on the other side, not by a shore, but by a rock, as bare, not so smooth, as a whetstone, which rises half a mile in perpendicular height. Here we all dismounted, not only from reasons to just fear, but that I might be in leisure to contemplate in pleasure, mixed with horror, this stupendous mark of the Creator's power. Having passed over a noble bridge of stone, we found ourselves upon a fine sand, then left by the sea, which here indents upon the country, and arrived in the evening, passing over more rough country, at our destined inn. The accommodations there were better than we expected, for we had good beds and a friendly hostess, and I slept well, though by the number of beds in the room, I could have fancied myself in an hospital. The next morning I confirmed at the church, and after dinner set out for the metropolis of the country, called Dolgelle. There I staid, and did business the next day, and the scene was much mended. The country I had hitherto passed through was like one not made by the Father of the Creation, but in the wrath of power; but here were inhabitants, a town and church, a river, and fine meadows. However, on the Thursday, I had one more iron mountain of two miles to pass, and then was entertained with the green hills of Montgomeryshire, high indeed, but turfed up to the top, and productive of the finest sheep; and from this time the country and the prospects gradually mended, and indeed the whole economy of nature, as we approached the sun; and you cannot conceive what an air of cheerfulness it gave us, to compare the desolations of North Wales with the fine valleys and hills of Montgomeryshire, and the fruitful green fields of fair Warwickshire. For I made myself amends in the following part of my journey, directing my course through Shrewsbury, Woolverhampton, Birmingham, Warwick, and Oxford, some of the finest towns and counties in the island. But I must stop, and not use you so unmercifully.—I am, dear sir, your obliged and affectionate humble servant,

The Golden Rule of Love.—I am of opinion that in matter of sentiment there is but one rule, that of rendering the object of our affections happy: all others are invented by vanity.—De Stael.

SPECIMENS OF CELEBRATED AUTHORS.

ADDISON.

His Dream of a Besieged Town.

THE reason of our choosing this specimen for the present number, will be seen in "The Romance of Real Life." It furnishes one of the most amusing evidences of that fanciful wit, for which, as well as for the purer essence of it, or the amalgamation of remote ideas, Addison is remarkable; and we may observe in it that instinctive spleen, and wish to find fault, which is perhaps no less to be found in him, though veiled in all sorts of delicate zeal for the welfare of his polite readers. He had here got a real story, altogether creditable to the fair sex, and yet he could not help turning it into a satire. Conscious of this mischief himself, he has admirably passed off the joke as a letter from Will Honeycomb, and taxed his imaginary friend with it at the close. The world is too much indebted to Addison to quarrel with him for his wit, however exercised, especially considering the natural temptations to which the faculty is subject; but if Steele had got hold of this story, it would have charmed him into other stories equally true, and equally creditable to his fair friends.

My friend Will Honeycomb has told me, for above this half year, that he had a great mind to try his hand at a Spectator, and that he would fain have one of his writing in my works. This morning I received from him the following letter, which, after having rectified some little orthographical mistakes, I shall make a present of to the public.

"Dear Spec,—I was about two nights ago in company with very agreeable people of both sexes, where, talking of some of your papers which are written on conjugal love, there arose a dispute among us whether there were not more bad husbands in the world than bad wives. A gentleman, who was advocate for the ladies, took this occasion to tell the story of a famous Siege in Germany, which I have since found related in my historical dictionary, after the following manner:—When the Emperor Conrad the Third had besieged Guelfus, Duke of Bavaria, in the city of Hensberg, the women, finding that the town could not possibly hold out long, petitioned the emperor that they might depart from it with so much as each of them could carry. The emperor, knowing that they could not convey away many of their effects, granted them their petition; when the women, to his great surprise, came out of the place with every one her husband upon her back. The emperor was so moved at the sight that he burst into tears, and, after having very much extolled the women for their conjugal affection, gave the men to their wives and received the duke into his favour.

"The ladies did not a little triumph at this story, asking us in our consciences whether we believed that the men in any town of Great Britain would, upon the same offer, and upon the same conjuncture, have loaded themselves with their wives; or rather, whether they would not have been glad of such an opportunity to get rid of them? To this my good friend Tom Dapperwit, who took upon him to be the mouth of our sex, replied, that they would be very much to blame if they would not do the same good office for the women, considering that their strength would be greater and their burdens lighter. As we were amusing ourselves with discourses of this nature, in order to pass away the evening, we fell into that laudable and primitive diversion of questions and commands. I was no sooner vested with the regal authority, but I enjoined all the ladies, under pain of my displeasure, to tell the company ingenuously, in case they had been in the siege above mentioned, and had the same offer made them as the good women of that place, what every one of them would have brought off with her, and have thought most worth the saving. There were several merry answers made to my question, which entertained us till bedtime. This filled my mind with such a bundle of ideas, that upon going to sleep, I fell into the following dream.

"I saw a town of this island, which shall be nameless, invested on every side, and the inhabitants so straitened, as to cry for quarter. The general refused any other terms than those granted to the town of Hensberg, namely, that the married women might come out with what they could bring along with them. Immediately the city gates flew open, and a female procession appeared, multitudes of the sex following one another in a row, and staggering under their respective burdens. I took my stand upon an eminence in the enemy's camp, which was appointed for the general rendezvous of these female carriers, being very desirous to look into their several loadings. The first of them had a huge sack upon her shoulders which she set down with great care. Upon the opening of it, when I expected to have seen her husband shot out of it, I found it was filled with china-ware.

The next appeared in a more decent figure, carrying a handsome young fellow upon her back. I could not forbear commending the young woman for her conjugal affection, when, to my great surprise, I found she had left the good man at home, and brought away her gallant. I saw the third, at some distance, with a little withered face peeping over her shoulder, whom I could not suspect for any but her spouse. I heard her call him dear Pug, and found him to be her favourite monkey. A fourth brought a huge bale of cards along with her; and the fifth, a Bolonia lap-dog; for her husband, it seems, being a very burly man, she thought it would be less trouble for her to bring away little Cupid. The next was the wife of a rich usurer, laden with a bag of gold; she told us that her spouse was very old, and by the course of nature could not expect to live long; and that to shew her tender regards for him she had saved that which the poor man loved better than his life. The next came towards us with her son upon her back, who, we were told, was the greatest rake in the place, but so much the mother's darling, that she left her husband behind with a large family of hopeful sons and daughters, for the sake of this graceless youth. It would be endless to mention the several persons with their several loads, that appeared to me in this strange vision. All the place about me was covered with packs of ribbands, brocades, embroidery, and ten thousand other materials sufficient to have furnished a whole street of toy-shops. One of the women, having a husband who was none of the heaviest, was bringing him off upon her shoulders at the same time that she carried a great bundle of Flanders lace under her arm; but finding herself so overlaid that she could not save both of them, she dropped the good man and brought away the bundle. In short, I found but one husband among this great mountain of baggage, who was a lively cobbler, that kicked and spurred all the while his wife was carrying him on, and, as it was said, had scarce passed a day in his life without giving her the discipline of the strap.

"I cannot conclude my letter, dear Spec, without telling thee one very odd whim in this my dream. I saw, methought, a dozen women employed in bringing off one man; I could not guess who it should be, till, upon his nearer approach, I discovered thy short phiz. The women all declared that it was for the sake of thy works, and not thy person, that they brought thee off, and that it was on condition that thou shouldst continue the Spectator. If thou thinkest this dream will make a tolerable one, it is at thy service from,

"Dear Spec, thine, sleeping and waking,

"WILL HONEYCOMB."

The ladies will see by this letter what I have often told them, that Will is one of those old-fashioned men of wit and pleasure of the town, that shews his parts by raillery on marriage, and one who has often tried his fortune that way without success. I cannot, however, dismiss his letter without observing that the true story on which it is built does honour to the sex, and that, in order to abuse them, the writer is obliged to have recourse to dream and fiction.

A COMPLAINT AGAINST HARD VILLAGE WAYS.

To the Editor of the London Journal.

"Solitude," says Lord Bacon, "is fitted only for a wild beast or a god." It is then quite plain that is unfit for man, or woman. There are few who can appreciate the grandeur of that solitude of which the philosopher speaks, it being too far removed from the scale of humanity. The solitude of those who live on the confines of an anti-social village, may be more readily comprehended. In such village it is the hap of the writer to live. Let it not be imagined, that the village is remote from the means and appliances of civilization. On the counter of the principal stationer, is to be seen The London Journal, with the lesser satellites, all good in their spheres. Thither all the flower of the village repair, some to deposit treasures too precious to consign to vulgar messengers, (this being also the Post-office,) others in quest of mottoes and valentines; and all, let us hope, finally, to learn urbanity, from the perusal of those worthies. No village can be more famous for forming "Resolutions." But the deposing a superannuated officer in blue, with gold lace, and the election of a successor, duly announced with other magisterial matters, are after all insufficient to excite a perpetual interest. There is one resolution wherein they are not unanimous, and which it is suspected, is the cause of its being in appearance a deserted village. The foot-paths are compounded of the sharpest flints, and the hugest gravel-stones. They present more angles than ever geometry dreamed of, none of them right angles. It can never be right to place stumbling-blocks in the way of those, who, but for such impediments, might perchance have been social. Were the danger of corns coming in contact with harder excrecences removed, visits might be made and returned in more due season, and thus some of the fardels of solitude be mitigated.

Poets may say what they please, but there is a monotony in a country life, which induces a torpor in the mind long used to its influence. Now, dear Editor, you "to the muses have been bound this many a year, by strong indenture," and if you were upon honour, you could not affirm, that the country is omnipotent in the construction of poetry, or in the relish for its beauties. Poetry is "all made out of the (poet's) brain," and is independent of situation. You know from whence Milton, Thomson, Goldsmith, cum multis aliis, drew off their inspirations. How many courts and alleys dark have been illuminated by the rays of their genius. Had Mr Tibbs (beau Tibbs) been poetical, he might, in the altitude of his Prospect, of which he was so chary, have invoked his muse as successfully, as in any of those domains, whose owners were among his familiars. Lady M. W. Montagu, (who is not cited as a poetical authority,) says of the country, "People mistake much in placing peace in woods and shades, for I believe solitude puts people out of humour, and makes them disposed to quarrel," &c. You may say, how can those quarrel who have none to quarrel with! Remember, dear Mentor, that the solitude of our village is not quite so savage. We make up a small family party ourselves, where dissensions might be held in perpetuity, if that were our taste; but being all remarkable for good temper and forbearance, we desire to assemble around us the anti-social, that they may witness the pleasure arising from such happy temperaments. In this laudable pursuit, we crave the benefit of your co-operation, being all, and severally, your constant readers and admirers from "auld lang syne."

G—A PAULINE; 'THE GENERAL;' &c. &c.

August 11th, 1834.

We grant to our fair correspondent that the "country is not omnipotent," &c. and that "poetry is made out of the poet's brain;" but then the country helps to put it there. The poet, "in the lake of the heart," (as Dante calls it) reflects every thing; but assuredly the trees and mountains are among the things which he reflects most willingly. We sympathize heartily with our fair friends (and brown) in their wish to see people's "ways" mended, with regard to the facilities of companionship; but might not shoes a little stouter be ventured in, by the stout hearts that so often reside in fair bodies? As to the General, we presume his movements wait upon those of his friends; otherwise he, of course, is not a man to be daunted by these obstacles to his foot. The great secret of enjoyment is to pass half one's time in occupation (not merely the name of it), and so build the pleasure of the other half upon that basis. But ladies and gentlemen (as the world goes) are apt to begin their day a little too comfortably, and to enjoy too much of each other's society at once; the consequence of which is, that they get tired of it before it is over. Now, a beautiful day, one would think, might be built up of solitary study or other occupation for half the time,—and books, music, laughing, chatting, &c. the rest, not omitting walks, of course, nor a reasonable number of visits; for the latter would be hardly wanted in any great proportion. If happiness be not thus realized by amiable people, such as our "constant readers," it is for want of something in the ordinances of society at large, and not merely in that of their neighbourhood.

Conveyance of Reproof.—Avoid accompanying your censure with any expression of scorn, with any phraseology which shall convey a wish of your's to degrade or lower the object of your reproof in the social scale.—Bentham.

TO GATHERED ROSES.

(IN IMITATION OF HERRICK.)

Sweete floweres! ye were too fair:
With drooping lids
Among your heavie morning teares
I found ye.
Faire buds! I left ye there:
For sorrow bids
Briefe greeting to gay youthe; it feares
To wounde ye.

But, deare roses,—in your noone
That graceful merrie prime,—
I stole away the lovelie boone:
And was it not a crime
To rob the wooing aire of your sweete breath?
Ah! daintie floweres,
The wanton houres
Of mid-day's golden shine,
Will see ye pine
To-morrow,—and so fade away to death!

I've marr'd your blisses,
Those sweete kisses,
That the young breeze so loved yesterdays!
I've seen ye sighing,
Now ye're dying;—
How could I take your prettie lives away?

Sweete floweres, ye were too faire:
Your beautie was youre bane
(To whom is it a gane?)
I would I had not founde ye!—
Faire buds! Dying,—ye are
So verie sweete
That of Death's paine ye do him cheate;—
Ah! I could die with ye arounde me.

'YOUR ADDRESS.'

(For the London Journal.)

[The following lively and various article has been sent us by some civic observer, who furnishes estimable evidence of the advance of knowledge and reflection among the middle classes, both in his own person and in those of his friends.]

"Give me your address!" is a very common expression amongst all people moving in what may be called respectable society; but as we descend a little lower in the scale, we then hear asked, what just answers the same purpose, "Where do you live?" Now, although the one equally answers to the other in the end, there is yet a very marked and great distinction betwixt the two. In the former, the person applied to gives his address merely as where he can be heard of or spoken to, perhaps accompanied by a parenthesis, "from 12 to 4 o'clock." The latter, again, is in general given as the bona fide residence, name of the street and number, verbatim. I lately mused on this subject in going to make a call on a person living in rather an intricate part of this great metropolis, and having passed street after street, and square after square, in which I thought it just as likely he might live as anywhere else, after many turnings and windings, I found him correctly enough at the place and number given. It was like the solution of a problem in Euclid, or a question in Dillworth—equals to equals—side to side—second to the right, first to the left (for so I was told by a baker), on the right 37 will be found, which accordingly was the point I required. On going along, I could not help revolving in my mind this daily and familiar expression which I think is seldom sufficiently noticed; for, although it is not the "silver link and silken tie" of the poet, I consider it as the mighty chain that links the great mass of society, and that binds us all, as it were, in one body.

Now as I merely purpose giving a few ideas which keep floating in my mind on this subject, I shall not enter into the various definitions of the word itself, which might be used with propriety in a thousand different ways. For instance, we say "He addressed us in so rude a manner we were obliged to leave;" "The King read the address from the throne in a firm and audible voice—My Lords and Gentlemen, &c.;" "He spoke the address on the stage beautifully;" "He is really good looking and handsome, but he has a very awkward address." Again we hear it said "She is not considered pretty, but what a pleasing and elegant address!" and if there is any thing that the ladies—dear creatures—do not possess, in communion with us, it is that we have the privilege of paying our address, but to their credit be it spoken, it may oftentimes be ranked amongst the rejected.

But confining myself to the original idea with which I began, that of residence, I shall in the first place notice when a person first comes to London. He proceeds to find out a good lodging in some respectable street, in order that he may give "a good address," which really must be considered as a very proper feeling. Others bearing the idea of Johnson in mind (to get the greatest saving) live in a garret, and give their address at a coffee-house hard by. Following this idea a little further, the various club-houses, in Waterloo-place and St James's street, may be considered respectable cards of address, and the subscribers to them merely go there to lounge, read the papers, and dine, at the same time domiciling in some respectable tradesman's first or second floor, according to their circumstances. Surgeons, lawyers, and other professional men, are fond of a good address. I have known persons of this class, who would rather sacrifice their comfort than forego the proud distinction of having a good address, such as Harley street, Wimpole street, or Portland place, although incidentally you may find washerwomen living at the west-end, and mechanics in May Fair.

In the second place there is scarcely anything we should exercise our discretion in more strictly than in giving our address. This I would strongly impress on all, from "buxom youth to mellow age." It has sometimes good results—it very often has evil. I have known a conceived insult at the theatre, which would have been resented on the spot, and might have led to shame and confusion of face, very quietly settled by "Your address, sir."—"My card, sir." The parties went home with it in their pockets, slept, and never saw, heard, or thought of each other again; thus most courteously preventing a duel in Chalk Farm or Battersea Fields. I once had an address card put into my hand in some spree of this kind, when, on looking on the card afterwards, I found it to be that of a gentleman belonging to the Treasury, and a friend of my own, which had been given either by mistake or design. Had I perceived so on the instant, who can tell what might have been the consequence? Perhaps it was picked up at some house where he had occasion to call, as I lately could have filled both pockets at a dress-maker's in Albemarle street, who had with great seeming industry stuck about a thousand all round a glass, as if to make one believe she was visited by "all the world and his wife." Very often, however, the effects of giving an address are evil. At a trial at Westminster, within these six months, in which I was personally interested—the case was this:—Two gentlemen coming from Richmond were jostled by three fellows; one, a journeyman watchmaker, living in the purlieus of Clerkenwell, and who then and there demanded their address, which was immediately given without any consideration. When it was found to be respectable, they trumped up a story about losing watches, and, after a trial of three hours, were scouted out of court, but left the gentlemen most vexatiously to pay their own costs. This, as was justly remarked by one of the counsel, was all occasioned by giving an address to parties of their stamp and character.

Losing an address and having none, are other great evils. I have known many beautiful effusions of the heart lost to the world from this very cause; and I now have a letter before me written in the most affectionate and explanatory terms, to a young lady by a gentleman, who, doubtless, in the ardour of his love had not sufficiently attended to the address, which consequently fell into my hands, and was therefore lost to her, purely through a wrong address. It may be the parties are now wide as the poles asunder; and how often does it happen when we walk forth in the populous streets of this city, or when we are perhaps quietly seated inside a stage-coach, going along like the "Jolly young waterman," thinking of nothing at all, we are agreeably joined by blooming cheeks and sparkling eyes, the owner of which, as if by enchantment, almost makes one's heart her own. We feel this—we would instantly declare this—if prudence did not whisper in a tone of doubt—"You do not know her address." I should be inclined to suggest the propriety of each person, male as well as female, carrying "their address" in some way or other where it might be seen and read; it might save a great deal of unnecessary disappointment, and a great deal of unnecessary importunity and imprudence, which the fair sex, I dare say, often endure. I lately had the curiosity to inquire the object of an old woman, whom I observed wandering as Adagio, and, grave as Jomelli's ghost, simply looking at every door and number in a street, in Westminster. She said she had come up from the country to see her son, but having lost his address would be forced to return again. It is curious to consider an address in this way. We hear perhaps of a friend or a lady being in town, and wonder much we do not see them, or have a call. We write to their friends—a thirteen-penny-halfpenny comes in return. We set out some fine morning after breakfast, when in good humour with oneself and all the world; and after bending one's steps to St John's Wood or Hackney, find the object almost without any trouble, enjoying all the luxuries and happiness of an English fireside. Thus an address is a complete leading-string to our object, for while we have the address of any of our friends we cannot say they are lost to us, although they may be far—far away. Again, I ever look with suspicion when I find that a person cannot readily give his address, and the inquiry sometimes acts as a kind of touchstone. The tongue falters; you no longer look on a countenance void of expression, a barber's block, or a graven image; but the face assumes a complexion of a kind which to the observant eye cannot be mistaken for the blush of innocence, or hue of health. No. 'Tis because its head reposes on some dirty pillow in the neighbourhood of Manila place, or the boundaries of the King's Bench. Though some there are who, lost to every sense of feeling in this respect, care not who knows their address, and who go on like the Caird in Burns's Jolly Beggars, saying,—

"Let them cant about decorum
Who have characters to lose."

I was lately led into a curious speculation of certain classes of persons, who have no fixed residence or "address." Such as travellers, soldiers, and sailors; but first of all let me begin with myself. I often find myself in a humour to be alone, although I cannot imagine my own company half so delightful as Lord Ogilby's picture of himself, when alone, in the Clandestine Marriage. However, I sometimes steal away for a day or so, and place myself in the corner of some inn, in the suburbs, where I feel a peculiar satisfaction in being beyond the reach of anything like a twopenny-post man's knock, my address being for the time known to no single creature in the world, except myself; and there are people in this mighty Babylon, who "live and move and have their being" no person knows nor cares where (a hermit in London is proverbial); who live almost without the aid of the world, and who die (I may say) without an address. Again, a friend goes to visit the falls of Niagara and America. He may, meanwhile, be considered quite out of the world, in regard to us; suddenly we receive to our great joy, a ship letter containing his address. He thus immediately becomes again one of our kindred. A friend of mine lately related to me rather a curious incident of this kind. In the summer of last year, he left his house in Bond street, and after visiting various places in the north, during which time (about three weeks) he had not written home, nor heard from thence, he found himself curiously situated, and quite alone, on some stepping stones, which led a considerable way into a loch, somewhere betwixt Loch Lomond and Loch Tay. It all at once occurred to him, that he stood, as it were, alone in the midst of the world. On casting his eyes around, it so happened as if every moving and creeping thing on the face of the earth had hid itself. No lambskins sported near, nor shepherds piped on the lea. The descending sun was casting its long streaks of light and shade on the scene, shadowing the sides of the mighty hills, deep and motionless, into the waters of the lake, which all the "chalk and reel" of Salvator Rosa or Claude can give but a faint idea of. As he looked around on this calm and pleasing prospect, he was struck with the grandeur of the panorama. The mountains, near and at a distance, seemed by their profound stillness to be awaiting some awful event that was about to befall. Yet he thought of "home and beauty"—he thought of Bond street—he thought of scales, weights, and measures—of the many pounds of tea and coffee that had that morning been served out to the many unwashed housemaids from the streets adjacent to his establishment. As to his young men, they knew nothing save that his name stood as bright in the gold letters above his door as ever, and that the shop was kept as regularly open from morning till night, as before. He also imagined that as many carriages and people would be passing his windows, as when he himself stood at the door of his house. But now, where was he? On the bounds of eternity! "Awful thought!" said he to himself; "were I to jump a yard, or perhaps stir a foot, I might never again be heard of, my address being known only to myself; and having no relations, my goods and my chattels, what would become of them in all the world!"

Again, we may consider a correct address of the first importance in a commercial point of view. But for this, commerce, both by sea and land, would soon stand still. Look at this city, for instance, and at the recent returns of the Post Office, which show such a large sum coming yearly into the hands of Government, from being enveloped in an improper address; and at the West-end, morning visits, evening calls, soirées, and conversations, would be all at an end, but for this one thing. Changing our address is oftentimes attended with bad consequences, both to business and friends. An acquaintance of mine, who had lived in Archangel, for some years, did not receive my last letter to him. When he came to London, he called on me as before. I was gone no one knew where; he gave up, as hopeless, the idea of finding me. But the very day before he sailed again for the White Sea, he met me near Hamlet's, the jeweller's, and accosted me thus; "My dear fellow, I am truly glad to see you, only think what an extraordinary thing my meeting you amongst one million and half of people without an address!" A wide address may be considered as a great object of ambition, and may serve, if duly considered in well-regulated minds, to stimulate the youth of the present day to more than ordinary exertion. This kind of address has been enjoyed by some of our most eminent men in commerce and literature; thus—Kirkman Finlay, Glasgow—Dr Brewster, Edinburgh—Henry Brougham, London—Benjamin Constant, Paris—Washington Irving, America—Dr Herschel, Europe.

To conclude this sketch. Sailors may be considered as having no address, they being so often, as it were, out of the pale of society. They may send to us—we cannot send to them. This circumstance no doubt must have grieved the heart of the gallant poet, Dorset, when he wrote that beautiful address "To all you Ladies now at Land," for no answer could come in return to men whose post was the tide, and whose address was the sea.

BONNET, THE NATURALIST, AND A VISITOR AT FAULT.

THIS is from the travels of Matthison, the German writer. We do not see the "inexpressible forbearance and benevolence" of Bonnet towards his visitor; though his conduct was truly polite and good natured, and worthy of a man of sense. Neither is the poor traveller despised: he at least meant well. But the scene is amusing.

Three days ago, I was at Geneva, and dined at a table d'hôte. A young Englishman sat by me, whom I soon recognised as one of the storks in Lessing's well-known fable, who, in their excursions, seldom concerned themselves with anything except to ascertain the topography of frog-ditches. He asked me where Bonnet lived; this introduced a conversation among us, which at length led to my inquiring if he had ever read any of Bonnet's works. "No; I know nothing at all about him, but he is here in my list;" and immediately taking out a pocket-book, he produced a paper, whence he read the following inventory of things worthy of observation in Geneva:—I. The Portico of St Peter's Church;—II. The Junction of the Arve with the Rhone;—III. Sausure's Cabinet of Natural Curiosities;—IV. Monsieur Bonnet;—V. Monsieur Bourrit. "As you have never read any of his works then," said I, "might it not be as well to go to the bookseller's and get him to shew you some: his Contemplation de la Nature, for instance,—read some chapters, and you would then not only be less embarrassed in case he should ask you whether you are at all acquainted with his writings, but you would, I am sure, have very great pleasure in the perusal."

He thanked me for my advice, which he said he would certainly follow, and then left me, after having carefully entered the name of Bonnet's place of abode in his pocket-book.

Yesterday, after dinner, as we were playing at chess, a foreigner was introduced, whom I immediately recollected to be the person I had seen before. Bonnet received him with that cordiality and conciliatory kindness with which you are so well acquainted, and begged him to sit down on the sofa. After the conversation had ran through the customary forms of "Whence come you?" and "Whither are you going?" &c. &c., Bonnet addressed him—

"You have probably occupied yourself, sir, with speculative philosophy?"

"No, not at all, but I saw all your works yesterday."

"Saw them!"—He stopped short, but supposing that the young man who spoke French very ill, had made use of some wrong expression, immediately proceeded:—"It would make me very happy if my writings afforded you any entertainment. Might anything in particular strike you?"

"Yes, yes, indeed, the Glaciers in particular, for they are all excellens naturels."—I gave you his own expressions.

There was no occasion for an Oedipus here to divine that, according to my advice, he had been to a bookseller's where, confusing Bonnet with Bourrit as they stood together on his list, he had inquired for the works of the latter, and had seen his travels in the Alps, the engravings in which had probably attracted his attention, and were the only part of which he had any idea. Bonnet immediately perceived his mistake, and it was really quite affecting to see how, instead of taking advantage of it and leading him on to stumble further and further, so as to produce a piquant scene, (as an hundred others would have done in his place), he instantly with inexpressible forbearance and benevolence gave the conversation another turn, and asked him many questions about his own country, his family, and even about his horses and dogs.

Such traits as these, which at the first glance, may appear insignificant, are however those by means of which Plutarch, in his Biography, gives such impressive pictures, and which so completely delude the imagination, that Timoleon, Dion, and Philopomen do not appear as spirits called forth from the hoary ages of antiquity, but as intimate friends, with whom we have lived in social intercourse for many years, in the same town at least, if not under the same roof. And, after all, this kind of forbearance is one of the most amiable features in the human character, and perhaps one of the most difficult to practice.

THE RETURN.

FREELY TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF
C. MÜCHLER.

Art thou the land with which my fancy teems,
Whose golden plains once brightly round me shone?
Which oft hath shed sweet magic o'er my dreams,
And cheer'd me on with hope when feeble grown?
Art thou the land? Art thou the land?
I greet thee, I greet thee, O my fatherland!

Art thou the town, beside the rippling stream,
Tow'rd which, in sadness, oft my eye I've cast?
Where life's unclouded spring did on me beam,
And the young hours in thrilling pleasure passed?
Art thou the town? Art thou the town?
To thee, to thee I come, O native town!

Art thou the home in which my cradle stood,
Where sorrow's bitter pang I never knew?
The future there appeared a glowing flood,
The world a path, where joys celestial grew.
Art thou the home? Art thou the home?
Receive me once again, paternal home!

Are ye the meads? Art thou the peaceful vale,
Which oft at silent eve, I've blithely crossed?
My spirit then would o'er your bound'ries steal,
Until each trace in fading blue was lost.
Are ye the meads? Are ye the meads?
Receive me once again, O native meads!

Could I here rest, and rural joys be mine,
The storm would cease—a brighter morning break;
My pilgrim-staff I'd to the brook consign,
And, borne by friendship, life's last journey take
To thee, O grave—To thee, O grave,
Where rest my fathers; gladly, then, O grave!

Art of being Obeyed.—The mandate which exacts obedience may lose the despotic character with which harshness would invest it, and become even pleasurable, if communicated in forms and terms of kindness. Men there are, whom to serve, is in itself pleasurable, from the consideration for the feelings of others which accompanies their demands for service.—Bentham.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Thanks to the Freeman's Journal (Dublin) and our cordial friend Mr D. who sent it us. Also to Mr L. who wrote to us on Windown, and sent us the magazines. And to the other Mr L. who forwarded the book on the Metropolis. The approbation of these gentlemen has highly gratified us.

The letter on "Swearing" in our next.

In reply to our Correspondent's answer, we asked the age of the writer on "Gallantry," because, if young, (as we find he is,) there is promise in his writing, though it is hardly yet ripe enough for publication. The same observation applies to our modest friend TESTATOR.

Mr Lewis is informed that the whole of Mr Shelley's poetical works are to be had (together with those of Coleridge and Keats) in one large volume, octavo, published in Paris by Galignani. We believe also that a London edition, in small volumes, has lately been completed.

The "Musings on a Stone" shall be carefully read, and the answer given next week.

A FLOWER FOR YOUR WINDOW.

NAMES OF FLOWERS. MYSTERY OF THEIR BEAUTY.

IN the window beside which we are writing this article, there is a geranium shining with its scarlet tops in the sun, the red of it being the more red for a back-ground of lime-trees, which are at the same time breathing and panting like airy plenitudes of joy, and developing their shifting depths of light and shade, of russet brown and sunny inward gold.

It seems to say "Paint me!" So here it is.

Every now and then some anxious fly comes near it:—we hear the sound of a bee, though we see none; and upon looking closer at the flowers, we observe that some of the petals are transparent with the light, while others are left in shade; the leaves are equally adorned after their opaquer fashion, with those effects of the sky, showing their dark-brown rims; and on one of them a red petal has fallen, where it lies on the brighter half of the shallow green cup, making its own red redder, and the green greener. We perceive, in imagination, the scent of those good-natured leaves, which allow you to carry off their perfume on your fingers: for good-natured they are, in that respect, above almost all plants, and fittest for the hospitalities of your rooms. The very feel of the leaf has a household warmth in it, something analogous to clothing and comfort.

Why does not every body (who can afford it) have a geranium in his window, or some other flower? It is very cheap; its cheapness is next to nothing if you raise it from seed, or from a slip; and it is a beauty and a companion. It sweetens the air, rejoices the eye, links you with nature and innocence, and is something to love. And if it cannot love you in return, it cannot hate you; it cannot utter a hateful thing, even for your neglecting it; for though it is all beauty, it has no vanity: and such being the case, and living as it does purely to do you good and afford you pleasure, how will you be able to neglect it?

But pray, if you chuse a geranium, or possess but a few of them, let us persuade you to chuse the scarlet kind, the "old original" geranium, and not a variety of it,—not one of the numerous diversities of red and white, blue and white, ivy-leaved, &c. Those are all beautiful, and very fit to vary a large collection; but to prefer them to the originals of the race, is to run the hazard of preferring the curious to the beautiful, and costliness to sound taste. It may be taken as a good general rule, that the most popular plants are the best; for otherwise they would not have become such. And what the painters call "pure colours," are preferable to mixed ones, for reasons which Nature herself has given when she painted the sky of one colour, and the fields of another, and divided the rainbow itself into a few distinct hues, and made the red rose the queen of flowers. Variations of flowers are like variations in music, often beautiful as such, but almost always inferior to the theme on which they are founded,—the original air. And the rule holds good in beds of flowers, if they be not very large, or in any other small assemblage of them. Nay, the largest bed will look well, if of one beautiful colour; while the most beautiful varieties may be inharmoniously mixed up. Contrast is a good thing, but we should first get a good sense of the thing to be contrasted, and we shall find this preferable to the contrast, if we are not rich enough to have both in due measure. We do not, in general, love and honour any one single colour enough, and we are instinctively struck with a conviction to this effect, when we see it abundantly set forth. The other day we saw a little garden-wall completely covered with nasturtiums, and felt how much more beautiful it was than if any thing had been mixed with it. For the leaves, and the light and shade, offer variety enough. The rest is all richness and simplicity united,—which is the triumph of an intense perception. Embower a cottage thickly and completely with nothing but roses, and nobody would desire the interference of another plant.

Everything is handsome about the geranium, not excepting its name; which cannot be said of all flowers, though we get to love ugly words when associated with pleasing ideas. The word "geranium" is soft and elegant; the meaning is poor, for it comes from a Greek word signifying a crane, the fruit having a form resembling that of a crane's head or bill. Crane's-bill is the English name of Geranium; though the learned appellation has superseded the vernacular. But what a reason for naming the flower! as if the fruit were anything in comparison, or any one cared about it. Such distinctions, it is true, are useful to botanists; but as plenty of learned names are sure to be reserved for the free-masonry of the science, it would be better for the world at large to invent joyous and beautiful names for these images of joy and beauty. In some instances, we have them; such as heart's-ease, honey-suckle, marygold, mignonette ("little darling"), daisy (day's-eye), &c. And many flowers are so lovely, and have associated names otherwise unmeaning so pleasantly with one's memory, that no new ones would sound so well, or seem even to have such proper significations. In pronouncing the words, lilies, roses, pinks, tulips, jonquils, we see the things themselves, and seem to taste all their beauty and sweetness. "Pink" is a harsh, petty word in itself, and yet assuredly it does not seem so; for in the word we have the flower. It would be difficult to persuade ourselves that the word rose is not very beautiful. "Pea" is a poor, Chinese-like monosyllable; and "Briar" is rough and fierce, as it ought to be; but when we think of Sweet-Pea and Sweet-Briar, the words appear quite worthy of their epithets. The poor monosyllable becomes rich in sweetness and appropriation; the rough dissyllable also; and the sweeter for its contrast. But what can be said in behalf of liver-wort, blood-wort, dragon's head, devil's bit, and devil in a bush? There was a charming line in some verses in our last week's journal, written by a lady.

I've marr'd your blisses,
Those sweete kisses
That the young breeze so loved yesterdaye!
I've seen ye sighing,
Now ye're dying;—
How could I take your prettie lives away?

But you could not say this to dragon's head and devil's bit—

O dragon's head, devil's bit, blood-wort,—say,
How could I take your pretty lives away?

This would be like Dryden's version of the pig-squeaking in Chaucer—

Poor swine! as if their pretty hearts would break.
The names of flowers in general, among the polite, are neither pretty in themselves, nor give us information. The country people are apt to do them more justice. Goldy-locks, ladies'-fingers, bright-eye, rose-a-rubie, shepherd's-clock, shepherd's-purse, saucy-alone, scarlet runners, sops-in-wine, sweet-william, &c. give us some ideas either useful or pleasant. But from the peasantry also come many uncongenial names, as bad as those of the botanists. Some of the latter are handsome as well as learned, have meanings easily found out by a little reading or scholarship, and are taking their place accordingly in popular nomenclatures: as amaranth, adonis, arbutus, asphodel, &c., but many others are as ugly as they are far-fetched, such as colchicum, tagetes, yucca, ixia, mēsembryanthemum; and as to the Adansonia, Browallia, Koempferia, John Tomkinsia, or whatever the personal names may be that are bestowed at the botanical font by their proud discoverers or god-fathers, we have a respect for botanists and their pursuits, and wish them all sorts of little immortalities except these: unless they could unite them with something illustrative of the flower as well as themselves. A few, certainly, we should not like to displace, Browallia for one, which was given to a Peruvian flower by Linnæus, in honour of a friend of his of the name of Browall; but the name should have included some idea of the thing named. The Browallia is remarkable for its brilliancy. "We cannot," says Mr Curtis, "do it justice by any colours we have." Now why not have called it Browall's Beauty? or Browall's Inimitable? The other day we were admiring an enormously beautiful apple, and were told it was called "Kirk's Admirable," after the gardener who raised it. We felt the propriety of this name directly. It was altogether to the purpose. There was use and beauty together,—the name of the raiser, and the excellence of the fruit raised. It is a pity that all fruits and flowers, and animals too, except those with good names, could not be passed in review before somebody with a genius for christening, as the creatures did before Adam in Paradise, and so have new names given them, worthy of their creation.

Suppose flowers themselves were new! Suppose they had just come into the world, a sweet reward for some new goodness: and that we had not yet seen them quite developed; that they were in the act of growing; had just issued with their green stalks out of the ground, and engaged the attention of the curious. Imagine what we should feel when we saw the first lateral stem bearing off from the main one, or putting forth a leaf. How we should watch the leaf gradually unfolding its little graceful hand; then another, then another; then the main stalk rising and producing more; then one of them giving indications of an astonishing novelty, a bud! then this mysterious, lovely bud gradually unfolding like the leaf, amazing us, enchanting us, almost alarming us with delight, as if we knew not what enchantment were to ensue: till at length, in all its fairy beauty, and odorous voluptuousness, and mysterious elaboration of tender and living sculpture, shone forth — "the bright consummate flower!"

Yet this phenomenon, to a mind of any thought and lovingness, is what may be said to take place every day; for the commonest objects are only wonders at which habit has made us cease to wonder, and the marvellousness of which we may know at pleasure by taking thought. Last spring, walking near some cultivated grounds, and seeing a multitude of green stalks peeping forth, we amused ourselves with likening them to thaplumes or other head-gear of fairies, and wondering what faces might ensue; and from this exercise of the fancy, we fell to considering how true, and not merely fanciful, those speculations were; what a perpetual reproduction of the marvellous was carried on by Nature; how utterly ignorant we were of the causes of the least and most disesteemed of the commonest vegetables; and what a quantity of life, and beauty, and mystery, and use, and enjoyment, was to be found in them, composed out of all sorts of elements, and shaped as if by the hands of fairies. What workmanship, with no apparent workman! What consummate elegance, though the result was to be nothing (as we call it) but a radish or an onion, and these were to be consumed or thrown away by millions! A rough tree grows up, and at the tips of his rugged and dark fingers he puts forth,—round, smooth, shining, and hanging delicately,—the golden apple, or the cheek-like beauty of the peach. The other day we were in a garden, where Indian corn was growing, and some of the cobs were plucked to show us. First one leaf or sheath was picked off, then another, then another, then a fourth, and so on, as if a fruit-seller was unpacking fruit out of papers; and at last we came, inside, to the grains of the corn, packed up into cucumber-shapes of pale gold, and each of them pressed and flattened against each other, as if some human hand had been doing it in the caverns of the earth. BUT WHAT HAND!

The same that made the poor yet rich hand (for is it not his workmanship also?) that is tracing these marvellous lines, and which if it does not tremble to say so, it is because Love sustains, and because the heart also is a flower which has a right to be tranquil in the garden of the All-Wise.

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 17th, to Tuesday the 23rd
September.

A GARDEN-ELYSIUM.

We have been looking through Rousseau's Eloisa again, (for we never could thoroughly read it), and have unfortunately had the impression confirmed, that was made upon us in our youth. We say "unfortunately," in a socio-literary sense, (and in that only, for in any other sense, social or otherwise, we are not aware of having reason to regret it); but it seems a misfortune to be unable to like a celebrated book,—one that is approved by so many people; and we cannot but think the work a marvellous failure in its greatest pretension,—the love. Some love there certainly is, and eloquently it is set forth; but there appears to us to be a great deal more will, and outcry, and pedantry,—even making allowance for French gesticulation. St Preux is by far the more genuine lover of the two, and he is of a scene-making temper. As to Julia, the "new Heloise," we cannot help thinking her quite unworthy of her namesake. There is quite as much lecturing as loving in her correspondence, and the two things are incompatible. She absolutely "huffs" the poor man at every turn in his behaviour, or way of thinking, that does not quite satisfy her. To be sure this "huffing" is Rousseau's; he puts it in her mouth; and to him also is attributable the temper and suspiciousness of St Preux; but this only shews how unfit he was to write a love-story. In short, this book, and a reperusal of two volumes of the Confessions, have convinced us that Rousseau, admirable writer as he was, and of the greatest service to the world (in shaking up their thoughts for them, and inciting them to recur to first principles) was all his life a victim to bad temper, and made others victims with him. This, we have no doubt, was the secret of much which he has left unexplained, and the real reason of his estrangements with lovers and friends, from first to last. Latterly indeed he confesses it; and his friends became too well aware of the extravagances to which his morbid self-seeking drove him. Never however is it to be forgotten, that although he could not make love as well as he fancied, he struck notes of other truths and universalities into the hearts of mankind never to be forgotten, and that the misgiving egotist, who justified the alienation of those that loved him by condemning himself before-hand in his own complaints and exactions, was also the bold philosopher who interrogated half the existing opinions of mankind, and found them tremble before him.

We select from a translation of the "New Eloisa" a passage, worth the attention of the lovers of gardening, and such as will afford our readers another snug scene of sylvan enjoyment, fit for the month, and exhibiting the charming combination of the two ideas of home and remoteness. Rousseau is truly at home here,—with Nature, to whom he was nothing, and therefore whom he could not plague or be plagued by. If the trees could have spoken to him, he would have quarrelled with them. Something which they said, or did not say, would have been found unsatisfactory. Why did he not discover that there are hearts which could have been equally tranquil with him, if he could have been content to think of their kindness, instead of his own misgivings?

After having admired the good consequences attending the vigilance and attention of the prudent Eloisa in the conduct of her family, I was witness of the good effects of the recreation she uses in a retired place, where she takes her favourite walk, and which she calls her Elysium.

I had often heard them talk of this Elysium of which they made a mystery before me. Yesterday, however, the excessive heat being almost equally intolerable both within doors and without, M. Wolmar proposed to his wife to make holiday that afternoon, and instead of going into the nursery towards evening, as usual, to come and breathe the fresh air with us in the orchard: she consented, and thither we went.

—This place, though just close to the house, is hidden in such a manner by a shady walk, that it is not visible from any point. The thick foliage with which it is environed renders it impervious to the eye, and it is always carefully looked up. I was scarce got within side, but the door, being covered with alder and hazel-trees, I could not find out which way I came in, when I turned back, and seeing no door, it seemed as if I had dropped from the clouds.

On my entrance into this disguised orchard, I was seized with an agreeable sensation; the freshness of the thick foliage, the beautiful and lovely verdure, the flowers scattered on each side, the murmuring of the purling stream, and the warbling of a thousand birds, struck my imagination as powerfully as my senses; but at the same time I thought myself in the most wild and solitary place in nature, and I appeared as if I had been the first person who had ever penetrated into this wild and desert spot. Being seized with astonishment and transported at so unexpected a sight, I remained motionless for some time, and cried out, in an involuntary fit of enthusiasm, "O Tinian! O Juan Fernandez! Eloisa, the world's end is at your threshold!"—"Many people (said she, with a smile,) think in the same manner; but twenty paces at most presently bring them back to Clarendon; let us see whether the charm will work longer with you. This is the same orchard where you have walked formerly, and where you have played at romps with my cousin. You may remember that the grass was almost burned up, the trees very thinly planted, affording very little shade, and that there was no water. You find that it is now fresh, verdant, cultivated, embellished with flowers, and well watered; what do you imagine it may have cost me to put it into the condition you see? For you must know that I am the superintendent, and that my husband leaves the intire management of it to me."—"In truth (said I), it has cost you nothing but inattention. It is indeed a delightful spot; but wild and rustic, and I can discover no marks of human industry. You have concealed the door; the water springs I know not whence; nature alone has done all the rest, and even you could not have mended her work."—"It is true (said she) that nature has done everything; but under my direction, and you see nothing but what has been done under my orders. Guess once more."—"First (I replied) I cannot conceive how labour and expense can be made to supply the effects of time. The trees —" "As to them, (said M. Wolmar,) you may observe that there are none very large, and they were here before. Besides, Eloisa began this work a long while before her marriage, and presently after her mother's death, when she used to come here with her father in quest of solitude."—"Well (said I), since you will have these large and massy bowers, these sloping tufts, these umbrageous thickets to be the growth of seven or eight years, and to be partly the work of art, I think you have been a good economist, if you have done all within this vast circumfer-ence for two thousand crowns."—"You have only guessed two thousand crowns too much (says she), for it cost me nothing."—"How! nothing!"—"No, nothing; unless you place a dozen days work in the year to my gardener's account, as many to two or three of my people, and some to M. Wolmar, who has sometimes condescended to officiate in my service as a gardener." I could not comprehend this riddle; but Eloisa, who had hitherto held me, laid to me (letting me loose) "Go and you will understand it. Farewell Tinian! Farewell Juan Fernandez! Farewell all enchantment! In a few minutes you will find your way back from the end of the world."

I began to wander over the orchard thus metamorphosed with a kind of ecstasy; and if I found no exotic plants nor any of the produce of the Indies, I found all those which were natural to the soil disposed and blended in such a manner as to produce the most cheerful and lovely effects. The verdant turf, thick, but short and close, was intermixed with wild thyme, balm, sweet marjoram, and other fragrant herbs. You might perceive a thousand wild flowers dazzle your eyes, among which you would be surprised to discover some garden flowers, which seemed to grow natural with the rest. I now and then met with shady tufts, as impervious to the rays of the sun, as if they had been in a thick forest. These tufts were composed of trees of a very flexible nature, the branches of which they bend till they hang on the ground and take root, as I have seen some trees naturally do in America. In the more open spots, I saw bushes of roses, raspberries, and gooseberries: little plantations of lilac, hazel-trees, alders, syringes, broom, and trefol, dispersed without any order or symmetry, and which embellished the ground, at the same time that it gave to it the appearance of being overgrown with weeds. I followed the track through irregular and serpentine walks, bordered by these flowery thickets, and covered with a thousand garlands composed of vines, hops, rose-weed, snake-weed, and other plants of that kind, with honeysuckles and jessamine, designed to intertwine. These garlands seemed as if they were carelessly scattered from one tree to another, and formed a kind of drapery over our heads which sheltered us from the sun; while under foot we had smooth, agreeable, and dry walking upon a fine moss, without sand, or grass, or any rugged shoots. Then it was I first discovered, not without astonishment, that this verdant and bushy umbrage, which had deceived me so much at a distance, was composed of these luxuriant and creeping plants, which running all along the trees, formed a thick foliage over head, and afforded shade and freshness under foot. I observed likewise, that by means of common industry, they made several of these plants take root in the trunks of the trees, so that they spread more being nearer the top. You will readily conceive that the fruit is not the better for these additions; but this is the only spot where they sacrificed the useful to the agreeable, and, in the rest of their grounds, they have taken such care of the trees, that, without the orchard, the return of fruit is greater than it was formerly. If you do but consider how delightful it is to meet with wild fruit in the midst of a wood, and to refresh one's-self with it, you will easily conceive what a pleasure it must be to meet with excellent and ripe fruit in this artificial desert, though it grows but here and there, and has not the best appearance; which gives one the pleasure of searching and selecting the best.

All these little walks were bordered and crossed by a clear and limpid rivulet, which one while wound through the grass and flowers in streams scarce perceptible; at another, rushed in more copious floods upon a clear and speckled gravel, which rendered the water more transparent. You might perceive the springs rise and bubble out of the earth, and sometimes you might observe deep canals, in which the calm and gentle fluid served as a mirror to reflect the objects around. "How! (said I to Eloisa) I comprehend all the rest, but these waters which I see on every side."—"They come from thence (she replied, pointing to that side where the terrace lies). It is the same stream, which, at a vast expense, supplies the fountain in the flower garden, for which nobody cares. M. Wolmar will not destroy it, out of respect to my father who had it made; but with what pleasure we come here every day to see the water run through the orchard, which we never looked at in the garden! The fountain plays for the entertainment of strangers; this little rivulet flows for our amusement. It is true, that I have likewise brought hither the water from the public fountain, which emptied itself into the lake, through the highway, to the detriment of passengers, besides its running to waste, without profit to any one. It formed an elbow at the foot of the orchard, between two rows of willows; I have taken them into my inclosure, and bring the same water hither through different channels."

I perceived then that all the contrivance consisted in managing these streams, so as to make them flow in meanders, by separating and uniting them at proper places, by making them run as little upon the slopes as possible, in order to lengthen their course, and make the most of a few little murmuring cascades. A layer of earth, covered with some gravel from the lake, and strewn over with shells, forms a bed of these waters. The same streams, running at proper distances under some large tiles covered with earth and turf, on a level with the ground, form a kind of artificial spring, where they issue forth. Some small streams spout through pipes on some rugged places and bubble as they fall. The ground, thus refreshed and watered, continually yields fresh flowers, and keeps the grass always verdant and beautiful.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

One of the sources upon which we have drawn for our Romance of Real Life,—the "Lounger's Common-Place Book," begins to pump a little drily (though not in the instance before us); but we are much mistaken, if we have any reason to dread the failure of resources, intimated by a correspondent who writes in the present number. In fact, we look confidently not only to old stores of our own, but to new ones in all quarters, among which we shall be happy to reckon those which he is good enough to promise us.

XXXVI.—HISTORY OF ARNOLD DU TILB.

ARNOLD DU TILB, a native of Sagias, a village near the city of Rieux, in the Upper Languedoc, who, towards the middle of the sixteenth century, was the object of a criminal prosecution, extraordinary in its nature, perplexing and difficult to decide.

At Artigues, a country hamlet, only a few miles from the place of Du Tilb's residence, lived a little farmer, whose name was Martin Guerre, married to a modest handsome young woman born in that neighbourhood, but himself of the Spanish province of Biscay; they had a son; and, for their situation in life, possessed tolerable property.

Ten years after their marriage, in consequence of a dispute with his father-in-law, Martin suddenly quitted his family, and, charmed with the licentious freedom of a roving life, or cooled in his affection towards his wife, although she had conducted herself with exemplary propriety, had not been seen or heard of for eight years.

It was during this long absence (to lovers as well as husbands a dangerous interval), it was at this time that Arnold du Tilb, the subject of our present article, who had formerly seen and admired the wife of Martin Guerre, meditated a most perfidious and cruel stratagem.

In age and appearance he greatly resembled the absent man; like him, too, Du Tilb having for many years quitted his country, was generally considered as dead; and having made himself acquainted with all the circumstances, connexions, and general habits of Guerre, as well by collateral inquiries, as by actual association with him during two campaigns as a private soldier, he boldly presented himself to the wife and family as her long lost husband.

The risk he incurred and the difficulties he encountered were considerable: a thousand little circumstances which it is easy to imagine, but unnecessary to describe, must daily and hourly have led him to the brink of destruction; indeed, it is not easy to conceive how he could succeed, unless the unhappy dupe of his delusion had been herself a promoter of the deceit, which does not appear to have been the case.

The stranger, at once, and without hesitation, was received with transports of joy by the wife and all the family, which at that time consisted of four of her husband's sisters and an uncle: one of them remarking that his clothes were somewhat out of repair, he replied, "yes," and in a careless and apparently unpremeditated way, desired that a pair of taffety breeches might be brought him. His wife, not immediately recollecting where she had put them, he added, "I am not surprised you have forgot, for I have not worn them since the christening of my son; they are in a draw at the bottom of the large chest in the next room; in this place they were found and immediately brought to him.

The supposed Martin's return was welcomed by the neighbours in the old French way with song and dance; and he enjoyed the privileges and pleasures, he shared the emoluments and cares of a husband, and a few days after his arrival, repaired to Rieux to transact some necessary law business, which had been deferred in consequence of his absence; the fond couple lived apparently happy for three years, in which time two children were added to their family.

But their tranquillity was gradually interrupted by the uncle, whose suspicions of imposture were first excited by a traveller passing through the village; this person hearing the name of Martin Guerre accidentally mentioned, declared, that eighteen months before he had seen and conversed with an invalid of that name in a distant province of France, who informed him that he had a wife and children in Languedoc, but that it was not his design to return during the life of his uncle.

The stranger being sent for, and privately questioned, repeated in a clear and consistent manner what he had before communicated, confirmed the apprehensions of the uncle that the real Martin Guerre was still absent, and added, that since quitting his wife, he had lost one of his legs in the battle of St Quintin.

The family, alarmed by this account, now saw, or thought they saw, many little circumstances, which had before escaped their notice, but all tending to prove that the man with whom Mrs Guerre cohabited, and by whom she had had two children, was not in fact her lawful husband.

But they found it extremely difficult to convince the deluded female of her mistake; and she loudly, and with tears insisted that her present domestic companion was her first love, her real and original husband; it was not till after several months that the unhappy woman was at length prevailed on to prosecute the impostor.

He was taken into custody and imprisoned by the order of the criminal judge of Rieux, and a time fixed for examining the evidence, and hearing what Du Tilb had to offer in his defence.

On the day appointed, the offender was brought into court, followed by a number of people whose curiosity was naturally excited; the deposition of the traveller, concerning the absent Martin Guerre, was first read; the uncle, the sisters, and many of the inhabitants of Sagias, were next closely questioned on their oath; some declared that the prisoner was not Martin Guerre, others as positively insisted that he was the identical person, corroborating their testimony by many collateral circumstances; but the greater number averred without scruple that the resemblance between the two, if two there were, was so great, that it was not in their power to distinguish; the weight of evidence was thought by many to preponderate in favour of the prisoner.

The judge demanding of him what he had to say in his defence, he answered, without embarrassment, that the whole was a conspiracy of the uncle and a certain part of the family, who, taking advantage of the easy temper and weak understanding of his wife, had contrived the story in order to be rid of him, and to get possession of his property, which he valued at eight thousand livres.

The uncle, he observed, had for some time taken a dislike to him, had frequently assaulted him, and in one instance would have killed him by the stroke of an iron bar on his head, had he not fortunately parried the blow.

The remark of the prisoner on the weakness of his wife's understanding, served to diminish the surprise of the court at her being so easily duped, nor indeed could they blame any relation for endeavouring, in any manner they were able, to expel the violator of the wife and property of their kinsman.

Du Tilb then proceeded to inform the court of the reasons which first induced him to quit his house and family; related minutely where, how, and with whom he had passed his time; that he had served in the French army seven years, and on his regiment being disbanded, had entered into the Spanish service, from which, being impatient to see his wife, and sorely repenting that he had ever quitted her, at a considerable expense he procured his discharge, and made the best of his way to Artigues. At this place, notwithstanding his long absence and the loss of his hair, he was directly and universally recognized by his old acquaintance, and received with transports of joy by his wife and sisters, particularly by his uncle; although that unnatural and cruel relation had now thought proper to stir up the present prosecution against him.

The prisoner, in consequence of certain leading questions from the judge, gave a minute description of the situation and peculiar circumstances of the place in Biscay, where he said he was born (still insisting that he was Martin Guerre) mentioning the names, ages, and occupations of the relations he had left there, the year, the day, and the month of his marriage, also the persons who were present at the ceremony, as well as those who dined with them; which, on referring to collateral evidence, were found to tally.

On the other hand, forty-five reputable and credible witnesses, who were well acquainted with Martin Guerre and Arnold du Tilb, swore that the prisoner was not and could not be Martin; one of these, Carbon Barreau, maternal uncle of Du Tilb, acknowledged his nephew with tears, and, observing that he was fettered like a malefactor, bitterly lamented the disgrace it would bring upon his family.

These persons also insisted that Martin Guerre was tall, of a slender make, and as persons of that form frequently are, awkward and sloping in his gait; that he had a remarkable way of protruding and hanging down his under lip; that his nose was flat and that several scars were to be seen on his left eyebrow, and other parts of his face.

On the contrary, they observed that Du Tilb was a middle-sized, well-set man, upright, with thick legs, a well-formed nose, and without anything remarkable about his mouth or lips; they agreed that his countenance exhibited the same scars as that of Martin.

The shoemaker, who had for many years furnished Guerre with shoes, being called, deposed, that his foot reached the twelfth size, but that the prisoner's was rather short of the ninth; it further appeared that he formerly had, from his early youth, been dexterous at cudgeling and wrestling, of which the impostor was wholly ignorant.

As a strong circumstance against the person accused, it was added that his manner of speaking, and the sort of language he used, though at times artfully interlarded with patois and unintelligible gibberish, was very different from that which used to be spoken by the real Martin Guerre, who, being a Biscayan, spoke not wholly Spanish, wholly French, nor wholly Gascon, but a curious mixture of each; a sort of language called the Basque.

Lastly, and what seemed to make an impression on the court, the prosecutors referred to the internal evidences of the offender's character, which, they proved, had been from his childhood vicious and incorrigible in the extreme: they produced satisfactory proofs of his being hardened in all manner of wickedness and uncleanness; a common swearer and blasphemer, a notorious profligate, every way capable of the crime laid to his charge.

The accusation lay heavy upon the prisoner, a pause ensued for deliberation, and the court, fatigued by a long and patient examination of a host of witnesses, took refreshment; the town-house being still crowded by persons impatient to give their testimony in behalf of the prisoner, whom they considered and pitied as an injured man.

The first parties next examined astonished the judge and staggered the whole court. They were the four sisters of Martin Guerre, all reputed to be women of sound understanding, and of character unblemished; they positively swore that the man in custody was "their dear brother Martin." Two of their husbands, and thirty-five persons born or brought up in the neighbourhood corroborated their assertions; among others, Catherine Boere, who carried Martin and his wife the medianoch, or, as an Englishman would call it, the sack-posset, after they were put to bed on their wedding-night, declared, as she hoped for everlasting salvation, that the prisoner, and the man she saw in bed with the bride, were the same person.

The majority of these last witnesses also deposed, that Martin Guerre had two scars in his face, and that the nail of his forefinger, on the left hand, in consequence of a wound received in his childhood, grew across the top of his finger; that he had three warts on the back of his right hand towards the knuckles, and another on his little finger; the judge ordered the culprit to stretch forth both his hands, which were found to agree with this description.

It further appeared that, on his first arrival at Artigues, the prisoner addressed most of the inhabitants by name, and recalled to the memory of those who had forgotten him, several circumstances with respect to the village, on the subject of births, marriages, and deaths, which had happened ten, fifteen, and twenty years before; he also spoke to his wife (as he still insisted she was) of certain circumstances of a very peculiar nature.

He who could give an assumed character so strong a resemblance to reality, and so dextrously clothe falsehood in the robes of truth, was no common impostor; like other great villains, he must have been a man of abilities.

To add to the perplexities of this business, the wife being called, her pretended husband solemnly addressed and called on her, as she valued peace of mind here, and everlasting happiness hereafter, to speak truth without fear or affection, that he would submit to instant death without repining if she would swear that he was not her real husband; the woman replied that she would by no means take an oath on the occasion, at the same time, she would not give credit to anything he could say.

The evidence on both sides being closed, and the defence of the prisoner having been heard, the judge pronounced Arnold du Tilb guilty, and sentenced him to suffer death; but the culprit appealed to the parliament of Toulouse, who not long after ordered a copy of the proceedings, and the convict, to be forthwith transmitted to them.

The parliament, at that period a court of justice as well as registry of royal edicts, wisely determined to take no decisive step in the business till they had endeavoured to get sight of and secure the man with a wooden leg, as described by the traveller; the uncle strenuously insisting that he and no other was his long-lost nephew.

A commission was called to examine the papers and call for new evidence, if necessary; descriptions of the person and circumstances of Martin Guerre, the absent husband, were also circulated throughout the kingdom. At length, after several months had elapsed and considerable pains had been taken, the absentee was fortunately discovered in a distant province, conveyed to Toulouse, and ordered into close custody, with particular directions that he should have no intercourse with any person whatever, even at his meals, but in the presence of one of the commissioners, who ordered an additional lock to the door of the room in which he was confined, and themselves kept the key.

A day was fixed for a solemn and final re-hearing, and a list of such witnesses as would be required to appear before the parliament, was in the meantime sent to Rieux for the purpose of preventing the trouble and expense of conveying to Toulouse, so large a number of persons who had crowded the court and streets of Rieux.

The parliament assembled at an early hour; the former proceedings were read; the prisoner still persisted in asserting his innocence, and complained of the hardship and injuries he had suffered.

The real Martin Guerre now walked into court on his wooden leg, and Du Tilb being asked if he knew him, undauntedly answered, "No." The injured husband reproaching the impostor for the perfidiousness of his conduct, in basely taking advantage of the frankness of an old companion, and depriving him of his wife and property, Du Tilb retorted the charge on his accuser.

The present was thought a curious instance of audacity contrasted with simplicity of heart and unassuming manner; an impudent and flagitious adventurer who had for several years enjoyed the wife and property of another, and, in the face of his country, endeavouring to persuade the injured man out of his name and personal identity: it was further observed that the gesture, deportment, air, and mode of speaking of the prisoner were cool, consistent, and steady; while those who appeared in the cause of truth were embarrassed, hesitating, confused, and on certain points contradictory in their evidence.

The wife, the four sisters, and the uncle had not yet seen the real Martin Guerre; they were now called in court; the first who entered was the eldest sister, who, the moment she caught sight of the man with a wooden leg, ran and embraced him, exclaiming with tears, "Oh, my dear brother, I now see and acknowledge the error and misfortune into which this abominable traitor hath betrayed us."

The rest of the family, as they approached, confessed in a similar way how much they had been deceived; and the long-lost Martin, mingling his tears with theirs, received their embraces, and heard their penitential apologies with every appearance of tenderness and affection.

But, towards his wife he deported himself very differently: she had not yet ventured to come near him, but stood at the entrance of the court trembling and dismayed; one of the sisters, taking her arm, conducted her to Martin, but he viewed her with sternness and aversion, and, in reply to the excuses and advances she made, and the intercession of his sisters in her behalf, "That she was herself innocent, but seduced by the arts of a villain," he observed, "Her tears and her sorrow are useless; I shall never love her again; it is in vain that you attempt to justify her, from the circumstance of so many others having been deceived,—a wife has always ways of knowing a husband unknown to all the world; in such a case as this, it is impossible that a woman can have been imposed on, if she had not entertained a secret wish to be unfaithful. I shall for ever regard her as the cause of all my misfortunes, and impute solely to her the whole of my wretchedness and disgrace."

The judge, reminding the angry husband that, if he had remained at home, nothing of what had happened could have ever taken place, recommended lenity and forgiveness.

Du Tilb was pronounced guilty of fraud, adultery, sacrilege, rape, and theft, and condemned to make the amende honorable in the market-place of Artigues, in his shirt, with his head and feet bare, a halter round his neck, and a lighted torch in his hand; to demand pardon of God, the king, the nation, and the family whom he had so cruelly deceived; it was further ordered that he should be hanged before the dwelling-house of Martin Guerre, and that his body should be burned to ashes; his effects were adjudged to be the property of the children begotten by him on Martin's wife.

The criminal was taken back to Artigues, and as the day of execution approached, was observed to lose his firmness; after a long interview with the turé, he at last confessed his crime, acknowledging that he was first tempted to commit it by being frequently mistaken for and addressed by the name of Martin Guerre; he denied having made use of charms or of magic, as many suspected, very properly observing, that the same supernatural act which could enable him to carry on his deception, would also have put it in his power to escape punishment.

He was executed according to his sentence, first addressing a few words to Martin Guerre's wife, and died offering up prayers to the Almighty to pardon his sins, through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ.

This singular narrative is authenticated by the respectable evidence of Gayot de Pitaval, and related in good Latin by the worthy De Thou.

ADMIRABLE REMARKS ON ADVICE-GIVING.

From Mr Bentham's "Deontology."

There is a class of people in the world, offensive intruders, forward hypocrites, and bold usurpers, who, under the mask of friendly advisers, are great creators of misery.

Not that, on every occasion, the counsels of the adviser, even though injudicious, can be taken as evidence of an unfriendly purpose. For foolish though it be, hastily concocted and inconsiderately communicated, it may have had its source in sympathy, and be really a mark of good will.

But such cases are exceptions. Selfishness untouched by sympathy is ordinarily the inspirer of the intrusive counsellor. Pure selfishness is abundantly sufficient for the production of the character. And without good grounds for believing that credit is to be given to benevolence, it may, with great probability, be presumed, that some quality, far removed from benevolence, gave birth to the intervention.

It is clearly then demanded by morality, that advice-giving, as a habit, should be abstained from; and if the demand for it be obvious and undoubted, if the case be clear and urgent—that it should be accompanied with such statements and reasons as will, in so far as may be, plead its excuse and justification to the person advised, and cause to him as little suffering as may be necessary to give the advice its intended effect. Without strong evidence both of the necessity for its application, and the probability of its success, virtue requires the suppression of the advice, and the abstention of the adviser.

Revenge itself sometimes takes the shape of advice-giving. For a gratification of ill-will a man censures another in the shape of counsel. He visits another with the burthen of evil, for obtaining a small pleasure in the infliction of that evil. In so far as the inflictor is concerned, no doubt the infliction of evil is good, for no action can have its source in any other motive. However enormous the evil may be, and however trifling the pleasure of inflicting it, still the pleasure is good, and must be taken into account. But the law of effective benevolence requires that the advice you give to a man, or the evil-speaking of him, necessary to do him good, should lead to no waste of evil. Only in the absolute necessity of drawing on him punishment from the popular source, or sanction, are you authorized to speak evil of him to others; and then be sure there is reason to believe that the awarded punishment will bring a result of good.

[The great secret perhaps of giving advice successfully, is to mix up with it something that implies a real consciousness of the adviser's own defects, and as much as possible of an acknowledgment of the other party's merits.—Ed.]

A NOBLE DREAM OF COOKERY.

SHewing HOW IRON ITSELF GROWS HOT, AND KITCHEN UTENSILS INDIGNANT, AT SEEING A WOMAN ILL-TREATED.

[The following whimsical jeu d'esprit is taken from a little German periodical, in prose and verse, and in a variety of languages, entitled Chaos, which was (or is) 'got up,' if we are not mistaken, under the superintendence of Goethe's daughter-in-law, and appears to receive any contributions, from respectable quarters, in a very indulgent spirit. We know not who the author is, perhaps some accomplished German who writes English, perhaps some English resident, unaccustomed to speak his own language exclusively; for there are marks of stiffness and obscurity in the versification, as well as a no-rhyme here and there. But it is very pleasant. We have been obliged to modify an adjuration which would have been a little too strong for the general ear in England.]

I read in Mrs Glass's page

The neatest way to roast a goose,
Basted with lard and stuffed with sage,
With apple sauce and lemon juice:

I slumbered; does it wondrous seem,
That as I snored, I had a dream?

I dreamt a form of heated air

Stood by a blazing sea coal fire,
His cheeks were red, his arms were bare,
And wofully he did perspire;
Beef on the spit was smoking hot,
And turtle soup was in the pot.

A red hot poker in his hand,

Looked like a warrior's blood-stained lance;
Around him, hung an iron band,
Of gridirons, pots and frying pans;
And by his watery bloodshot eye
I guessed a cook, and well guessed I.

Beside him, like in blazing face,
There stood another female ghost,
With stockings black, and russet dress,
She watched with anxious eye the roast;
The beef seemed her especial care,
She was fat and forty, but not fair.

A murmur then, confused and low,
From out the sable pot I heard,
The turtle soup did bubble slow,
And the green fat seemed oddly stirred;
The force meat rose and sunk again,
As whales play wanton in the main.

The fiery shadow calm surveyed
The bubbling of the precious soup,
He told his friend the kitchen-maid
To lift the pot, and take it up;
But the soup (which had some time boiled)
Now bubbled over, and was spoiled.

And then he spoke. "Now, fire and blood!
Could not you see the soup was done?"
The cook was in an angry mood,
And gave her a blow that knocked her down;
But little he suspected what
The consequence was of his being so hot.

A clang burst from the iron crowd,
Fiery the gridiron hissed, and red
With chivalrous indignation glowed,
And threw the shovel at his head;
Burning with rage, it asked to know,
How he could treat a woman so?

And suddenly, with might and main,
Fish, patties, beef, and fricandeaux,
Grew animate, and did hotly rain
A torrent of their boiling blows
Upon the cook's devoted head,
Till the poor devil was nearly dead.

And knives and forks and ladles round
The unhappy victim madly ran;
The table on his head did bound,
As swift as kitchen table can;
The crust flew at him, and o'er
Him pour'd an oil and vinegar shower.

The roasting fire blushed rosy red,
The grate ope'd wide its blazing jaws,
One monstrous ember boldly led
The coals in the kitchen-wench's cause;
But as descends the fury shower
I started, and—my dream was o'er!

SOLOMON.

LADIES OF THE LAKE, NOT FABULOUS.

[The author of the following elegant Sonnet says, in his letter to us, that it is descriptive of Mr Southey's "mode of relaxation from his literary labours." So at least he says he has "read;" for he has "never had the happiness of seeing it."

We thank our correspondent for the other sonnets he has sent us, which will be gladly inserted, with the exception of one; and we only make that exception because it contains a mixture of politics, such as might produce a retrospective bitterness of criticism from quarters which would have an equal right to express their feelings. And this, we are sure, is what he desires as little as we do.]

Who pull the skiff along the glassy lake?
Two fairest creatures are they—fairer ne'er
To the rapt eye of Poet did appear,
His deep thirst of the beautiful to slake.
Oh, let my heart susceptible awake
To their budding beauty—and be cleft in twain,
As the deep bosom of the lonely main
Some beauteous bird in its embrace to take:
A Poet's Daughters, shewing in their May
How the sire's virtues in the woman shine,
The household virtues, meek as day's decline,
In feminine sweetness fading soft away.
Oh, be the virtues of the father mine;
Mine, Daughters beautiful and good as thine.

OUR READERS WHISKED TO THE CONTINENT,

["Reminiscences of the Rhine, Switzerland, and a Corner of Italy."—Notice concluded.]

A Shrine by the Way-Side.—Strolled out while tea was preparing, and followed a crowd of people, who, as well as we could understand, were returning from a sermon. A very plain congregation, but all bowing and smiling, and looking good humoured. Turned up a narrow path-way, and fell in love with a large single tree, spreading itself out upon the gay horizon, and shading a wooden cross that had the moss of many winters on it. I am fond of these rude memorials, when time has mellowed down their every-day features, and given them a touch of rustic dignity. A solitary tree throwing out its bold ramifications on the calm bosom of the heavens, is one of the grandest and most beautiful objects in nature. And when it shades a wooden cross, a holy well, or a rude altar overhung with wild weeds, it is to me like a chapter in the New Testament; and I feel that I would not willingly part with one of these simple memorials of pious feeling, even with all that wise ones call its sins of superstition upon it, for much finer things. I love the way-side shrine; and when I see the tired female lay down her load and kneel before it, with the absorbed expression of one who seeks a surer friend than the false ones of this world, I always feel a touch of kindly sympathy,—piety so becomes a woman—it is her true staff and armour.*

True Picture and Fine Simile.—I once lived within view of a mill-stream that babbled cheerfully through pleasant fields while summer lasted; but when swollen by the winter rains, used to spread its waters over a wide valley, effacing everything but the dark boundaries. No combination of rock or ruin could produce such a cold, pale, desolate picture, as did those flooded fields when the moon shone on them; and yet it had beauty in it, but of a fearful melancholy cast, like a sweet voice singing of graves and death-beds.

A Drenching.—Passed the cross of the Furca in a pelting storm. A cross in the desert has more religion in it than the illuminated shrine of St. Peter's; it is the voice crying in the wilderness before the invention of dogmas. Itain more or less violent during seven long hours; in that time we passed through a succession of bold bleak valleys and roaring streams, and lost—as we are told—some views of rare splendour, over a mountain world of which King Fog had just crowned himself sovereign. Wretched chalets—mere heaps of loose stones, with a hole to creep in it, and miserable herdsmen in sooty night-caps, with cold and hunger in their blue hollow cheeks. "Les berceaux, les hameaux, les ormeaux, et leurs rameaux," are as much out of the question here, as in the charming region of St. Giles, where the Irish Shepherd pursues his calling. Had they (I mean the herdsmen) but a huge black hat slouched like a Spanish muleteer over the night-cap, or even the rough sheep-skin or blanket cloak, it would be something; but these poor souls look as if they had just escaped from the fever-ward of a hospital. The cattle are still in the high pastures, short-horned cows as bold and as wild as bulls, and bulls a great deal too familiar, I thought, walking bolt up to us as if they would call us to account in some way of their own, for encroaching on their bleak territory. Yet, notwithstanding this ungracious reception, after having journeyed for so many hours through a dreary desert, where neither song of bird, or hum of bee, or sound of life, interrupted the silence of nature, to have our reveries broken up by the true mountain music of their bells, and see herds of cattle browsing peaceably, as if there was treachery neither in path or element.

This seems a contradiction to what I have just said about the Grimsel, when I was in love with silence and utter solitude. I spoke as I felt then, and do the same now; but independently of the bells being in keeping, and the bustle out of keeping, with the scene, I had not calculated how long enthusiasm, awakened and kept alive merely by external objects, without any exciting aim or project, could sustain itself against rain, fog, and wind; or how long, after one is as cold as a frog, and as wet as a dabchick, one can indulge in reveries about mountains that are covered with mist to their very skirts, or grow imaginative while perusing the rude enamel of a turf that oozes like a sponge, and answers drippingly to that most miserable word plashy. And then the danger. I am not myself a coward, perhaps too much the reverse; but the narrow crumbling track hanging in the air without a blade of grass between it and eternity, and the roaring torrent through which the trembling horse scarcely suffers itself to be forced, and the creaking unfenced bridge, and the steep slippery ascent, and sudden shock of the downward perpendicular plunge, are strong sedatives. To say nothing of seven hours' rain, streams of water running in at our necks and out at our sleeves, just as if we had been fished up out of one of the water-falls, bonnets battered to pieces, and left with fragments of gloves in the desert, hair hanging like sea-weed about our faces; and then the continued struggle with refractory umbrellas. Every moment came a puff that turned up the whale-bones, and while both hands were employed to pull them down again, came a jerk that threatened to send us head foremost out of our insecure saddles. But we have got through it all good-humouredly and even merrily, and here we are safe from the

"Low brow'd rocks
As ragged as our locks,"

and comfortably laid up at the Hospital, at the foot of St. Gothard, thanking heaven for our escape from sore throats and fevers, and parching our damp garments over a pan of charcoal,—a night on the stove having only served to stiffen them up a little.

The Imaginative Faculty not in Superabundance.—A girl who was admiring the symmetrical arrangement of the skulls, (in a chapel at Stantz, in Switzerland), took one out of its nook, thrust her fingers into the sockets where eyes once were, turned it round and round as if it had been a dress cap until her curiosity was thoroughly satisfied, and then poked it back again into its place, as I have seen people thrust the skull of a horse into a hedge to fill up the aperture.

Mountains and Grocery.—Talking of Alps, I remember when a mountain was a mountain with me, no matter whether round, or square, or pointed; but now I compare, and grow critical, and no longer condescend to look at great clumsy-headed straight-lined monsters, merely because they are so many thousand feet above the level of the sea. Intimacy with perfection breeds daintiness, and now even the snow mountains will not always go down. At first I bowed reverentially before them, and homaged their purity; but I soon found out, that, like other things, they had their every day moments, and so refused to notice any but the magnificent ones, pronounced the twilight white, too cold and ghastly, and the broad noon-day glare, when the sky was blue-blue, and the outline nakedly detached, too hard, with something of sugar or salt about it that I could not well get over.*

Swiss Tea.—To three ounces of tea-dust add half a pound of cowslip-flowers, and an equal quantity of any aromatic herb which happens to be at hand: dry and mix the whole carefully together. When thus prepared, take a small quantity of the mixture, let it infuse gently in warm water, then pour it gently into any vessel that happens to be at hand, sweeten with beet-root sugar, and add goat's milk to the taste.

A Ghastly Heap of Circumstances.—Last night a man (at Lucerne) murdered his wife's mother; and, having done so, walked quietly down stairs, and said to the first person he met with, "I have murdered the woman." This declaration, he now says, was made in a moment of insanity, and persists in denying the crime. The evidence against him is too decisive to admit of doubt, and is strengthened by the known atrociousness of his character; but as the avowal of the accused himself is necessary to his condemnation, (a law pregnant with evil, and which makes the fate of a man depend not so much on his innocence or guilt, as on his physical force), he is consigned to a dungeon, until confinement, solitude, and prison fare shall have lowered his tone. There is in the same prison a young man not more than twenty, who has been in durance twelve months, on a charge of parricide; there exists no doubt of his having murdered both his parents. He chose slow poison as his instrument, augmenting the dose by slight degrees, and feasting on their gradual agonies†.

To hear of such things congeals the blood as if one saw a spectre, or heard that something dead had risen up from out of the earth, and was walking abroad in the world; yet this wretch's impenitent hardness still holds out; all means have hitherto failed in extorting a confession. I asked what was likely to become of him; "he may probably be forgotten at last," was the answer,—thoughtlessly given, perhaps, for it is impossible to imagine justice so carelessly administered under any form of government whatever.

And yet, notwithstanding the chances held out to the guilty, executions are frequent and terrible. Crime calls for punishment, nor should the honest and peaceable be liable to the danger of having the desperate criminal thrown out upon them, but a forced death in the midst of life, a death that cuts off the possibility of amendment, a death without repentance, (for what is the repentance of terror,) has something unnatural and appalling in it; and then the great question,—simply resolved in our own, and other countries, where the example of capital punishment has been proved beyond all dispute to be ineffectual as a warning, ought it not to be laid at rest? Great and humane minds have investigated this great question, deeply and closely; and, in all its bearings, it is tried and condemned, yet its condemnation, like the death of the malefactor, has failed to produce any ultimate benefit.

In the corner of a shunned and neglected-looking field on the banks of the Emman, is the pastoral dwelling of the executioner, a lone wicked-looking hut, with a gibbet standing gloomily beside it. Again, near the Porte de Basle, and to the most public and frequented of the roads that lead out from the town, is the platform on which criminals are decapitated. The executioner's house is close by, his garden touches the platform, and before the frost had killed everything, the soft fragrance of the mignonette, with which it was profusely sown, often attracted some of the members of my family towards its vicinity, little thinking who it was that loved flowers so much and cultivated them so sedulously. Flowers are not much cultivated here, and the little garden near the river had become a favourite with them. What a singular contrast! Flowers, the delight of innocent and gentle minds, and of the fearful instrument of condign punishment! Flowers sown or cherished by the wife or daughter of the executioner,—perhaps by his own hand.*

Home Yearnings.—I do not sufficiently understand the mechanism of nature (human nature, I mean) to account for a feeling, which, in the midst of my true love for solitary mountain countries, and the deep and full enjoyment which I find in contemplating the lonely splendour of nature in her unpeopled worlds, now and then comes upon me. When I have lived in the midst of society I have never desired any other than that of the few who were dear to me, and, though a lover of cheerfulness and cheerful people, I have never cared much for what is called the world; yet when I drive along the road that leads back to the countries from which we have come, the road that goes to Berne and then to France, and so on, the utter absence of all movement, the intirely breaking off with every link that united us with the—if I may so call it—old world, has something melancholy in it, that gets hold of me I know not why. I often find myself looking out along the road to see if there is a carriage approaching, with a sort of interest for which I cannot account, for I know that if Lucerne was a place of winter gaiety frequented by strangers, instead of liking, I should detest it. Why then should I, who have, if not all those I love, at least most of them around me; who possess the brightest and happiest of firesides, and never approach it without blessing the absence of what is called gaiety, and praising (from my heart) the better gifts of quiet, liberty, and leisure, for which we have exchanged it,—why should I cast a backward glance upon that for which I never had the slightest value? I cannot tell, and it is because I cannot, that I make a note of it,—noticing also that it is only on that homeward road that it attacks me.†

German Students.—A German air, murmured on the piano in a soft but masterly way, brought us all crowding on the stairs to hear it more distinctly. The performer, a young man in a carter's frock, sat with his back to the half-open door, touching the instrument with flying fingers, and an air of inspiration. I thought it might be Apollo just stepped down to take a little kirchwasser with the host, or say civil things to the dairy-maids, and looked up to see if there was not a cloud waiting for his divinity; but it was only a student from Heidelberg, in the favourite travelling dress.‡ A pianoforte always makes part of the furniture of a German inn; everyone strums upon it. A girl, who had been a moment before peeling potatoes in the kitchen, has just played two or three waltzes at our request, and very prettily too, and then sung a popular air, accompanied by a very clumsy marionette, who hummed a second, in good taste and perfect tune. What the French call "le sentiment de la musique," without which skill is ineffective and a powerful voice a calamity, seems innate in the coarsest German. The heaviest features brighten into expression under its influence; all seem susceptible of the pleasure which is conveyed to the ear by a felicitous combination of musical sounds; and many, whose position in life puts the opportunity of musical instruction quite out of the question, give to the sweet and measured seriousness of their national songs and the wild originality of their mountain melodies, an expression of truth and feeling that leaves nothing to

* Piety, which in its true sense and under whatsoever diversity of religious opinion, is nothing but an affectionate reverence towards the Great Cause of the good and beautiful, becomes all people, if they did but know it. There is a period, in which long perversions of it are apt to drive good and sensible men into false notions with regard to its value, but unless they are of a mechanical order, and defective in some of the constituent properties of the inferior human mind, they come round to it by the pure and modest reason which is to be found in imagination itself, and the noblest wants of a finite and loving creature.—Ed.

* This is in the dandy "silver fork" style, and unworthy of the authoress. Mountains have always their immensity and their mystery, and we can surely draw upon these for defence, if threatened with the overpowering wit of salt-cellers and sugar-loaves.—Ed.

† This man must have been a madman, defective in some common property of human sense and feeling. Most likely his skull would be found as defective as his character. His nature must be deformed or unfinished.

* Why not? Is he not a human being, with some flowery corner of humanity in his heart? And is it not better that he should have this link with his fellow-creatures, and see it appreciated?—Ed.

† The reason surely is, that anything which reminds us of home, reminds us of what we love best at home, and therefore becomes precious for so doing, though we can dispense with it when we get there.—Ed.

be wished for by taste, or cavilled at by criticism.

A spacious inn, reputed excellent, at Andormatt, greatly brightened up since we once passed a night there in the society of fourteen students from Göttingen, and fearful society, we thought, when we saw them tumbling in, some with oak leaves in their hats, and all with the high qualities of Captain Rolando's gentlemen in their faces. But their fierceness went no further than the outward man, and if they were not well-bred according to the canons of politeness, they certainly were so, even to refinement, from the impulse of good-nature. Like all the German students whom we have encountered, when they became convivial they sung, and delightfully, but ceased immediately on hearing that I had gone to bed, "peur de déranger Madame," (for fear of disturbing the lady) as the only one who could make himself understood, said to L— the next morning.

Amongst the ambulating masks (at Lucerne) who were pleased to bestow themselves upon us, I must not omit the most interesting,—four German students from some distant town, equipped as peasants of the Tyrol, with the carnival accompaniments of saucer eyes and pasteboard noses, and the Spanish ones of castanets and guitar. Their song, intermixed with dance, their giddy joy, the taste, spirit, and feeling with which they performed, were highly characteristic. It was the merriest masking of the carnival, and as they capered to their wild music, snapping their fingers, and rattling their castanets in that true spirit of mirthfulness which, when German gravity relaxes into fun, always seasons its enjoyments, their gaiety became contagious. Their music, too, was delightfully fresh and original, with a beautiful tender vein breaking through and chastening its gaiety. I have never seen anything so dramatic off the stage, nor often on it. It has always appeared to me that national music can only be done justice to by those whose early recollections are bound up with it, and who feel it in that spot of the heart's core which never grows old; it is then the song of memory, gay or sad as it may be, but always heart-felt. The popular airs of Germany sung by Germans have a delicious freshness about them, due, perhaps, as much to the spirit and feeling of the singers as to their intrinsic beauty. The heart throws itself into the song, and becomes again an actor in the chase, the gay carousal, the tender inquietudes of love. Both our students and their music were German to the letter, their song sparkled and overflowed like their wine cups, and the tone of sentiment, which is always there to refine its coarser particles, was given with sentiment and feeling.

Gay nations have no idea of the hilarity of a German dancing song, as we saw it performed last night. Such an exuberance of animal spirits, such a throwing off of care, every muscle in movement, all joy and revelry to the finger's ends. But the dance over, and eyes and noses laid aside, our students became grave men and bashful ones, with the exception of a single figure, whose convivial tone defied seriousness. Another—a little man, with a keen blood-shot eye, and a single feather in his flat beaver, might have sat for the portrait of Oliver Cromwell.*

* We have mislaid a reference to some passage in which our authoress (unless our memory has confounded her with some other writer) speaks with surprise of encountering some of these German students, who ask money on the high road. She seems to have thought their style of request not unlike that of the beggar in Gil Blas, who presents his petition in the shape of a musket. But it is a custom allowed to German students, and brings their character no more into question than the famous salt-collecting of the Eton Monks—not indeed so much with well-regulated minds, for the Etonians are not understood to want the money, while the students are; and German bonhomie does not reverse the notion of delicacy in this matter, after the fashion of some great and rich countries that ought to know better.

At parting with these volumes, we must again thank the highly intelligent and amiable writer for the pleasure they have afforded us.—Ed.

TO MARINE.

THAT I do love thee, let not words express,
But rather thine own feelings; for I lie
In the abstraction of my happiness,
Gazing devoutly on thy glorious eye,
And practising the sweet astrology
Of construing its beams; nor lighter dwell
On Cupid's every other nectary,
Dumb with intensest passion; for I feel
As though thy presence were a beautiful spell
Which speech would dissipate: then let thy heart
Be like the emerald, whose sympathies tell
What else were hidden, even that thou art
So much the object of my hopes and fears,
That they are merged in thee; thy being, theirs.

PROPOSED OPENING OF THE STREETS

FROM PICCADILLY TO LINCOLN'S INN.

[From Mr Sydney Smirke's interesting volume lately published, entitled "Suggestions for the Architectural Improvement of the Western Part of London."]

Among the most obvious improvements that even a cursory glance over the map of London suggests, is the extension of Piccadilly towards the East. When the narrow courts beyond Leicester square were first built, Marylebone was nearly a mile distant from town; a small portion only of the district contained between Piccadilly and Oxford Road was occupied by houses, and the western termination of Piccadilly itself, was at or near Devonshire House. Of course the populous suburb beyond Grosvenor place and Hyde Park Corner was not in existence. Thus a very large portion of that population which now pours its streams daily through these narrow channels, has sprung up since the nuisance was created.

The opening a free passage on this line of communication has been a measure frequently urged, and it may fairly be supposed that no one will be found to deny the great convenience that would result from it to the public. As far as Leicester square nothing could be more easy of execution: the two sides of Sidney's alley should be pulled down, the houses rebuilt on a larger scale, and their fronts brought forward in a line with the north side of Coventry street; the houses on the right-hand side would, of course, be wholly removed, a valuable frontage being thereby afforded to the houses now of little value, whose sides would be laid bare by such removal. The only property of high value which would require removal, would be the premises of the eminent goldsmith at the corner; but the intended retirement of that gentleman from business, will perhaps offer a favourable opportunity of effecting this plan.

How the proposed new line would be pursued east of Leicester square, may admit of some difference of opinion. Gwynn's suggestions on this point are, perhaps, rather too destructive, although adopted in recent times by the Crown surveyor.* A wide street, leading directly from the corner of Leicester square to Long Acre would traverse various thoroughfares in such a way as to require the demolition of much valuable property, and to render it questionable whether the benefit derived, great as it would be, were worth the sacrifice; nor would a new street thus directed afford to those great points of confluence, Covent Garden market and the theatres, so complete and effectual a relief as could be desired. A more expedient proposition appears to be to alter the north side of Bear street, and to pull down the houses on the same side of the narrow court which leads into St Martin's lane, a highly improved frontage being consequently attained by the houses remaining on the right-hand side of both the street and the court above named.

If this alteration were effected, an easy and straight carriage avenue would be opened from Piccadilly to Covent Garden market and the theatres, which are now accessible only by the most circuitous and inconvenient routes. It will of course be considered very desirable to equalize the width of New street and King street; but this is not to be regarded as immediately necessary, although certainly no improvement of this line of communication can be considered complete, that does not comprise the expansion of the former.

Having reached the two great theatres by the new track above described, it becomes a matter of very urgent importance to effect some improvement in the vicinity of those splendid establishments. The proposition now to be made is, to form a large Piazza,† somewhat in the shape of a quadrant, of which the two straight sides, or radii, would be the two theatres, and the curve would be a handsome range of houses having a covered colonnade in front. The area thus cleared would be highly convenient for the reception of the crowd of carriages which are nightly collected round these two buildings;‡ and it would essentially aid their architectural character and effect. The façades of both suffer much from the pressure and contiguity of the surrounding houses. That of Covent Garden, unquestionably the first pure example of the Greek Doric style erected in London, has on this account never yet been adequately seen. There is indeed no style that so much requires the accompaniment of space as the Greek Doric; for the perfect symmetry of all its component parts, which is one of the principal charms of this style, is utterly lost to the eye by the distorting effect of perspective, when the point of sight is too near to the object.

* See Fifth Report of the Commissioners of his Majesty's Woods, &c. 1826.

† The vulgar application of the word piazza is so obviously incorrect, that it is perhaps scarcely necessary to say, that an open space is here intended, similar to what, with almost equal impropriety, is called a square. The centre of this piazza would afford a favourable situation for a sculptural monument commemorative of Shakespeare.

‡ It is probable that any measure that would diminish the alarming and even dangerous confusion now attendant on the simultaneous departure of some thousands of persons from the two great theatres, would operate favourably to the interests of their proprietors.

A very beneficial purgation would be consequent on this improvement; some courts of very indifferent pretensions would be suppressed; and the parish of St Martin's would probably be induced to sacrifice a cemetery already too crowded with the dead to be any longer available for the purposes of decent interment.

The new avenue now in progress from Waterloo Bridge to Long Acre, will greatly facilitate the improvement of this vicinity, and, in conjunction with other improvements about to be suggested, will give a value to this spot in some respects unequalled in London, ensuring the speedy erection of a superior class of buildings. Hereafter we shall have to advert to the necessity of extending northwards this avenue: at present let us continue the course we have been pursuing eastward.

It cannot fail to be observed that the public would derive great advantage from continuing this proposed line of communication onwards through the populous and ill-arranged district lying between Holborn and Temple Bar. It is probable that many persons of delicate perceptions have never ventured to visit the precincts of Clare market; to them, any path, however circuitous, would be preferable to one which lies through this district. Others, however, of less fastidious habits, will bear testimony to the compounds of impurity in the lanes and court which it contains; and all will join in the opinion that, next to a complete reformation, the best mode of improving the state of this district would be to open a spacious avenue through the centre of it. Let us suppose this effected by carrying from the corner of the new piazza at the theatres a wide street eastward to Carey street, and connecting it with the Strand near St Clement's church by a branch in the direction of the present Clement's lane; two new and commodious facilities of access would thus be offered to all persons on their way to the city or the Inns of Court, and the present most inconvenient outlet called Wyck street, through which there is now of necessity much traffic, would be altogether superseded.

It is needless here to point out to those who are interested in the improvement of St Clement's and New Inns, that the execution of such a plan as we have above described, would be of inestimable advantage to those estates, and would hold out a tempting invitation to extend them, or, indeed, to establish an entirely new inn, by purchasing and clearing the adjacent ground, and erecting on the area so obtained commodious and cheerful chambers. When the low precarious rents arising from the dilapidated tenements of this district are compared with the high and almost extravagant value of chambers in the neighbouring Inns of Court, we shall be justified, perhaps, in entertaining a hope, that a profitable return might be realized by the execution of this part of our plan. The dispersion of the pauper population consequent on such an improvement would, it is apprehended, be immediately attended by a beneficial effect on the poor's-rates; a circumstance which is calculated to ensure a favourable consideration of this project from the parish authorities.

Nor, whilst enumerating the advantages that would result from this improvement, should we omit to point out the great facilities which it would present of amending the sewage of the very imperfectly drained district in question. The greater part of Drury lane is wholly without any sewer; many of the lateral streets and lanes are equally deficient, and most of the drains with which this neighbourhood is thus scantily provided, pass very objectionably under buildings in such a manner as to render access to them, for the purpose of repairing and cleansing, always inconvenient, and sometimes almost impracticable.

There is a minor improvement connected with the new avenue under consideration, to which it will be here well to allude. Every one must be aware of the extreme inadequacy of Chancery lane, as the principal and (with the exception of the still narrower and more crooked lane, called Fetter lane) the only means of direct communication between the two great high ways of Fleet street and Holborn; the southern extremity of this lane forms a pass constantly exposed to great and even dangerous obstruction.

To obviate this, let Serle street be extended southward through the intervening alleys, and let it enter the Strand at Picket place: a most advantageous thoroughfare will thereby be obtained with very little sacrifice of property; and by further converting Great Turnstile into a serviceable carriage way, the cross communication between the two great parallel thoroughfares will be satisfactorily established, and will make what has been justly described by Gwynn as "one of the most convenient communications in town."

Vanity of Dispute.—Contest not a point merely because you are in the right, and another in the wrong. Out of such contests spring dissensions and enmity.—Bentham.

A LAST WISH.

WHEN the blood shall quit my heart,
 When my spirit shall depart,
 And these eyes no longer see;
 When the bright thoughts no more come
 Like the sun-light in a room;
 Lay me gently on the tomb.
 Lay me in the open air,
 Underneath some grassy mound,
 Where the wild-bee's murmurs are,
 And the green leaves round.
 And as I shall view the spot
 From my dwelling place afar
 Be no ritual forgot,
 Nothing left my rest to mar.
 And that there may be some shade
 Where my mouldering bones are laid,
 Let there be
 Over me
 One green tree,
 Circled round with rosemary.

I abhor the close abode,
 Where the spider and the rat,
 And the spirit-chilling toad,
 And the harpy-winged bat,
 Disrespect the solemn stones
 That imprison dead men's bones.
 I believe I could not sleep
 Where such things their vigils keep.
 And another cause I have
 For a heaven-cover'd grave;
 From Apollo unto me
 Came the gift of poesy;
 Therefore when my life is done,
 Let him shine upon his son.
 I want no funeral show,
 Prancing steed, and nodding plume;
 Nor of hypocritical woe
 The detested gloom;
 Nor followers in dark disguise,
 With white kerchiefs at their eyes,
 Acting scenes of obsequies.
 Nor give me what vain glory rears,
 Nor aught by money bought;
 Nothing I ask, no friend I task
 Beyond a few kind tears:
 Strew flowers, and give me these,
 And I shall rest at ease.

BELIEF IN GHOSTS.

To the Editor of the London Journal.

SIR,—I cannot express to you the pleasure I have felt in reading the pages of your Journal. To have found a man who can, and will, regale us with several columns of imaginative prose for three-halfpence, is a matter to me of no small gratification; and it is in discovering your anti-matter-of-fact vein, that I have become vain enough to suppose you will give publication—for the amusement, though, perhaps, not the instruction of your readers—to a few words that I have to say on those creatures of imagination—those flying buttresses of poetry—ghosts.

It has often struck me, that to encourage the belief in spirits, especially in the young, is one way of making them religious. It may make them superstitious; but who is religious without being so? It may highly excite their tender imaginations, but it cannot fail to kindle a poetic flame in their minds—a flame which, when once kindled can never be extinguished, and which engenders virtue, morality, kind-heartedness, and benevolence. Oh! what would our mortal days be good for, were it not for imagination—

"Which colours life's dark cloud with orient rays!"

"Well," coolly grunts a cui bono gentleman, while he munches his breakfast and sips his tea, "what has this to do with the question as to the good that my children are to get from being afraid to go to bed in the dark, after having been terrified by my old nurse, who has already almost frightened my little Sally out of her wits by telling her how the ghost of an old gentleman, who was killed many years ago in the house where her school-mistress lives, by four men on a dark November night, walks across the old hall every night, clothed in a white sheet—what, sir, I desire to know is, what good did my little Sally ever get from that? Why, she has been thinking of nothing else ever since." Sir, with the profoundest respect, much. When the old nurse left her in her bed, she trembled as the door was shut, and said, "Oh! if those four men were to come now and try to kill me, what should I do?" and then she pulled the clothes tightly over her head and prayed to God, far more earnestly than she ever did before, to keep her safe from such cruel men, and to make her a good little girl, and love her dear father and mother better than she had done. And what if she did see, or think she saw, when she ventured to put out her head, and give a suspicious peep round the room, as the moon shone brightly through the crevices of the shutter, dimly illuminating it with a cold and melancholy light—what if she did see two large fierce and fiery blazing eyes staring her full in the face, and then saw them slowly advancing towards her, and thought she heard a low groan as of a dying man, and then, as they emerged from behind the little basket where her clothes were folded, saw them coming on rapidly, until she felt something fall heavily on her feet: it was only her dear "gramma's" favourite toad coming to her to make friends for the night, and purring to her with much good humour. Why should she be alarmed? Mark, kind reader—because she thought it was a ghost! And pray, may I inquire whether this same reason would not have been given, if poor old Betty had never told her ghost stories? Most certainly it would! And why? Because there is a feeling—I had almost said an innate feeling—within us, that there are ghosts, that there are spirits "which do people the air," and who can see into our inmost souls, can pierce the recesses of our hearts—a kind of inferior deities, who know all our deeds, all our actions, "whether they be good, or whether they be evil."

But tell me, you matter-of-fact gentleman, where would have been half our pleasure at the Abbey the other day, if there was no such thing as a ghost? While we poor guinea-ticket out-of-sight gentry were sitting in that venerable temple, listening in solemn silence to the spirit-moving tones of that pealing organ and the heart-stirring notes of that splendid choir—where, I say, would half our delight have been had we not imagined that such unequalled strains—only inferior to the "strains unutterable of seraphs before the throne"—had roused the disembodied spirit of the immortal Handel, who slumbers in the dust close by, and that it flitted to and fro on the undulating air, as it struck and reverberated from the gilded roof? Why, without a ghost, I would have sold my ticket at a discount, and thought myself lucky!

"But who in the world ever did anything," says my sapient friend, "who believed in spirits?" Numbers, say I; and I will give you an instance. Did you ever hear, kind sir, of Robert Hall, a man of the most exalted genius, the most refined and lofty imagination, the purest taste? He believed in spirits. One day he was sitting in his study, writing a sermon on the influence of the evil spirit. The window was open. A friend called, and he left the room to see and converse with him. He was absent but a short time—I forget how long—and on returning found that his unfinished sermon was gone. It had fled—it was nowhere to be found. The yard below the window, every place where it might have been wafted by the wind, was searched with the most diligent and scrupulous care, but without effect. Now what was Hall's conclusion? Why! one that everyone in his senses must have come to,—that the devil had taken it away. He firmly believed it, and so do I.

Now I know that most, if not all, of what I have been saying, runs counter to all modern notions of education. In these degenerate days, when every child is Pestalozzified into a pest—when every other child you meet is a prodigy—when everything is taught but obedience to parents and respect for superiors—when the only consideration is, how much is stuffed in, no matter whether it be understood or not, such sentiments as mine will stretch wide the mouths and eyes of half the maternal world. "What!" a fond mamma will say, "find fault with an education that sends home my child so clever and so learned, that he can actually correct Mr B. and myself! Where was the child that could do this 'when I was a girl?'" "My dear Mrs B.," I answer, "it is of this very cleverness and learnedness that I complain; and, that I may not appear singular in my opinion, allow me to cite to you the opinions of a man who has been justly styled 'the thinker of our age'—need I say that I allude to Mr Coleridge?—on this very identical subject. 'There are modes of teaching,' says he, 'in comparison with which we have been called on to despise our great schools and universities,'

"In whose halls are hung Armoury of the invincible knights of old"— modes by which children are to be metamorphosed into prodigies. And prodigies, with a vengeance, have I known thus produced: prodigies of self-conceit, shallowness, arrogance, and infidelity. Instead of storing the memory, during the period when the memory is the predominant faculty, with facts for the after exercise of the judgment; and instead of awakening by the noblest models, the fond and mixed models, Love and Admiration, which is the natural and graceful temper of early youth, these nurselings of improved pedagogy are taught to dispute and decide—to suspect all but their own and their lecturer's wisdom, and to hold nothing sacred from their contempt but their own contemptible arrogance."

I must apologise, Sir, for the length to which my "few words" have extended, and the rambling style in which they are communicated. Allow me again to thank you for having been the source, to me, of much pleasure and unfeigned delight. H. B.

[We have inserted the above letter, both for the sake of the writer's goodness of intention, and because he has "more in him," than many a reader of his avowal about Robert Hall's ghost story might suppose. We certainly do not come to the same conclusions with him on that point, nor on the necessity of teaching children to be afraid of spirits, though we would open to them the most unbounded fields of possibility in all the regions of a loving faith. These, doubtless, are what he would arrive at himself; but it appears to us that the world have had enough of the rough ways to gentleness, of the husks and thorns of faith, however necessary such husks may have been to the ripening of the fruit; and that the time is arrived for enjoying the fruit itself.]

SUPPLEMENT OF THE LONDON JOURNAL.

[We plainly confess that we make the following extract from the letter of an esteemed correspondent, both as a help towards the announcement of our Supplements, and as an evidence that they are not unapproved.]

To the Editor.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have seen one of the Supplements, and was astonished to find that you had contrived so well to draw so much intelligence and amusement from an otherwise dry subject, and one which is hardly ever rendered popular enough in style with the great majority of readers. They like well enough to hear of the antiquities of London, familiarised to them as you would do it, but grow weary of an old book containing them. Public writers have a good deal yet to do, to induce the majority of readers to read as they ought. Experience, I am inclined to think, will show that knowledge, through reading, will be best communicated where the difference between reader and writer is not made so manifest, at least where they approach nearer in sentiment and familiarity. Surely our great writers have now and then dreamt of monopolizing their researches into the hitherto unknown stores of knowledge, and by so doing make the day as distant as possible when literature, or the love of it, shall have become more the business of men's lives, or they would have condescended more, or rather have appeared to condescend more, to the level of their understandings. In my poor opinion, your style is much more calculated to induce us to read, and to love knowledge for its own sake, than any other, for the reasons I have attempted to give.

Your obliged servant,

H. W. S.

SWEARING.

August 29.

Sir,—Amongst your numerous correspondents, without the ambition of being noticed for one, allow me to make a remark on your last number. It relates to the profane expletives introduced in the "Dialogue with a Sportsman." Be assured that to every mind of the least refinement, to say nothing about religion, such a practice is extremely offensive. The common plea adduced in justification of it—that it is to take the manner from life, and that without it the discourse would want the point arising from verisimilitude,—is trifling. Is then profaneness necessary to sprightliness, the expletives essential to wit; or if so, are we so destitute of them as to be compelled to resort to oaths? Better then, I say, want point, and wit, and everything else, than be shocked by the very attempt to give us pleasure.

It gives me great satisfaction to observe that the offensive practice is growing out of use. No one can have failed to notice the vast improvement in this respect, as well as in some other usages, that has taken place of late years in those classes of society that were formerly disgraced by them. They have descended now to the very dregs of the community; where it may be hoped that, as knowledge shall increasingly pervade the public mind, and better materials be afforded for conversation, they will be at length intirely worked off. It has occurred to me more than once to administer reproof to persons of decent appearance for the disgusting habit; and I have uniformly found, that the most covert expression of disapprobation against it has been instantly understood and felt, and led to its discontinuance. A Reverend once found himself seated in a coach with a fellow-traveller for the night—a man of gentlemanly habits, and disposed to enter with him into free conversation. He perceived, however, that in this case he must be frequently annoyed with profane epithets. He took, therefore, the earliest opportunity of requesting it as a great favour from him—upon which from his courtesy he was sure he might reckon—that he would be kind enough for the rest of the evening to let him swear the first oath. There was no occasion for any further reproof.

I have written the above from a concern for the success of your Journal. There is so much of good taste, sentiment, and information in it, that it is a pity its circulation should be abridged by anything that would make it objectionable to a large mass. The circle in which I move is chiefly religious, and I have ventured to recommend it there, which may in some measure account to you for what some might deem my over sensitiveness.

The "Romance of Real Life" is a part, I think, that must soon fail you. Under this impression I had recourse to several remarkable facts that I had met with in a course of reading, somewhat different I should apprehend from your own; and selected the books containing them, with a view of submitting them to your inspection. But as it might possibly be a work of supererogation, and as probably the character of your Journal can hardly as yet be considered as established, I forbear. It might, as far as I can judge, be made to take a higher and more permanent standing than most of its contemporaries, nor would this at all be retarded, but rather accelerated, by the absence of everything disagreeable to the purer classes of society.

[We are obliged to the writer of the above letter, for the manifest good will which induced him to send it; but he misconceived us in supposing that we made our sporting hero swear, merely for the sake of painting him after nature, and describing manners. We did it purposely to shew, that he was as weak in manners as in argument. We confess we have not the precise notions on this subject, in a literary point of view, which are entertained by our correspondent, though we should be loath to disconcert any such kind persons as himself, and shall endeavour not to do so; but we can as unaffectedly say that we dislike swearing, and have taken more than one occasion of endeavouring to make it look what it is, as Swift

(adivine) did before us, in his masterly jeu d'esprit upon Hamilton's Bawn, in which he makes an officer in the army (a class of people whom he disliked excessively) swear in a manner that would have startled our lay-adviser.

Mr Bentham in his posthumous work on Deontology, has a passage on swearing, which our correspondent will be glad to see. "The passion of anger," he observes, "has been already denounced as useful on no occasion; pernicious and pain-giving on almost every occasion. All habits, therefore, that administer to it, are to be avoided. Of these habits, that of cursing and swearing is among the most foolish and the most mischievous. The popular sanction is happily directing its opprobrium against such exhibitions. Fashion had once taken them under its protection; fashion is now repudiating them. In addition to the pain produced by the anger which excites them, other pain will be produced by the expression of anger in a form so offensive. In the minds of some, it will shock the religious affections; in the minds of all it will produce sensations which benevolence should avoid conveying."

Our correspondent will see how sincerely we agree with Mr Bentham, when we repeat the following note which we wrote at the margin of this passage, on first reading his book:—

"I never knew a swearer, whether a foolish person otherwise or not, in whom the habit was not traceable to some obvious weakness."

This weakness, in every instance without exception, we take to be one of five sorts. It is either a mere habit contracted in youth from bad example; or it is an instinct of weakness, affecting a sort of strength; or it is a brute strength, weak on the side of the understanding; or it is an indulgence of spleen allowed itself by morbid knowledge, despairing of its fellow-creatures and of itself; or, lastly, it is pure folly giving itself airs of a knowledge of the world and a superiority to timid prejudices. But the two latter instances belong to the second. We have known very intelligent, and very good men too, swear; but as no man is without his weakness, so we never knew a swearer without one of the weaknesses here mentioned.]

'DEW-BERRIES' NOT GOOSE-BERRIES.

[THIS letter should have been inserted before. The interpretation of dew-berries by gooseberries was not ours, but that of some Shakspeare commentator in the edition from which we quoted. So far to vindicate our natural hedge-row discernment in the eyes of our obliging correspondent.]

Westminster.

MY DEAR EDITOR,—Rejoicing with exceeding great joy and gladness of heart at the increased success of your benevolent papers, I am anxious that you should not, even in trifles, be the cause of misleading any one of your readers. Do me therefore the kindness to notice, in any way most becoming to your editorial sensations, that there is an error in your annotation of "gooseberry" applied to Shakspeare's "dew-berries." My dear rambler in green lanes, by brakes and briars, who loves nature in her wild luxuriance, and whose heart boundeth with thankfulness at the good in all things, you must surely be familiar with that delightful little berry which is so eagerly sought after, and obtained at such cost, by the young of all stations, and yeapt by all the "black-berry,"—and I know that the very finest species of that fruit are still hailed in the eastern parts of our island, in the realms of East Anglia—even in the mouths of cottagers' boys, by the name of "dew-berries." Luxuriant in size and form, and covered with a delicious maiden bloom (whence its sweet prenomens), delightful to the eye and inviting to the taste, they are as supereminent over the other fruits of the world and the "waste" (as it is called) as the apricot was esteemed above its cultivated brethren. Hence their beautiful poetic association by Shakspeare in the same breath. During the last autumn, whilst rambling over many parts of East Anglia (where, by the bye, much of our old language, and many of the customs and expressions of our ancestors, are still preserved in common use and parlance) I was forced to revert to the hours of childhood, and its battles with the thorns and prickles of the berry and the furze, and tempted to devote an hour to the seeking, plucking, and eating of this delicate "fairy-dish" (and it is a rarity), by the joyous shout of the young berry gatherers, when they were fortunate enough to discover a tree of the blooming "dew-berry." The call of the young gentleman to his sister, "Oh, here, Matilda, here is a 'dew-berry' tree!" and the anxious reply of the gentle 'dew-berry' of humanity, "Don't pick them, dear Henry, till I come—I must pick them myself," still sound in my ears, and remind me of the then expressed hope "that the bloom of innocence may continue till the hour appointed by heaven for her being gathered with affection to delight the hours of man's weary travail."

Leaving it to you to make the correction in any way you may think proper, I subscribe myself, with much delight and sympathy,

Your constant friend,

RURICUS.

Portrait of Rousseau, by Madame de Stael—Rousseau had little eyes, which had no expression of themselves, but successively received that of the different impulses of the mind. His eyebrows were very prominent and seemed proper to serve his moroseness, and hide him from the sight of man. His head was for the most part hung down, but it was neither flattery nor fear that had lowered it; meditation and melancholy had weighed it down like a flower bent by the storm or its own weight. When he was silent, his physiognomy had no expression; neither his thoughts nor affections were apparent in his visage, except when he took part in conversation; but the moment he ceased speaking, they retired to the bottom of his heart. His features were common; but when he spoke they all acquired the greatest animation. He resembled the gods which Ovid describes to us, sometimes quitting by degrees their terrestrial disguise, and at length discovering themselves by the brilliant rays emanating from their countenance.

Profound and Noble Remark.—The happiness of the worst man of the species is as much an integral part of the whole of human happiness, as is that of the best man.—Bentham.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We shall insert with pleasure, and gratitude, the Journey of S.; for it is excellent.

The quarter alluded to by G. F. was not available for his object; but we hope to succeed in another. An answer respecting his Manuscripts in our next.

An answer as speedily as possible to Mrs W. of Canterbury. The absence of the gentleman who attends to the business part of our Journal, renders it impossible at this moment.

We had not forgotten our old friend and correspondent H. W. S. whose letter (as he will see) was welcome to us for more reasons than one.

There was merit in the former lines of S. R. J. but we did not think them so good as those that appear in our present number.

We regret not to have advised URBANUS SYLVAN to select some more promising spot to commence his perambulations in, than the one he has chosen. We feel that we ought not to have tempted him into so much trouble to such an apparently thankless purpose.

The objections of J. D. to the National Gallery should have been inserted with pleasure, had not their tone been unsuited to the pages of this urbanest of hebdomadals.

Will W. S. allow us to make an occasional omission? If so, we shall have much pleasure in giving insertion to his communications; and we only propose taking this liberty, for reasons which he would approve as an editor, even for the sake of the just opinions which he advocates. Will he also tell us what he proposes by his title of "Quotations from Johnson?" Are the quotations to come? For we see nothing of the Great Quotable at present.

LIFE AFTER DEATH.—BELIEF IN SPIRITS.

We made use of an inaccurate expression in our last number, which we are anxious to correct. We spoke of man as a "finite" creature. The term, strictly speaking, does not convey the meaning we intended. Finite is an end, and finite would imply a being, whose end, or utter termination, was known and certain. Assuredly we wrote the word in no such spirit of presumption. All our writings will testify, that we are of a religion which enjoys the most unbounded hopes of man, both here and hereafter. By finite we meant to imply a creature of limited powers and circumscribed present existence. Far were we from daring to lift up mortal finger against immortal futurity. Religion itself must first be put out of man's heart, and the very stars out of the sky, and no such words be remembered as sentiment and imagination and memory, and hope too; ay, and reason, before we should presume to say what end ought to be put to these endless aspirations of the soul.

We are for making the most of the present world, as if there were no hereafter; and the most of hereafter, as if there were no present world. We think that God, and Christianity, and utility, and imagination, and right reason, and whatsoever is complete and harmonious in the constitution of the human faculties, however opposed it may seem, enjoin us to do both. We are surprised, notwithstanding the allowance to be made for the great diversity of Christian sects, how any Christian, calling himself such by the least right of discipline, can undervalue the utmost human endeavours in behalf of this world, the utmost cultivation of this one (among others) of the manifest and starry gardens of God; but we are most of all surprised at it in those that adhere the most literally to injunction and prophecy, while they know how to confine the fugitive and conventional uses of the terms "this world," &c. &c. to their proper meanings.

In the feasibility of this consummation the most infidel Utilitarian is of the same faith with the most believing Christian, and so far is — the best good Christian, he,

Although he knows it not.

Now he is only to carry his beloved reason a little farther, and he will find himself on the confines of the most unbounded hopes of another world as well as of the present; for reason itself, in its ordinary sense, will tell him that it is reasonable to make the utmost of all his faculties, imagination included. Mr Bentham, the very personification of his reason, has told him so.* And if he come to the Pure Reason of the Germans, or the discoveries which that contemplative nation say they have made, in the highest regions of the mind, of a reason above ordinary reason, reconciling the logic and consciousness of the latter with the former's instinctive and hitherto undeveloped affirmations, he is told that he may give evidence to faith after his own most approved fashion. For our parts, we confess that we are of a more child-like turn of contentment; and that keeping our ordinary reason to what appears to us its fittest task, namely, the guarding us against the admission of gratuitous pains, we will suffer a loving faith to open to us whatever regions it pleases, of possibilities honourable to God and man, cultivating them studiously, whether we thoroughly understand them or not. For who thoroughly understands anything which he cultivates, even to the flowers at his feet? And cultivating these, shall we refuse to cultivate also the stars, and the aspirations and thoughts angelical, and the hopes of rejoining friends and kindred, and all the flowers of heaven? — No, assuredly,—not while we have a star to see, and a thought to reach it. Why should heaven have given us those? Why not have put us into some blank region of space, with a wall of nothingness on all sides of us, and no power to have a thought beyond it? Because, some advocate of chance and blind action, may say,—it could not help it; because the nature of things could not help it;—because things are as they are. O the assumptions of those who protest against assumption! of the faculty which exclusively calls itself reason, and would deprive us of some of our most reasonable faculties! Even upon the ground of these gentlemen's shewing, faith itself cannot be helped; at least not as long as things "are as they are;" and in this respect, we are assuredly not for helping it. We are content to let it love and be happy.

With regard to the belief in Spirits (which we take this opportunity of saying a few more words upon, as it was in answer to our correspondent on this subject that we made use of the word we have explained) it has surely a right, even upon the severest grounds of reason, to rest upon the same privileges of possibility, and of a modest and wise ignorance to the contrary, as any other parts of a loving and even a knowing faith; for the more we know of existence, the more we discover of the endless and thronging forms of it,—of the crowds in air, earth, and water; and are we, with our confessedly limited faculties, and our daily discoveries of things wonderful, to assume that there are no modes of being but such as are cognizable to our five senses? Had we possessed but two or three senses, we know very well that there are thousands of things round about us, of which we could have formed no conception; and does not common modesty, as well as the possibilities of infinitude, demand of us, that we should suppose there are senses besides our own, and that with the help of but one more, we might become aware of phenomena, at present unmanifested to human eyes? Locke has given celebrity to a story of a blind man, who, being asked what he thought of the colour of red, said he conceived it must be like the sound of a trumpet. A counterpart to this story has been found (we know not with what truth) in that of a deaf man, who is said to have likened the sound of a trumpet to the colour of red. Dr Blacklock, who was blind from his infancy, and who wrote very good heart and impart verses, in which he talked of light and colours with all the confidence of a repetition-exercise (a striking lesson to us verse-makers!) being requested one day to state what he really thought of something visible,—of the sun for instance,—said, with modest hesitation, that he conceived it must resemble "a pleasing friendship!" We quote from memory; but this was his simile. We may thus judge what we miss by the small amount of our own complete senses. We have been sometimes tempted to think, seeing what a beautiful world this is, and how little we make of it, that human beings are not the chief inhabitants of the planet, but that there are others, of a nobler sort, who see and enjoy all its loveliness, and who regard us with the same curiosity with which we look upon bees or beavers. But a consideration of the divine qualities of love and imagination and hope (as well as some other reflections, more serious) restores us to confidence in ourselves, and we resume our task of endeavouring to equalize enjoyment with the abundance afforded us. When we look upon the stars at night-time, shining and sparkling like so many happy eyes, conscious of their joy, we cannot help fancying that they are so many heavens which have realized, or are in the progress of realizing, the perfections of which they are capable; and that our own planet (a star in the heavens to them) is one of the same golden brotherhood of hope and possibility, destined to be retained as a heaven, if its inhabitants answer to the incitements of the great Experimenter, or to be done away with for a new experiment if they fail. For endeavour and failure, in the particular, are manifestly a part of the universal system; and considering the large scale on which Providence acts, and the mixture of evil through which good advances, Deluges are to be accounted for on principles of the most natural reason, moral as well as physical, and an awful belief thus becomes reconcileable to the commonest deductions of utility.

But "bad spirits" and spirits to be "afraid of"? We confess, that large and willing as our faith is in the utmost possibilities of life and varieties of being, we see no reason of any sort to believe in those, at least not as made up of anything like pure evil or malignity. It is possible that other beings, as well as men, may partake more or less of imperfection, and so be liable to mistake and brute impulses; but, as we need not be troubled with this side of spiritual possibility, why should we? For as to pure evil or malignity for its own sake, apart from some procurement or notion of good, nothing which we see in all nature induces us to suppose it possible. The veriest wretch that ever astonished the community, did not perpetrate his crime out of sheer love of inflicting evil, but out of some false idea of good and pleasure, or of avoidance of evil, which idea might have been done away in him by a wiser and healthier training. And as to the belief in a great malignant principle or Devil (though even he has his horrible story lightened by a mixture of mistake and suffering), the most devout Christians have long been giving it up, especially since they have observed that the places in which he is mentioned in Scripture are very rare, sometimes apocryphal, and at other times translatable into a very different sense from what was commonly received. In truth, the word "devil" has not been translated at all; it has simply been repeated, and thus given rise, in many instances, to a manifest and painful delusion; for devil (diabolus, Latin; diavolo, Italian) is merely the Greek word δίαβολος (diabolos) repeated; and diabolos signified simply an accuser,—a calumniator; it was a Greek word for an evil-speaker, a thrower of stones, and came from a verb signifying to cast through, or against. The Latin word is used in the sense to this day, in the well-known appellation of the Attorney-General, which has caused so many jokes against that officer; for he who was known in France by the title of Public Accuser is designated in law Latin as the King's or Royal Accuser; that is to say, Devil—"Diabolus Regis." The word is flat and plain enough, and very edifying. How simply is the frightful supernatural caution of the Apostle thus converted into the most natural of all cautions?

* Deontology, vol. II. p. 102. The passage was given in the first number of the London Journal.

"Be sober, be vigilant (says the Greek-English), for your adversary the Devil walketh about, seeking whom he may devour."

But "Be sober, be vigilant (says the proper English-English), for your adversary the Accuser walketh about, seeking whom he may devour."

Here is a poor mistaken human being, instead of a prowling Satan; and what can be more natural, simple, or reconcileable with God's goodness and pre-eminence, and the working of an improveable weakness and blockish mystery, instead of a malignant might?

To shew how accustomed we are to follow up the spiritual analogies suggested by all kinds of reasonable and loving faith, we will close this article with a copy of verses which we wrote last winter, after we had been thinking of some beloved friends who have disappeared from this present state of being.

AN ANGEL IN THE HOUSE.

How sweet it were, if without feeble fright,
Or dying of the dreadful beauteous sight,
An Angel came to us, and we could bear
To see him issue from the silent air
At evening in our room, and bend on ours
His divine eyes, and bring us from his bowers
News of dear friends, and children who have never Been dead indeed: as we shall know for ever.
Alas! we think not what we daily see
About our hearths,—angels, that are to be,
Or may be if they will, and we prepare
Their souls and ours to meet in happy air,—
A child, a friend, a wife whose soft heart sings
In unison with ours, breeding its future wings.

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 17th, to Tuesday the 23rd of September.

A HEDGE FOR YOUR WALKS; AND A NATURAL PAVILION.
[From EVELYN'S 'Sylvia, or a Discourse on Forest Trees.']

EVELYN is a writer hardly good enough to come under our head of 'Celebrated Authors'; but another specimen of him will do capitally well in this portion of our Journal,—not that the department excludes celebrated authors; the reader knows to the contrary; but because of his fitness for a flowery sojourn, and his love of nature. The present passage seemed particularly suitable to us this week, because it concludes with expressing the same faith in that double garden of here and hereafter, which we have touched upon in the preceding article. Evelyn, by education and one part of his nature, was much of a formalist, and not a little of a pedant; neither was he free from certain fallings-in with expediency, which would have better become a more stirring and less pretending character; but he had a genuine love of the world he lived in, as well as a pious sense of another; and was the honoured friend of Cowley.

* The present extract is from the account of the Hornbeam in his famous work on Forest Trees, which is thought, with reason, to have inspired the growth of timber in this country, and strengthened its "wooden walls."

The Hornbeam, being planted in small fosses or trenches, at half a foot interval, and in the single row, makes the noblest and staliest hedge for long walks in gardens or parks, of any tree whatsoever whose leaves are deciduous, and forsake their branches in winter, because it grows tall, and so sturdy as not to be wronged by the winds; besides, it will furnish to the very foot of the stem, and flourishes with a glossy and polished verdure, which is exceedingly delightful, of long continuance, and of all other the harder woods, the speediest grower, maintaining a slender upright stem, which does not come to be bare and sticky in many years. It has yet this (I shall call it) infirmity, that, keeping on its leaves till new ones thrust them off, it is clad in russet all the winter long. That admirable espalier hedge in the long middle walk of the Luxembourg garden at Paris, than which there is nothing more graceful, is planted of this tree; and so is that cradle or close walk, with the perplexed canopy which lately covered the seat in his Majesty's garden at Hampton Court; and, as I now hear, they are planted in perfection at New Park, the delicious villa of the noble Earl of Rochester, belonging once to a near kinsman of mine, who parted with it to King Charles the First of blessed memory. These hedges are torule; but where they are maintained from fifteen to twenty feet height, which is very frequent in the places before mentioned, they are to be cut, and kept in order with a scythe of four feet long, and very little falcated; this is fixed on a long sneed or straight handle, and does wonderfully expedite the trimming of these and the like hedges. An oblong square, palisaded with this plant, or the Flemish ornus, as is that I am going to describe, and may be seen in that inexhaustible magazine at Brompton Park, (cultivated by those two industrious fellow-gardeners, Mr London and Mr Wise), affords such an umbroculum frondium, the most natural, proper station, and convenience for the protection of our orange-trees, myrtles, and other rare perennials and exotics, from the scorching darts of the sun, and heat of the summer; placing the cases, pots, &c. under this shelter, when, either at their first peeping out of the window conclave, or during the increasing heat of the summer they are so ranged and disposed, as to adorn a noble area of a most magnificent Paradian dining-room, to the top of Hortular pomp and bliss, superior to all the artificial furniture of the greatest prince's court. Here the Indian narcissus, tuberose, Japan lilies, jasmine, jonquils, periclimena, roses, carnations, with all the pride of the parterre, intermixed between the tree-cases, flowery vases, busts and statues, entertain the eye, and breathe their redolent odour and perfumes to the smell. The golden fruit, the apples of the Hesperides, together with the delicious Ananas, gratify the taste, whilst the cheerful ditties of canorous birds recording their innocent amours to the bubbling fountain, delight the ear. At the same time the charming accents of the fair and virtuous sex, preferable to all the admired composures of the most skilful musicians, join in concert with hymns and hallelujahs to the bountiful and glorious Creator, who has left none of the senses which he has not gratified at once with their most agreeable and proper objects.

But, to return to Brompton. It is not to be imagined what a surprising scene such a spacious saloon, tapestried with the natural verdure of the glistening foliage, presents the spectator, and recompenses the toil of the ingenious planter; when, after a little patience he finds the slender plants (set but at five or six feet distance, nor much more in height, well pruned and dressed) ascend to an altitude sufficient to shade and defend his Paradian treasure, without excluding the milder gleams of the glorious and radiant planet, with his cherishing influence and kindly warmth, to all within the enclosure—refreshed with the cooling and early dew, pregnant with the sweet exhalations, which the indulgent mother and teeming earth sends up to nourish and maintain her numerous and tender offspring.

But, after all, let us not dwell here too long, whilst the inferences to be derived from those tempting and temporary objects prompt us to raise our contemplation a little on objects yet more worthy our noblest speculations, and all our pains and curiosity, representing that happy state above, namely, the celestial Paradise: let us, I say, suspend our admiration awhile of these terrestrial gaieties, which are of so short continuance, and raise our thoughts from being too deeply immersed and rooted in them, aspiring after those supernal, more lasting and glorious abodes, namely, a Paradise, not like this of ours, with so much pains and curiosity, made with hands, but eternal in the heavens, where all the trees are trees of life, the flowers all amaranths; * all the plants perennial, ever verdant, ever pregnant; and where those who desire knowledge may fully satiate themselves; taste freely of the fruit of that tree which cost the first gardener and posterity so dear; and where the most voluptuous inclinations to the allurements of the senses may take and eat, and still be innocent; no forbidden fruit, no serpent to deceive, none to be deceived.

Hail! O hail then, and welcome you blessed Elysiums, where a new state of things expects us; where all the pompous and charming delights that detain us here awhile, shall be changed into real and substantial fruitions, eternal springs, and pleasure intellectual, becoming the dignity of our nature.

* Amaranth means unfading—immortal. Our learned author therefore wishes to be understood, not that the flowers are all "amaranths" in the specific sense (which would make but a poor heaven) but that all the flowers, of whatever kind, are everlasting.

Points of Landscape for the Mind's Eye.—These mountains (of Savoy) are so high, that half an hour after sunset its rays still gild the tops of them; and the reflection of red on those white summits forms a beautiful roseate colour, which may be perceived at a great distance.—Rousseau.

REMINISCENCES OF A JOURNEY.

[Wazowski began to read this communication of our pleasant friend unknown, and came to the passage in which he speaks of angling, we had half a misgiving that he was some "impudent young dog" (to use the fatherly language of the plays) who proposed to baster us out of our ichthyophilosophy (fish-life-considering-wisdom, as a German would call it). But something connected with the very excess of his elegancies on that point reassured us; and we read on to the end of his paper, not only to our own entire gratification, but to that of some friends who happened to be with us, and whose alternate laughter and gravity he would have been glad to see. The philosophy of the "bee" and "luggage," the person and his daughter, the green lane with its insect murmurings (as if they were the "voice of the sun-beams—the music of warmth and light"), the old forest with its glooms, natural and supernatural, the shouts of the tempest, and the awful "talk of the trees,"—all, we venture to say, are excellent, and promise admirably for the writer, who describes it as his first performance. We know not who he is; but we conclude him to have too much heart, and too solid a foundation in knowledge, to be spoiled by this approbation. It is curious (though natural enough) that, in direct proportion to a correspondent's real abilities, we almost invariably find him modest and doubtful in the way in which he writes to us respecting his contributions. The one before us says he is not sure whether his paper is good, bad, indifferent, or even "execrable." The truth is, that genius is apt to know itself well enough on occasion, but its standards of excellence are so high, that when the impulse of composition is over, it reverts to them, and is filled with doubt by the comparison. Besides, in proposing an article for insertion in another man's paper, there is another kind of doubt which seizes a mind of a right order, unconnected even with the consideration of literary merit. Our correspondent has honoured and obliged us.]

REMINISCENCES.

"Or whom?—by whom?"—Not one word at present, dear Reader, unravelling these mysteries. If I am worthy of being better known, proceed with me but for a little while, and our acquaintance will rapidly increase: in the mean time, be indulgent enough to prepare yourself for a JOURNEY.

"Good bye, my dear Henry, do take care of yourself," are the parting words of an affectionate sister—"Good bye." Bang goes the door, and at six o'clock, one clear cold morning in the latter end of August, I find myself in a long, dull, silent street, in a northern town of Scotland, making my utmost speed to the coach, to meet a friend with whom I had arranged to take a trip to the Highlands.

There is something rather noticeable in the appearance of a provincial town at this early hour of the morning, particularly when the houses, built of stone, present a dull, high, and heavy front, which prevails in that part of the country; they look like the corpses of buildings, and have an unnatural aspect. There is the silence of night, with the clearness of day: there is light, but no life: there they stand, gaunt and gloomy, and quite distinct the habitations, but where are the inhabitants? There are the dark glazed windows, but where the moving forms, the glimpses of life and activity, to be caught behind them? The doors too, are not only closed, but seem shut with a closeness determined to resist all future attempts at being opened. There are objects also to be met with at this hour, which you may look in vain for at another; there is the hungry, lean, spectral-looking dog, with brown, dingy hide, walking slowly up the street alone, anxiously peering round for the first refuse to be thrown out. There is the solitary beggar-woman, concealed in a dark brown tattered cloak, hanging from her head, and fastened tightly beneath her chin; a withered, miserable outskirts of humanity, cut off from the rest of her species, prowling about, with her staff projecting before her, on the same errand. And then amidst the silence, your boots make such a confounded clattering, you fancy it must awaken all the inhabitants of the street, and that the pretty girls will be leaping simultaneously from their beds to take a peep at the traveller! Occasionally, at the upper windows, a flutter of something quite indescribable is to be seen; and if a door should be opened and shut, the noise is echoed through the town.

The general stillness and apparent lifelessness lend a promising and vivid colouring to those animate objects which may appear: in artists' phrase, they come out strongly; they are seen in a novel aspect, and their traits and peculiarities take a strong hold of the imagination. Never shall I forget, in passing along one summer morning on a fishing excursion, having my attention attracted by the quick clattering and floundering of iron heels on the pavement. I looked up the street, and beheld at the further end a moving mass of clothes, umbrellas, and portmanteaus; a conglomeration of human habiliments: above all these there appeared conspicuous, and court- ing especial notice, a blue cloak with the brightest of scarlet linings, fluttering and flapping in the air; and evidently some being was perseveringly grappling with it; but it contrived ever to elude his hold, and in the strife the umbrella fell to the ground, and then the portmanteau, and the hat box, and with each there was a snatching and conflict, of which words can give no adequate idea. No sooner was one fairly caught and imprisoned, than another made its escape, and the bright scarlet banner mingled in all parts of the fray, which held out no hope of being speedily terminated, when a horn was blown!—How utterly feeble was my estimate of human physical power;—look at him! see with what preternatural energy and all-embracing clutch he seizes the multifarious objects around him! They are gathered together, and pressed in one voluminous mass against his chest and face, and in this plight he waddles off at a rate certainly miraculous; his head is thrown back, and his mouth is just perceptible, emerging upwards, puffing and gasping for air;—never did I witness running before, except in a dream, in which I beheld a creature clamber up the precipitous sides of the lower regions, and make his escape with a legion of devils after him. But our traveller's woes were unhappily not at an end; his head was in an unfavourable position for the retention of his hat, and when turning into the street where the coach was waiting, it was blown off, and carried to some distance. Shouts of laughter from the passengers greeted this mischance;—surely now our hero of the cloak will give up in despair? Not so—he throws all away, and springs with undivided energy at his hat; his knees reach his chin as he runs, and his arms are extended horizontally like wings;—he has caught it—hereturns—again the supernatural grapple at his accoutrements; and in an instant he reaches the coach, panting and perspiring, with a gibe from the guard, and a general titter from the passengers.

Well, after all, man is a noble animal!—a persevering and energetic animal—an animal capable of sustaining a conflict with cloaks, umbrellas, and portmanteaus—yea, of subduing them and bearing them off, captives into captivity.

Talking of hats, brings to my mind an incident which I witnessed some years since in the metropolis of Scotland.

Engaging Reader, (female, to wit; for if I win you, I win all) let me deprecate your wrath for committing these digressions; variety is the charm of existence; believe in this, and pardon me; resume that soft and kindly smile, so sweet and becoming, and say, "Very well, sir, go on as suits your fancy. I am not given to squabbling; you will find me compliant to all your whims and vagaries for the future."—There's a dear and noble creature, and in return for this tiny bit of courtesy I will whisper in your ear a secret,—closer.

"But sir, you tickle me, breathing in my ear."

Do I? Wretch that I am! then I will breathe on your cheek;—now listen. There are but two expressions becoming to the female face, the sprightly and affectionate, or the proud and petrifying: for the latter there is no call at present; therefore, dear Reader, you act wisely and well—Allons!

One stormy evening, in hurrying along a gloomy street in the old town of Edinburgh, I overtook a big burly man, struggling against the wind, and pushing his way rudely through the crowd, when a violent gust blew off his hat. His ponderous size, and the suddenness with which he turned round to pursue his fugitive head-piece, startled those persons immediately following, and created a bustle; some females behind were alarmed at the commotion, arising, as they thought, from some black-looking beast scampering along with rapidity, and pursued by a huge man; and, wisely following the established rule of their sex on such occasions, they screamed—the terror increased, and the shriek was answered by fifty; the uproar and consternation became general; all took to flight, or called out lustily for help. Amiable elderly ladies, and young ones of unimpeachable character rushed into shops, and clamping their arms around the necks of astonished shop-boys, begged in the name of mercy for refuge and protection;—windows were dashed up in hundreds, and eager faces projected,—maid servants ran to the doors in dozens, and "Eh sirs! what's it?" resounded through the streets.—Reader, there is sometimes much in a hat!

Now then we proceed. We are on the coach at last. My friend, punctual to his appointment, with a brace of pointers and a fowling piece; I, with only a humble fishing rod. Scorn me not;—little can you imagine the ethereal taper of that magic wand, so finely pointed as to be hardly discernible within three feet of its extremity; and barely can your fancy picture the delicacy and sparkling beauty of my gossamer tackle, impervious to all but an angler's practised eye. Look at this elegant little morsel—this artificial fly—with its silver grey wings, and dark green glistening body, from which peeps out the most enticing bit of purple steel with its delicate barb, like the serpent amid the flowers of Eden, tempting, not forcing to destruction; no, never could aught so frail and beautiful be guilty of violence; the enamoured fish swims after it, and lies pantingly on the bank, happy to die gazing on the witching insect. Schiller's Robber, after he has plunged the dagger into Emily's bosom, asks if it was not sweet thus to die by the hands of her lover, and she replies—"Oh! most sweet!" In like manner have I fancied that the bulky salmon gasped out "most sweet," as it turned a sentimental glance from its glazed and dying eye on the little gaudy, heartless piece of mischief, reposing a few inches from its nose.

But above all, gentle Reader, if you could bring before your view the lonely glen, glittering with the dewy leaves of the green and sweetly-scented birch; the brawling, sparkling brook, making its way through rocky impediments, round which it growls and grumbles, fretful at being interrupted in its course; the fragrant banks clad with wild flowers and heath; the tempting recesses,

"Haunts right seldom seen, Lonely, leafy, cool, and green."

The spots of green sward, sprinkled with daisies—the seclusion—the deep and profound peace, tinged softly with a smile of joy—if you could behold all this—"Well, prosing sir, what then?" Why, why then, my imperious beauty, you would remonstrate but slightly against sauntering down that same glen with me and my fishing rod, some sparkling summer morning!

Too enchanting Reader! these digressions all spring from you; you see I cannot get on—I am now talking to you, thinking of you, admiring you! Hard is my lot to have so vivid an imagination. Why is it (I ask in the utmost perplexity) that you will sit before me with that Grecian head, dimpled smile, arch and intelligent glance, and—

Reader, we are on the coach! Bandboxes are handed up in dozens, and old women with handkerchiefs tied round their bonnets and faces, and young ones with ribbons, glance from heaven to earth, that is, their eyes follow with the most intense anxiety the passage of their precious gear, from the moment it is lifted from the ground, till it is deposited in Heav—psaw! on the Coach—they would not quit sight of it for one moment; even mid-way in air they are fearful it will be entrapped by some fairy sprite, and disappear. There is no maxim on which mankind are so universally agreed, as the necessity there is for every one to look after his luggage. Look at that old woman; she is in absolute terror; she snatches a momentary wild side glance, but instantly her eyes are rivetted on her box. If you were to address her, she would scream, and squash herself down on it, as the best means of securing its safety. She conceives it impossible, that you could have any other motive than a design against her box:—she has but two ideas, one, that she has a box; the other, that all the world are in league to deprive her of it. Verily, I believe, that some people have a suspicion that even the lobbies and staircases have the power of kidnapping luggage. I have seen a traveller rise twenty times in an hour to look at his trunk in the passage; eating and drinking, and newspaper-reading, could not divert his attention from this. I watched him from an adjoining room, and saw him poke half his body out, with a carving knife and fork in his hands; the thought had struck him, just as about to commence dinner; he came again, with his mouth stuffed full, to take a glance; again, with a wine-glass in his hand; and afterwards with a paper.—"O, now my dear, do take care of your luggage," is the earnest admonition of our parents and guardians to us in early life, and it is repeated till nearly our dying days.

Here I feel inclined to make a moral reflection:—Truly this world seems but a huge caravansary, in which it is the most important business of all to look after their luggage!

The time is up, the preparations for starting are drawing rapidly to a close. What shuffling and shifting! What anxiety in each one to make himself entirely comfortable! There is a cluster of human beings around the coach even at this early hour—meagre mechanics, standing gazing with a look half curiosity, half inertness, but in perfect silence; no one ventures to speak but the guard and coachman, or some garrulous passenger. Look at these poor females huddling together, with their arms muffled up under their aprons, their shoulders drawn forward, their heads and feet uncovered, as they stand shivering with idle gaze on the coach! These are factory girls, as they are called, on their way to commence their labours, which will continue with short intermission for fourteen or fifteen hours, in a heated unwholesome atmosphere, with the machinery, in its unvaried motions, swinging before their eyes—the floors vibrating beneath them from the ceaseless working of the bulky engines—and in their ears a heavy clanking and dull din, monotonous and rapid as their employment. Such changeless labour, one would think sufficient to obliterate all humanity from their souls; yet in spite of this, a touch of womanhood remains: the hair in some cases is parted not ungracefully, and a curl here and there, placed with due care, bespeaks a still remaining attention to neatness, and a pride in their personal appearance. There is no envy in their looks, as they behold the passengers bustling around them, gay and elate; no wish, nor hope, that they too should have an excursion. No, they cannot raise their feelings to that pitch; all is apathy; they seem to be destinarians; to have a dull apprehension that every thing moves on in its pre-ordained course; that the coach must go, and the passengers go with it; and that they must proceed to their accustomed labours; and away they shuffle in groups. Heaven be merciful to them! The subject is too serious for our present purpose—so let us be off.

The coach has started—off to the hills. There is music in the words, "hill and dale;" they give the idea of a cheerful undulating buoyancy of step, a breezy gladness, a certainty of peace and joy; they are away from the world, and have a perfume and a breath that belongs not to it. So long as I can breathe a blessing, that blessing shall be bestowed on hill and dale, and the breath of an autumnal eve.

That hour of richness, soft, and deep
Intense, and fraught with feeling,
As tho' a sigh before its sleep
From Nature's soul came stealing.

As if the thought of midnight gloom
Oppress'd its gentle heart,
And glimpses of a silent tomb,
In which we all must part.

Away we rumble;—the air blows freshly, all are in good humour; and the gibe, the laugh, and cursory remark, are rife amongst the passengers as we pass along. Some muffled themselves up in cloaks, but I courted the breeze, unbuttoned my coat and vest, and had serious thought of pulling off my neckerchief. With bounding spirits, as mine were that morning, the difficulty is to sit upon a coach. If one could but run or walk, or hop, or leap, or throw a summer-set—but to sit on one spot without moving, certainly amongst the trials of life it is not the least.

On, on, we rumble—the country glistens up freshly and cheerfully around us. Wherever a labourer is to be seen, he throws down his implements of husbandry, and comes forward to gaze on the coach. Let us observe this one;—he has already descried us, although we are yet a considerable distance from him, his spade is deposited in the ground with due care, and he marches deliberately up to the road side, that he may be in perfect readiness to have a complete and satisfactory stare. He is for no half measures; the thing must be done well; he must have all his senses in the most perfect order, and in the happiest circumstances for enjoying the gratification. There is no hurry, no agitation in his manner; it is calm and solemn, it is an important matter, and must be proceeded with cautiously. He has now reached the stone dyke, and slowly he folds his brawny arms, and places them steadily upon it. He is not satisfied till he finds that they have a firm and comfortable lodgment. And now comes a still more important point,—the chin must be planted on the arms in a favourable position:—he has achieved it! How squash and square it is, presenting a noble base for the upper works, from which the eyes gleam out, encircled by numerous wrinkles, indicating a rigidly scrutinizing power. A cannon ball would rebound from that head, it is placed so firmly. The time has been computed accurately, for at the instant he seems in perfect readiness, the coach passes. Interesting moment! We are the honoured objects of his careful inspection; we pass, but his eyes still follow us. At length he is satisfied, slowly his arms are unfolded, and with measured step he retraces his way, and deliberately resumes his labour. Let us take another specimen. There is a surly, independent-looking man, who seems ashamed of such idle curiosity. Three times he has laid aside his hoe, and as often returned to it with a dogged determination to proceed with his work: he takes another stolen glance. "Ah! it is unusually crowded: what a quantity of luggage!—and a new leader!" He is fairly overcome—his implement is thrown on one side, and he gazes his fill.—Certainly government need be at no charges for coach inspectors in Scotland.

Now we pass the parsonage;—yes, there he is, the shrewd old boy, patrolling his garden, hands behind his back, coat blackish-brown, breeches untied, neck-cloth white, face unshaven, inquisitive wrinkled eye, sagacious wordly look about him; and no doubt a very pleasant fellow over a bowl of punch. But see, there is a flutter at the window. What! a bevy of butterflies? Ah, I see,—the head of the parson's daughter, covered with curl papers—peeping little puss! very curious and very shy. But be cautious, be exceedingly cautious, for if a young man takes a glance at the parson's daughter, the parson's daughter takes to her heels!—

On we go—but—

"The bright sun is extinguished, and the stars
Do wander, darkling in the eternal space."

Astounded Reader—I merely mean that the sunny smiles which lately overspread the countenance of our fellow travellers are clouded, and in their eyes there is visible an inquiet restlessness—they shift to and fro on their seats, conversation flags, and their spirits are drooping low. They turn round anxiously to see how the leaders get on, and fancy that the coachman might just use his whip a little more—now there is almost universal silence, only broken at intervals by a deep sigh. The spirit of melancholy has descended upon us—depression has wrapped us up in his grey cloak;—can you expound the mystery? One word will dispel your ignorance—breakfast!—The digestive organs, like all idle beings, are becoming unruly for want of employment, and the inward derangement causes outward distraction. But let us pass the disagreeables. For fifteen minutes, men and women, lubberly boys, and eager-eyed girls, have snatched and devoured, growled and gormandized, spluttered with knives and forks, tea-spoons and cups, as if—but no, there is no earthly comparison for it; their only excuse is, that it is done from compassion to their digestive organs—disinterested humanity!

Al! this is past, and we are again on our way, considerably softened in our sentiments by a tolerable breakfast. The day has likewise undergone a similar change. The sun has blent itself with the cool morning air, and not a tree, or shrub, or blade of grass, but sparkles up with an aspect clear and glittering, beaming with gratitude and cheerfulness: nay, even the bright buff road, with its margin of green, puts on a pleasant smile, and gives us a kind invitation to proceed. The sky is very blue, the breeze inspiring; from the woods are borne the most penetrating perfumes; and the streaks of sunshine, scattered hither and thither on the soft moss beneath the tall pines, and the deep mysterious glimpses we catch into the recesses of the forest,—all combine to excite in the mind the most pleasurable emotions. Now castle-building proceeds on a magnificent scale—what beautiful forms are created—how soft are the smiles that beam on you—how sentimental your conversation unheard—humane your thoughts, and limitless your capacity of enjoyment! How the blood flows, and the pulse beats! Let me sniff up the scent of these fir trees—delicious! On one side of us there rises up a huge hill, or rather cluster of hills, covered with the dark green fir, with dusky ravines intervening, the dark shade on which quickens the imagination. Look over that mass of wood—what a huge group of trees!—how came so many to be congregated together? Far as your eye can reach, you may trace them till they are lost in an indistinct haze; the whole mass presents one uniform shade, save where it darkens in the clefts between the hills, and fades with grey in the distance. 'Tis a desert of tree tops.

Reader, if you have a fancy for a life of solitude, picture yourself dropped into the midst of these wooded hills, wandering over the soft unechoing ground, consisting of the dead leaves of hundreds of years, presenting one shade, one aspect, that of decay—no sky above your head, no air breathing on your face—where the silence is so profound that the snapping of a branch tangles in your ear, and seems to startle the whole forest.

In travelling in Scotland, you are frequently carried over ground so high, that you can overlook a great extent of hilly country. The reader must bear in mind, that he is not exactly looking up to the hills, else he will have a poor idea of the magnificent prospect his eye can comprehend.

But now we come to a softer feature in the landscape, and one of peculiar beauty. The coach passes a stretch of hollow ground, which intersects the vast forest; and in the midst of this dell, as lovely a lane as ever tempted the footsteps of romantic pedestrian, pursues its solitary way, and walks fearless up into the very bosom of the dark mountains.

Luxuriantly fringed with broom (now basking in the golden rays of the sun), intermixed with the purple heath, and here and there sweet spots of verdure glittering with daisies, does it not entice you, gentle Reader, to saunter for an hour or two, and "dally with its sweets?" I thought so:—give me your hand, let me retain it—this is the way to perambulate the hills, to roam the forests—who would think of offering an arm, of poking an angular sharp bone into a lady's softly-rounded waist, when he has a hand to give! Ah! what a spot for a declaration—sunny and secluded, breathing intense life and enjoyment, and creating a strong feeling of mutual consciousness. Picture the sauntering slowly along—the softly blushing cheek bent downwards, and a little on one side, while the fragrance and beauty of the scene lend a richness, a tenderness, an intensity to your words, which you feel a half-conviction must make their way to the little palpitating heart so close to yours,—almost fluttering against you.

The brightness of the blossom on the whins is beyond all description; the bluebell occasionally mingles with it, and the heath lifts up its purple and white spray-like head over the stone dyke, anxious to take its place on the picture. There is no sound, save a low hum of deep enjoyment—one might almost fancy it the voice of the sunbeams; the music of warmth and light. Yet from this radiant path, walk but two or three steps on either side, and you are in a gloomy and profound solitude—take a glance through that gap—the damp ground is covered with dead leaves, which have lain for ages; large weeds of unnatural growth have sprung up, dank and covered with unhealthy dews, as if they grew by graves—the trunks of the trees, old and dull,—can you conceive of solitude more perfect? Step in—you are in another world, the air, cold and damp, creeps over your face—above is a confused mass of black, through the fissures of which you catch a glimpse of the blue sky, but so far distant, it must belong to another world; everything is grey, grave, and hoary,—aged, profound, and mute, like the wrecks of a by-gone world. The crackling branches under your feet make a startling noise, as if sound was unknown in these regions, and silence was terrified at its intrusion. Are there no half-grey, half-green, filthy creatures, creeping through here? Surely there are—did I not hear the wheezing of a forest-beast of unknown name and form, and see the expression of a hideous countenance on that withered trunk?

Let us be off—let us return to our sweet path, and trace it through the hills. See it winding its way through the solemn gloom around,—follow it; now it is lost, now appears, again you see it far up in the distance, penetrating into that dusky ravine, like to the subduing smiles of a young girl of sixteen, making their irresistible way into the hoary and shaggy heart of a great sulky grandpa, not over well pleased at the favour requested.

If we had time, we might roam as far as that ravine, and there behold the brook tumbling down from rock to rock, plunging and leaping on its solitary course, nothing near it but the dark woods, and the grey rocks through which it foams. The eye of man rarely rests on it, though congregated multitudes might well assemble to yield it their applause: but it shuns society; it is a gloomy and scornful spirit, that gains a proud satisfaction in the mournful and indignant tones in which it thunders out its wrongs. The trees too seem imbued with the same feeling; they raise up their tall, dark, solemn forms in the air, but disdain to utter their grief, save when the blast comes rushing with its thousand wings through yon cleft; perhaps in early days it wronged them—far distant times, long since buried in that tombless grave, oblivion;—or mayhap it brings to their remembrance some dark calamity, or fearful revolution in the elder days, some tale of horror, mighty wrong, or overwhelming destruction; for certain it is, that at his presence they roar out their indignant fury, and hiss like a thousand serpents; they wring their arms and lash the air, and with ominous gestures menace the world with vengeance. And the river breaks into a savage participation in their rage, and raises his voice and growls out his anathemas in tones of thunder, as he bounds along his course, flinging up the foam of passion, gleaming white in the darkness. And at night, when the majestic masses of the woods are just visible in motion against the sky, and the torrent rushes past you like an enraged demon, and its roar mingles with the hissing of the pines, the scene is wild beyond description, and the mind is obliged to yield assent to the belief that the elements are actuated by feelings akin to those of humanity. But the wind wanes gradually away, and solemnity again resumes its sceptre; the pines present their former still, grave aspect, and the waters mutter in a more subdued voice their spleen.

But there are times when the winds and the woods hold more friendly intercourse with each other, when the former come sweeping from far off, in long solemn trains, with dirge-like music, and take up their abode in the bosom of the latter. Then there commences dim, wild, awful talk, mournful conversation, grave conferences on old primeval times, when creation had another aspect and allotment—and the river too, is admitted into their councils, and murmurs in a confiding tone his thoughts, and together they form a dreary and plaintive diapason.

I have stood, Reader, at the dead of night, by the roaring stream, rolling over rocks in vast foamy torrents; around me wood-covered hills, heaped on hills; dim glens, precipices, and ravines—the blast and the rain breaking on my face; and then nature seemed to utter a voice I never heard before; I felt that she "did mean something!" And the wind, as it wailed in my ears, seemed to me the peaceless remnant of once omnipotent power wandering over its lost realm, alternately muttering in indignation and moaning in grief.

But we shall be growing too romantic, and therefore pause. We have arrived at the last town the coach can convey us to. We must now strike off into the wilds, while the stage proceeds on the high road. "Waiter, order a post chaise for T—!"—"The roads are impassable, sir; the floods have carried them away." "Never mind, we must go." "Won't you dine, gentlemen?" "No, bring some biscuit and a bottle of sherry."

With your kind permission, courteous Reader, we will continue our journey next week.

EDINBURGH.

Not Venice riseth from the sea more fair
Than the regal city of the land:—she fills
The ideal eye with beauty, and the hills,
The everlasting hills, as a broach do wear
Her stately beauty. In this stilly air,
Swathed with the sunbeams, beautiful is she;
Her far-off presence is a stirring power;
Her shadow doth rejoice the lonely sea:
The Sailor, who hath voyaged the perilous breast
Of the broad waters,—spying from the shrouds
The city hanging radiant in the west,
The white towers, palaces, arise in crowds,—
Deems them perchance bright mansions of the blest,
A city fashion'd in the sun-lit clouds.

Real Wants Few.—If the philosopher be happy, it is because he is the man from whom fortune can take the least.—Rousseau.

QUEEN MARGARET OF NAVARRE'S ENTRANCE INTO PORT D'USSON.

THE following sprightly bit of narrative is from a new historical novel just published, entitled "Henric Quatre, or the Days of the League." Margaret, who more upon her own account than as the wife of the Huguenot King of Navarre, is in a state of opposition to the court of her brother Henry the Third, tricks the Governor of Usson out of his post by the help of the vanity of his Seneschal, which is here excellently portrayed. The whole novel (we say it in a spirit of real respect, and out of no invidiousness) is a remarkable proof of the progress of knowledge among those whose education has not been very scholarly. Evidences to the latter effect lurk here and there, forming a singular contrast with the author's general command of words, even of the most scholarly nature. The fault of the book is that it is too much spun out, and deals in details not commensurate with the importance of what is going forward. The passing introduction of Brantome is very pleasant.

Navarre was known to be in Auvergne, and thither the happy travellers proceeded in search of him, arriving before D'Usson in the manner we have just related. A brilliant idea entered the mind of Margaret, when she beheld the lofty rocks on which the fortress was built, its impregnability and romantic site; but, without communicating her sudden resolve, she simply requested the Baron to ask De Cœuvres the hospitality of the castle for a daughter of France.

Flushed with her scheme, she drew aside the curtain on approaching the gate-tower, and at the expected presence of the old governor; but in his place stood the smirking and bowing Pomini, who was dazzled with the beauty of the fair voyagers, and quite forgot the graceful Gabrielle. Margaret smiled inwardly at his officiousness, but she saw at a glance that he was her own, and might be moulded to her purpose. This was sufficient to induce her to return his civilities with condescension, and make him the proudest of men. He already fancied himself Monsieur L'Isle du Marais,* and even went so far as to presume on the possible acquisition of a baron's coronet and mantling.

The cortège passed into the interior court, where the Queen and Emilie alighted, and were conducted by the enraptured Seneschal into the hall. Great was the indignation of the loyal governor, when one of the pages ran to inform him that his visitor was the Queen of Navarre; but as it was too late to proceed to the court-yard, where he could only dispute with his servant the honour of the reception, he wisely resolved to take up a position with his daughter in the saloon of state, and in order to increase the group, the page was desired to bring his fellow immediately, that they twain might be in readiness to do honour to royalty, and reflect a proper dignity on the rank of the governor.

But for this coup d'état there was more than abundant time; for Pomini indulged in his usual artifice with visitors, of conducting them through the entire suite of rooms of the castle, ere he introduced them to the Marquis; commenting the while on the antique beauty of the furniture, the lofty proportion of the chambers, and the historical importance of the royal chateau.

"Stay! stay! Monsieur!" said the fatigued Queen of Navarre; "has not the Marquis a fair daughter—a pearl of price? Let us not delay in doing her honour."

"Her beauty can only be eclipsed by the bright luminaries before whom I now stand!" replied the assiduous and crafty Seneschal: "and your Majesty shall see her soon."

But Monsieur Pomini had something yet in store for his new friends, ere their eyes were blessed with the presence of the Lady Gabrielle. To the surprise of the Queen and her suite, he opened a small door behind the tapestry of the last chamber, and disappeared from view of his visitors, but soon returned with a bundle of torches, which were speedily lighted.

"What! torches in day-time!" cried Margaret in surprise.

"Your Majesty must consider that it is the fault of the architect, not mine," replied the obsequious Seneschal.

Any one but De Nevalles would have dissuaded the Queen from proceeding further, but his curiosity and love of eccentricity were deeply interested in the denouement of this strange proceeding, and he resolved to let the Seneschal go to the full length of his line.

The tapestry was put aside, and one by one following each other, the visitants passed through the narrow door-way, and entered on a stone gallery or corridor. The light of the torches displayed the rudeness of the masonry, and the awful prison-like gloom of the gallery. The royal party began to doubt the sincerity of their guide.

"Is De Cœuvres a hermit?" exclaimed Margaret; "does he live in a cell?"

Pomini made no reply, for he was preparing for his last effort.

Suddenly he stopped, and waved aloft his torch, commanding the attendants to do the same. At his invitation the party approached the spot whereon he stood, but were awe-struck with the seeming horror of their position. They were no longer enclosed between the walls of the gallery, but found themselves standing on a balcony projecting into the murky space. Above and beneath was utter darkness:—the partial dim atmosphere of light which surrounded them, was just sufficient to make the awful gloom visible.

De Nevalles caught hold of the Seneschal. "Why this mystery?" said he, not knowing whether it were prudent to express alarm.

"Look!" exclaimed the Seneschal, beckoning the party to approach the iron railing which skirted the balcony. Impelled by mingled curiosity and dread, Margaret and her friends ventured to obey Pomini's bidding:

"Now watch the descending light!" exclaimed the mysterious functionary;—and at these words, he and his domestics threw their torches into the abyss.

The glaring whirling meteors as they fell, illuminated the cavernous side of the descent, and impressed the awe-struck gazers with terror of the dreadful gulf over which they stood. After many a mazy gyration, the lights reached the bottom, and burned flickeringly in the abyss.

The group surveyed them from above with awe.

"Something shines close to the red light of the furthest torch!" cried De Nevalles, who was the first to break silence.

"Very likely," said Pomini, in a careless tone, "the skulls are scattered about in profusion."

A cry of horror arose from the fair living dames at this announcement; nor was their dread diminished by discovering that they were now in total darkness.

"By St. Hubert!" exclaimed the Baron, "it would only be doing justice to throw you to the spirits beneath! Tell us, what means this, or you shall rue your mischief."

"Where those torches burn are the dungeons of D'Usson," replied Pomini; "there, his Majesty, Louis, the eleventh of that name, of happy memory, kept the state prisoners, whose treason was manifest. Your Majesty's ancestor," continued the Seneschal, speaking to the Queen of Navarre, "was a wise prince—no one could escape from these depths."

"Let us away from the horrid sight," cried the Queen, who had retained the hand of Emilie out of fear.

"There is no danger from this conceited fool," whispered De Nevalles, who was close to Mademoiselle.

As the road was straight, no great difficulty was found by the visitors in groping their way out of the gallery into the genial light of day, and the warm tapestried chamber. But their anger now vented itself against the Seneschal; he was surrounded by a circle of inquisitors, who threatened him with every punishment they could think of.

"If I had been anxious only to revenge an insult to my sovereign," said De Nevalles, "your body would have been flung after the torches."

"But why show us these curiosities when the Marquis is waiting?" exclaimed Margaret, who could not repress a smile at the singular occurrence.

Pomini, who was taken off his guard by the cheerful speech of the Queen, replied with naïveté, "that since the visit of the Abbé Bourdeille de Brantome to D'Usson, he had taken his advice, which was to display the dreary depths of the prison caverns to visitors, ere he introduced them into the presence of the Lady Gabrielle, that her lightsome beauty might strike her beholders with all the force of intense contrast."

A peal of laughter followed this explanation, which was uttered in a tone which at once displayed the vanity and weakness of the Seneschal, at the same time that it bespoke the sincerity of the impulse.

"Ah! the Abbé De Brantome is a man I reverence," said De Nevalles; "his wit leaves a rough mark on every softer mind it comes in collision with."

Dictatorial Manners.—In the too-frequent way of communicating even useful counsel, there is almost invariably something to vex, often to insult, and almost always the arrogance which assumes authority, and exercises a species of despotism. Now, if men were as willing, and as ready to give reasons as they are to give rules, much mischief might be prevented, and some good might be done. Pride is undoubtedly gratified by being enabled to deal out its animadversions, and self-regard is flattered, but at a terrible expense,—a great sacrifice of benevolence. Yet, it is no small part of good-breeding and good morals to give appropriate advice appropriately.

"TWO AGED OAKS" IN HYDE PARK.

Birmingham, Sept. 2, 1831.

DEAR SIR,—When I was in London, a few weeks since, I observed in Hyde Park, near the bridge over the Serpentine river, two very old and picturesque oaks, which are railed in from the public. The fact of these trees being enclosed has considerably excited my curiosity to know what particular history is connected with them, or of what interesting event they are the memorials. That they indicate the scene of some remarkable incident of past times, or at least of some incident worthy of remembrance, I do not doubt, as mere longevity or picturesque appearance, would not, I imagine, have been sufficient inducements to make the authorities anxious to protect them, in a measure, from rude and destructive hands. As I am particularly curious in matters of this nature, and experience considerable pleasure from viewing existing memorials of every description of interesting event in our past history, or in the histories of distinguished individuals, I feel a strong desire to know all that is remarkable and memorable connected with these two spectre-looking oaks in Hyde Park. I have no friend in London who can afford me any information on this subject; and believing you to be a "good-natured man," and the last to be offended at a little freedom of this kind, I take the liberty of writing to you, for the purpose of making the inquiry. I shall feel very much obliged if, in your "Notices to Correspondents," you will have the goodness to satisfy my curiosity, by informing me on the above head, should you possess the necessary information.

Wishing you great success in your present undertaking,

I am, Sir, &c.

A REMINISCENCE OF THE FAIR OF BARTHOLOMEW.

ALL unforgotten is that sunny day,

Ah! days were sunny then!

When I, a happy and a truant boy,

(Why are those synonymes?) bounded away,
All mud and mirth, and gingerbread, and joy;

Prancing in puddles, panting thro' each pen,

Into that Babylon of booths—the Fair:

Weeks had I vow'd, Bartholomew, to strive for't;

True to that vow, but little did I care,

Though I, like thee of old, were flay'd alive for't.

Oh! joyous child! I mark'd the glittering shew.

Of wearied mountebanks; and envied much

Their recklessness of mirth—I deem'd it such;

For then it had not been my lot to know,

That Harlequins have griefs and even Clowns feel woe.

Saunders was lov'd and Gyngell deified;

None sure were happy if "the Players" were not.

To dreams of degradation, hints of pride,

The gorgeous Scowtons' troop replied,

Scout on, we care not.

Eighteen short summers syne—where have ye fled,

Dear wandering wonders—are ye old—or dead?

Have learned pigs "the way of all pork" gone?

Are thieves of that day, now at Sydney justling;

Yea! Chune too, the Elephant, hath flown;

And "left the world" for greater beasts "to bustle in."

Prince of Morocco! I admir'd of yore;

Are ye in truth no more?

Jesters have sought the grave—wild men turn'd tame;

Mimes mute, and infant prodigies grown old;

Chabert, though dieted on fire and flame,

Despite his sulphur suppers, is cold.

Miss Biffen, without feet, her race has run,

The Spotted Boy visits this spot no longer;

The dwarf's short thread of life is overspun,

And the strong man has wrestled with a stronger.

* A title which he wished to obtain in order to elevate his stock.—Ed.

Scene of past freaks, you are not what you were,
Tho' still the fair is foul, and foul is fair!
The gongs and roundabouts, and "ups and downs,"
And the wild gleeful laugh of Gygell's clowns—
Have flown:

Old Richardson remains alone;
The 'last man' of the race,
Wearing his old familiar face;
And galligaskins;
For one would almost swear,
They are the very pair,
That eighteen years since brav'd the summer's baskings,
Vest, coat, continuations, seem the same,
The voice, the gait, the spot, and eke the well-known name.

Health to thee, relic of a by-gone day,
Last of a class who 're fading fast away;
Though penny shewman!*

For thou hast paced thy daily path in quiet;
No creditor bewails thy heedless riot;
Who calls thee debtor? No man.

Punctual as tax collector in thy rounds,
Thy tireless industry has won its meed;
Thy parsimonious pennies sworn to pounds,
Hundreds to thousands, in due course succeed;
Thou'rt rich enough to dream of lasting joys,
And set up—a new pair of corduroys!

"No, Measter, no," I think I hear thee say,
"That's not my way;

Let spendthrift managers dress, ride, and cab it;
My habits are unchang'd, nor will I change one habit."

Landmark of mirthful memories long remain,
Chief of the balatronic troop—the travelling train,
And each September

Bring to a myriad minds the days again,
Sweet to remember.

Come thou, Bartholomew; much mirth and noise;
Come renovate our rattles, tops, and toys,

Teaching one gentle truth
To soberer years; in mem'ry of past joys.

Oh! pardon the frivolities of youth;
Nor wholly curb the young and buoyant will,
But suffer children to be children still.

* Some years since, during the period of the St Alban's Fair, a fire occurred in that town: Richardson and his 'troupe' were very active in their endeavours to stay its ravages; but damage to a great extent occurred, and a general subscription took place: a rough ill-clad person waited on the Committee and gave one hundred pounds! In what name shall we put down this munificent sum? asked the Secretary. "Richardson, the penny shewman," was the proud reply.

A GOOD HINT FOR DANCERS

[From the new French periodical, published in Paris and London, and entitled the "Camellion."]

THE existence of the country-dance is threatened. The galopade has been tried; but the galopade deranges the ladies' head-dresses, tumbles their clothes, and flusters their faces. As the ladies have no right to make themselves ugly, the galopade must be given up. The mazurka comes next, and it has numerous partisans. We shall see! While these revolutions are hanging over us, there is one thing which alone would keep a man from dancing at all; a difficulty that renews itself at every first dance. If you invite a lady to be your partner, she is engaged. What will you do? Ask another. Very good. But then it is as much as to say to the former, "I care no more for dancing with you than with any other;" and to the second, "I dance with you for want of a better, and because another has refused me!" How is this to be avoided? By not dancing at all; because the lady you first made choice of is no longer at liberty. But in that case it may so happen, that you pass the evening without dancing, however eagerly you may desire otherwise.

In many towns to the south they manage after the following fashion. To each man, as he enters, a basket of artificial flowers is offered, that he may choose out of it. When he would obtain a partner, in lieu of the customary formula, seldom relieved by the slightest variation,—"Madam, will you do me the honour to dance with me?" he offers the flower, which the lady fixes in her belt till the dance is completed. By this means, no one exposes himself to the mortification and risk of asking a lady who is already engaged, since whatever fair one is still without a flower, is also without a partner.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XXXVII.—FIVE STORIES OF THIEVERY.

WE take these from one of those celebrated old book-stall books, which were written hundreds of years ago, when men only published because they were in earnest, and which, therefore, are interesting in their very errors and old-wives' fables. It is a folio, on all sorts of curious subjects, printed in an honest old type, and is a translation (through a French medium) from the Latin of Camerarius, a German scholar and essayist, famous in his day, but who has come to nothing with posterity, for a certain insufficiency of discrimination between good and bad,—between what is worthy of implicit acceptance, and what to be received with an accompaniment of doubt and a greater nicety of criticism.

As we do not vouch for the truth of all the stories, but have reason to do so for at least one of them, the first (which we have read often in authentic books), we have not divided them, as usual, under heads of their own, but have lumped all together. The concluding one will remind Chaucer's readers of his exquisite story of the Three Thieves. [By the way, when is Mr Clarke's Chaucer to appear, which is to enable us all to read the divine old poet in new spelling?]

There is a certain French book (quoth our author) set forth in our time (entitled An Introduction to the treatise of the conformities of ancient wonders, with moderne, &c.) in which many notable pilferings are related, and some of them (to my seeming) almost incredible, as well for the bold parts as the cunning tricks of the thesues. I will here set down some of them, as they are found there. In the time of King Francis, the first of that name, a certain theefe, appalled like a gentleman, as he was dining into a great pouch, which John Cardinal of Lorraine had hanging by his side, was espied of the King, being at masse, and standing right over against the Cardinal. The theefe perceiving himself spied, held vp his finger to the King, making a sign that he should say nothing and he should see good sport. The King, glad of such meriment, and that he should have cause to laugh, let him alone; and within a while, after coming to the Cardinal, took occasion, in talking with him, to make the Cardinal goe to his pouch, who, missing what he had put therein, begins to wonder; but the King, who had seen the play, was as merrie on the other side. But after the King had well laughed, he would gladlie that the Cardinal should have had againe what was taken from him, as indeed he made account that the meaning of the taker was; but whereas the King thought he was an honest gentleman, and of some account, in that he shewed himself so resolute and held his countenance so well; experience showed that he was a most cunning thiefe, gentlemanlike, that meant not to test, but making as if he tested, was in good earnest. Then the Cardinal turned all the laughter against the King, who, using his wonted oth, swore, by the faith of a gentleman, That it was the first time that ever a theefe had made him his companion.

The other theueish trick was plaid in the presence of the Emperor Charles the Fifth. He upon a day comanding a semouee, while euerie man was busied in putting up his stuffe, there entred a good fellow into the hall where the Emperour then was, being meanely accompanied and readie to take horse. This theefe hauing made a great reuerence, presently went about the taking downe of the hangings, making great hast, as if he had much businesse to doe; and though it was not his profession to set up and take downe hangings, yet he went about it so nimblely that he whose charge it was to take them downe, comming to doe it, found that somebodie had already eased him of that labour, and (which was worse) of carrying them away.

But the boldnesse of an Italian theefe was as great, who plaid this part at Rome in the time of Pope Paul the Third. A certaine Cardinal hauing made a great feast in his house, and the silver vessels being lockt vp in a trunke that stood in a chamber next to the hall where the feast had bene, whilst many were sitting and walking in this chamber wayting for their masters, there came a man in with a torch carried before him, bearing the countenance of the steward, and hauing a jacket on, who praised those that sate on the trunke to rise vp from it, because he was to use the same; which they heeing done, he made it be taken vp by certain porters that followed him in, and went cleane away with it. And this was done while the steward and all the seruants of the house were at supper.

In the same chapter there be other strange and notable tales of diuers theueries; but it sufficeth to have pickt out these three which I take for the most memorable among them. I will here add a fourth, which seemeth incredible, and excelleth all the rest for valour and boldnesse. Sabellius setteth it downe with all the circumstances, and it is thus: A certaine Candiot called Stamat, being at Venice when the treasure was shewed in kinnesse to the Duke of Ferrara, entred into the chappell so boldly that he was taken for one of the Duke's domestical seruants, and wondering at so much wealth, instead of contenting himself with the sight, he resolved from thence forward to commit some notable peeces of theuarie. Saint Mark's church, guided with pure gold very neere all ouer, is built at the bottom round about within and without with peeces or tables of marble. This Grecian theefe, maruelous cunning and nimble, devised to take out finely by night one of the tables or stones of marble against that place of the church where the altar stands, called The childrens Altar, thereby to make himself an entrance to the treasure; and hauing laboured a night, because the wall could not in that time bee wrought through, he laid the stone handsomely into his place againe, and fitted it so well, as no man could perceiue any shew of opening it at all; as for the stones and rubbish that he tooke out of the wall, he carried it all away so nimblely and so cleanly, and all before day, that he was neuer discovered. Hauing wrought this many nights, hee got at length to the treasure, and began to carie away much riches of diuers kinds. I did once see this treasure, and wondered at it, being admitted amongst the traine of the ambassador of Fredericke the Emperour. For besides an infinite number of precious stones set in worke, I saw there twelve crownes, and as many breast-plates of golde, set with an innumerable sort of jems, whose brightness would have dazzled the eyes both of the bodie and of the minde; moreover, pots of aggat and other stones of price, the eares exceedingly high esteemed because of their value: also shrines, candlesticks, and manie other implements for altars, which were not only of pure gold, but also garnished with so many stones of worth, that the gold was nothing in comparison thereof. I speak not of the Unicorn's horne which is infinitely estimated, nor the duke's crowne, nor the other peeces of exquisite worke, which this Greek had carried away all by leasure. But (as it is commonly said) adulterie and theft were neuer long time hid; and because this fault could not be so soon discovered, it so fell out that the authore thereof laid it open, and the theefe bewraied himself. He had a compeer in the cite, a gentleman of the same Isle of Candie, called Zacharias Grio, an honest man, and of a good conscience. Stamat one day taking him aside neere to the altar, and drawing a promise from him that hee should keepe secret that which he should tell him, discovered from the beginning to the end all that he had done: and then carries him to his house, where he shews him the inestimable riches he had stolen. The gentleman being vertuous and conscionable, stood amazed at the sight, and quaking at the horror of the offence, began to reele, and could no longer stand. Whereupon Stamat (as they say) like a desperat villaine, was about to have killed him in the place, and as his will of doing it increased, Grio mistrusting him, stayed the blow by saying that the extreame joy which he conceived in seeing so many precious things, of which he neuer thought to haue had any part, had made him (as it were) beside himself. Stamat, content with that excuse, let him alone. Of the other side, Grio receiued in gift of him a precious stone, and of exceeding great value, and is the same that is now worne in the forepart of the dukes crowne. So, making as if he had some weightie matter to despatch, forth he goes of the house, and hies him to the palace, where hauing obtained access to the duke, he reuealeth all the matter, saying withall that there needed expedition, otherwise Stamat might rouse himself, looke about him, disguise himself, shift lodging or saue himself otherways with the best of his booties. To giue the more credit to his words, he drew forth of his bosome the precious stone that had been giuen him; which scene, some were sent away with all speed to the house, who laid hold of Stamat and all that he had stolen, amounting to the value of two millions of gold, nothing thereof being (as yet) removed. So he was hanged between two pillars: and the Informer (besides a rich recompense which he had at that time receiued) had an yearly pension out of the public treasure for so long time as he liued.

Petrus Iustinianus reciteth the same story after Sabellius, and withal setteth downe another of our time that fell out in the same cite of Venice. A Neapolitan found meanes with counterfeit keyes, to vnlock the common treasurer's chamber, and the yron chests that were therein, full of the common treasure, and carried away eight thousand crowns. But in a few days hee was taken, and by sentence of the Tenne, after hee had his right hand cut off, was hanged at an high gibbet set vp of purpose in the place called the Realte, neere to which the robberie had been done.

To the aforesaid description of the treasure of Venice set downe by Sabellius, I thinke not amiss to annexe that which Phillip de Commines, a witness worthe to be credited, reporteth to haue himselfe scene. "There is at Venice," saith he, "Saint Mark's church, one of the fairest and best furnished that a man shall see; in it lies the treasure so much spoken of all the world over; the same consisteth of certaine verie rich Ornaments of that church, of Pearles in number foureteen, not polished; twelve golden crownes with which, in times past, they used to decke and set forth twelve women. But on a day as they were solemnizing that pompe, it happened that certain Theeves took and carried away those women with their crownes, who, being afterwards rescued and recovered, their husbands gave and dedicated these crowns to Saint Mark, and built a chapel, into which the lords of the counsell enter once euerie yeare, namely, the day of the recoverie of the women." In a little Italian booke, setting out the memorable things of Venice, we read that among the riches of this Treasure there is also the Duke's Cap, made not long ago, which is estimated at above two hundred thousand crowns. This treasure hath been made up into such a heape, partly by the spoile of Constantinople, at such time as the French and the Venetians overcame it, and of other cities conquered, and partly by presents given to that commonwealth by diuers princes. There be some that tell an old fable, that this treasure was brought to Venice by foure riche merchants, two of which thinking it unfit the treasure should haue so many owners, resolved to poison the other two, which two (not knowing the determination of their companions) purposed the same likewise of their part, so that they were poisoned all foure, and died without heires; whereupon, the Seigniorie of Venice seized on all the wealth which they had left; and this (they say) is signified by the four Images of porphirie that stand by the great gate of the common palace embracing one another. This the Author of that little booke saith. This treasure they vse to set out at shew euerie yeare at certaine solemne feasts, upon the great Altar in St Mark's church; and I doe not think that in all those countries which we call Christendom, there is any so rich, although that of St Denys, in France, be very faire, marueilous rare, and of greate value.

SWIFT.—(SECOND SPECIMEN.)

His Admirable Essay on Conversation.

I HAVE observed few obvious subjects to have been so seldom, or at least so slightly handled, as this; and, indeed, I know few so difficult to be treated as it ought, nor yet upon which there seemeth so much to be said.

Most things pursued by men for the happiness of public or private life, our wit or folly have so refined that they seldom exist but in idea; a true friend, a good marriage, a perfect form of government, with some others, require so many ingredients so good in their several kinds, and so much niceness in mixing them, that for some thousands of years men have despaired of reducing their schemes to perfection. But, in conversation it is, or might be, otherwise; for here we are only to avoid a multitude of errors, which, although a matter of some difficulty, may be in any man's power, for want of which it remaineth as mere an idea as the other. Therefore, it seemeth to me that the truest way to understand conversation is, to know the faults and errors to which it is subject, and from thence every man to form maxims to himself whereby it may be regulated; because it requireth few talents to which most men are not born, or at least may not acquire without any great genius or study. For nature hath left every man a capacity of being agreeable, though not of shining in company; and there are an hundred men sufficiently qualified for both, who by a very few faults, that they might correct in half an hour, are not so much as tolerable.

I was prompted to write my thoughts on this subject by mere indignation, to reflect that so useful and innocent a pleasure, so fitted for every period and condition of life, and so much in all men's power, should be so much neglected and abused.

And in this discourse, it will be necessary to note those errors that are obvious, as well as others which are seldom observed; since there are few so obvious or acknowledged, into which most men, some time or other, are not apt to run.

For instance: nothing is more generally exploded than the folly of talking too much; yet I rarely remember to have seen five people together where some one among them hath not been predominant in that kind, to the great constraint and disgust of all the rest. But, among such as deal in multitudes of words, none are comparable to the sober deliberate talker, who proceedeth with much thought and caution, maketh his preface, brancheth out into several digressions, findeth a hint that putteth him in mind of another story, which he promiseth to tell you when this is done; cometh back regularly to his subject; cannot call to mind some person's name, holdeth his head, complaineth of his memory; the company all this while in suspense; at length says, it is no matter, and goes on. And, to crown the business, it perhaps proves to be a story the company hath heard fifty times before; or, at best, some insipid adventure of the relater.

Another general fault in conversation is, that of those who affect to talk of themselves. Some, without any ceremony, give you the history of their lives; will relate the annals of their diseases, with the several symptoms and circumstances of them: will enumerate the hardships and injustice they have suffered in court, in parliament, in love, or in law. Others are more dexterous, and with great art will lie on the watch to hook in their own praise. They will call a witness to remember they always foretold what would happen in such a case, but none would believe them; they advised such a man from the beginning, and told him the consequences just as they happened; but he would have his own way. Others make a vanity of telling their faults; they are the strangest men in the world, they cannot dissemble; they own it is a folly; they have lost abundance of advantages by it; but if you would give them the world, they cannot help it; there is something in their nature that abhors insincerity and constraint; with many other insufferable topics of the same altitude.

Of such mighty importance every man is to himself, and ready to think he is to others, without once making this easy and obvious reflexion, that his affairs can have no more weight with other men, than theirs have with him; and how little that is, he is sensible enough.

Where company hath met, I often have observed two persons discover, by some accident, that they were bred together at the same school or university; after which the rest are condemned to silence, and to listen while these two are refreshing each other's memory with the arch tricks and passages of themselves and comrades.

I know a great officer of the army, who will sit for some time with a supercilious and impatient silence, full of anger and contempt for those who are talking, at length of a sudden demand audience, decide the matter in a short dogmatical way; then withdraw within himself again, and vouchsafe to talk no more, until his spirits circulate again to the same point.

There are some faults in conversation which none are so subject to as the men of wit, nor ever so much as when they are with each other. If they have opened their mouths without endeavouring to say a witty thing, they think it so many words lost. It is a torment to the hearers as much as to themselves, to see them upon the rack for invention, and in perpetual constraint with so little success. They must do something extraordinary, in order to acquit themselves, and answer their character, else the standers by may be disappointed, and be apt to think them only like the rest of mortals. I have known two men of wit industriously brought together, in order to entertain the company, where they have made a very ridiculous figure, and provided all the mirth at their own expense.

I know a man of wit* who is never easy but where he can be allowed to dictate and preside; he neither expecteth to be informed or entertained, but to display his own talents. His business is to be good company, and not good conversation; and therefore he chuseth to frequent those who are content to listen, and profess themselves his admirers. And, indeed, the worst conversation I ever remember to have heard in my life, was that at Will's Coffee House, where the wits (as they were called) used formerly to assemble; that is to say, five or six men, who had writ plays, or at least prologues, or had share in a miscellany, came hither, and entertained one another with their trifling composes, in so important an air, as if they had been the noblest efforts of human nature, or that the fate of kingdoms depended on them; and they were usually attended with an humble audience of the young students from the inns of court, or of the universities, who, at due distance, listened to these oracles, and returned home with great contempt for their law and philosophy, their heads filled with trash, under the name of politeness, criticism, and belles-lettres.

By these means, the poets, for many years past, were all over-run with pedantry. For, as I take it, the word is not properly used; because pedantry is the too frequent or unseasonable obtruding our own knowledge in common discourse, and placing too great a value upon it; by which definition men of the court or the army may be as guilty of pedantry as a philosopher or a divine; and it is the same vice in women, when they are over-copious upon the subject of their petticoats, or their fans, or their china. For which reason, although it be a piece of prudence, as well as good manners, to put men upon talking on subjects they are best versed in; yet that is a liberty a wise man could hardly take; because, besides the imputation of pedantry, it is what he would never improve by.

This great town is usually provided with some player, mimic, or buffoon, who hath a general reception at the great tables; familiar and domestic with persons of the first quality, and usually sent for at every meeting to divert the company; against which I have no objection. You go there as to a farce or a puppet-show; your business is only to laugh in season, either out of inclination or civility, while the merry companion is acting his part. It is a business he has undertaken, and we are to suppose he is paid for his day's work. I only quarrel, when, in select and private meetings, where men of wit and learning are invited to pass an evening, this jester should be admitted to run over his circle of tricks, and make the whole company unfit for any other conversation, besides the indignity of confounding men's talents as so shameful a rate.

Railery is the finest part of conversation; but as it is our usual custom to counterfeit and adulterate whatever is too dear for us, so we have done with this, and turned it all into what is generally called repartee, or being smart; just as when an expensive fashion cometh up, those who are not able to reach it content themselves with some paltry imitation. It now passeth for railery to run a man down in discourse, to put him out of countenance and make him ridiculous, sometimes to expose the defects of his person or understanding; on all which occasions he is obliged not to be angry, to avoid the imputation of not being able to take a jest. It is admirable to observe one who is dexterous at this art, singling out a weak adversary, getting the laugh on his side, and then carrying all before him. The French, from whom we borrow the word, have a quite different idea of the thing, and so had we in the polite age of our fathers. Railery was to say something that at first appeared a reproach or reflexion, but by some turn of wit, unexpected and surprising, ended always in a compliment, and to the advantage of the person it was addressed to. And surely one of the best rules in conversation is, never to say a thing which any of the company can reasonably wish we had rather left unsaid; nor can there anything be well more contrary to the ends for which people meet together, than to part unsatisfied with each other or themselves.

There are two faults in conversation which appear very different, yet arise from the same root, and are equally blameable; I mean an impatience to interrupt others, and the uneasiness of being interrupted ourselves. The two chief ends of conversation are to entertain and improve those we are among, or to receive those benefits ourselves, which whoever will consider, cannot easily run into either of these two errors; because when any man speaketh in company, it is to be supposed that he doth it for his hearer's sake, and not his own; so that common discretion will teach us not to force their attention if they are not willing to lend it; nor, on the other side, to interrupt him who is in possession, because that is the grossest manner to give the preference to our own good sense.

There are some people whose good manners will not suffer them to interrupt you; but, what is almost as bad, will discover abundance of impatience, and lie upon the watch until you have done, because they have started something in their own thoughts which they long to be delivered of. Meantime they are so far from regarding what passes, that their imaginations are wholly turned upon what they have in reserve, for fear it should slip out of their memory; and thus they confine their invention, which might otherwise range over a hundred things full as good, and that might be much more naturally introduced.

There is a sort of rude familiarity, which some people, by practising among their intimates, have introduced into their general conversation, and would have it pass for innocent freedom or humour, which is a dangerous experiment in our northern climate, where all the little decorum and politeness we have are purely forced by art, and are so ready to lapse into barbarity. This, among the Romans, was the railery of slaves, of which we have so many instances in Plautus. It seemeth to have been well introduced among us by Cromwell, who, by preferring the scum of the people, made it a court-entertainment, of which I have heard many particulars, and considering all things were turned upside down, it was reasonable and judicious: although it was a piece of policy found out to ridicule a point of honour in the other extreme, when the smallest word misplaced among gentlemen ended in a duel.

There are some men excellent at telling a story, and provided with a plentiful stock of them, which they can draw out upon occasion in all companies; and, considering how long conversation runs now among us, it is not altogether a contemptible talent. However, it is subject to two unavoidable defects; frequent repetition, and being soon exhausted, so that whoever valueth this gift in himself, hath need of a good memory, and ought frequently to shift his company, that he may not discover the weakness of his fund; for those who are thus endowed, have seldom any other revenue, but live upon the main stock.

Great speakers in public are seldom agreeable in private conversation, whether their faculty be natural, or acquired by practice and often venturing. Natural elocution, although it may seem a paradox, usually springeth from a barrenness of invention and of words, by which men who have only one stock of notions upon every subject, and one set of phrases to express them in, swim upon the superficies, and offer themselves upon every occasion; therefore, men of much learning, and who know the compass of a language, are generally the worst talkers on a sudden, until much practice hath inured and emboldened them, because they are confounded with plenty of matter, variety of notions, and of words which they cannot readily choose, but are perplexed and entangled by too great a choice, which is no disadvantage in private conversation; where, on the other side, the talent of haranguing is of all others the most insupportable.

Nothing hath spoiled men more for conversation than the character of being wits; to support which, they never fail of encouraging a number of followers and admirers, who lift themselves in their service, wherein they find their accounts on both sides by pleasing their mutual vanity. This hath given the former such an air of superiority, and made the latter so pragmatical, that neither of them are well to be endured. I say nothing here of the state of dispute and contradiction, telling of lies, or of those who are troubled with the disease called the wandering of the thoughts, that they are never present in mind at what passeth in discourse; for whoever labours under any of these possessions, is as unfit for conversation as a madman in Bedlam.

I think I have gone over most of the errors in conversation that have fallen under my notice to memory, except some that are merely personal, and others too gross to need exploding, such as lewd or profane talk; but I pretend only to treat the errors of conversation in general, and not the formal subjects of discourse, which would be infinite. Thus we see how human nature is most debased by the abuse of that faculty, which is held the great distinction between men and brutes; and how little advantage we make of that which might be the greatest, most lasting, and the most innocent as well as useful pleasure of life. In default of which we are forced to take up with those poor amusements of dress and visiting; or the more pernicious ones of play, drink, and vicious amours, whereby the nobility and gentry of both sexes are entirely corrupted both in body and mind, and have lost all notions of love, honour, friendship, generosity, which, under the name of fopperies, have been for some time laughed out of doors.

This degeneracy of conversation, with the pernicious consequences thereof upon our humours and dispositions, hath been owing, among other causes, to the custom arisen, for some time past, of excluding women from any share in our society, farther than in parties at play or dancing, or in the pursuit of an amour. I take the highest period of politeness in England, (and it is of the same date in France) to have been the peaceable part of King Charles the First's reign; and from what we read of those times, as well as from the accounts I have formerly met with from some who lived in that court, the methods then used for raising and cultivating conversation were altogether different from ours; several ladies whom we find celebrated by the poets of that age, had assemblies at their houses, where persons of the best understanding, and of both sexes, met to pass the evenings in discoursing upon whatever agreeable subjects were occasionally started; and although we are apt to ridicule the sublime platonic notions they had, or personated, in love and friendship, I conceive their refinements were grounded upon reason, and that a little grain of romance is no ill ingredient to preserve and exalt the dignity of human nature, without which it is apt to degenerate into everything that is sordid, vicious, and low. If there were no other use in the conversation of ladies, it is sufficient that it would lay a restraint upon those odious topics of immodesty and indecencies, into which the rudeness of our northern genius is so apt to fall. And therefore, it is observable in those sprightly gentlemen about town, who are so very dexterous at entertaining a vizored mask in the park or the playhouse, that, in the company of ladies of virtue and honour, they are silent and disconcerted, and out of their element.

There are some people who think they sufficiently acquit themselves, and entertain their company with the relating of facts of no consequence, nor at all out of the road of such common incidents as happen every day; and this I have observed more frequently among the Scots than any other nation, who are very careful not to omit the minutest circumstances of time or place; which kind of discourse, if it were not a little relieved by the uncouth terms and phrases, as well as accent and gesture, peculiar to that country, would be hardly tolerable. It is not a fault in company to talk much; but to continue it long is certainly one; for, if the majority of those who are got together be naturally silent or cautious, the conversation will flag, unless it be often renewed by one among them, who can start new subjects, provided he doth not dwell upon them, but leaveth room for answers and replies.

THE FALL OF THE RHINE AT SCHAFFHAUSEN.

[From the Travels of Count Frederick Stolberg, translated by Holcroft. The reader having lately seen accounts of the Rhine from the pen of an English lady, may like to have a taste of it from a native German. Stolberg was an enthusiast of the Klopstock school, and became a Catholic. He and his brother Christian were both distinguished among the German literati. Of this family was the consort of Prince Charles Edward, the last Pretender, the lady who, after his death, is understood, we believe, to have been privately married to the celebrated dramatic poet, Alfieri.]

The Rhine near Schaffhausen is very beautiful, and flows over beds of rocks. In former times there certainly were warehouses here, for merchandize, brought down the stream from Bunden, Lindau, Constance, and other parts. The goods were unloaded here because of its vicinity to the fall of the Rhine. From these the town took its name. In the Switzerland, Swabian, and Austrian districts, the word Schaffen signifies to buy and sell.

In the afternoon we visited the fall of the Rhine. Oh, that I could give you an idea of this spectacle! But description, imagery, recollection itself, all sink under the task. I saw it three times, and my astonishment at the last time was as great as at the first. It amazed me now, when a man, as much as it had done when I was a youth.

I appear to have said something, and yet I have said nothing, when I relate, that the broad stream, among bold cliffs, overgrown with trees, collects its waters in a prodigious mass; which, though disturbed here and there, rises in circles of translucent green; and with thundering din, and raging impetuosity, dividing itself into three unequal cataracts, dashes headlong against the rock below; that daringly resists the ungovernable fury of the torrent. Daring, and dignified; yet not unchastized; as the deep cavities in its bed, and its perforated sides, too plainly show.

On the lowest of these high shores, to the right of the waterfall, in the territory of Schaffhausen, stands a thread-mill. Opposite to this, in the district of the Canton of Zurich, and on a very high rock, the castle of Laufen is built.

A stranger is first taken beside the thread mill; where he is suddenly surprised; and his astonishment pleasingly yet terribly excited. He is then led by a small winding path round the foot of the hill, to a circular basin of the stream; and, being there placed opposite to the waterfall, he learns, that the cataract, at which he has been amazed, is formed only by the shores and a rock that projects out of the stream, which constitutes about a fifth part of the waterfall.

Here he perceives the whole stream compressed between its rocky shores and three insulated cliffs. He is then taken into a small boat, passes the cataract on the dancing waves, and is landed on the side of Zurich. Here, below the castle of Lanfer, is a scaffolding built over the waterfall. You are obliged to wait some short time, till a small door is opened; the key of which is kept in the castle; standing immediately over the stream, and listening to its thunder. You then look down upon the terrific gulph. The imagination, overpowered, is dreadfully persuaded that it shall be hurried into the deep. No possible idea can be formed of the force of the water; or of the resistless violence with which it rushes. The poet Lenz standing here, struck his thigh, and exclaimed, Hier ist eine Wasserhülle! (Here's a water-hell!)

After a fall thus rapid, the water is projected back to a great height, forming a cloud, white and dense as the smoke of a forge, which conceals all beyond it. Every bush on the rocky shores is dripping; when the sun shines, the colours of the rainbow play in the froth and the rising vapours.

No spectacle of nature ever so fixed and seized upon my mind as this. My Sophia trembled and turned pale. My young son gazed in silent admiration at the stream; for the clouds of spray, concealing all around, it was the only visible object. We stood motionless, in a fearful, yet holy trance. I seemed as if I infinitely felt the præsens numen; the divinity, present and active. While recollecting the manifest omnipotence of God, I was overpowered with the sensation of his all-merciful love. It appeared as if the glory of the Lord passed before me; and I scarcely could forbear falling on my face and exclaiming—"Oh, Lord God, how gracious and benevolent art thou!"

We had proceeded a considerable way on our return, before we broke silence. It was not till our strong feelings began to cool that we had a transient recollection of the philosopher, who, while beholding the fall of the Rhine, asked, with cold apathy, "Of what utility is this?" A philosopher will answer when a sage will be silent,—“Man, my good sir lives not on bread alone. He has more dignified wants. While with trembling rapture he glances at nature in all her greatness, he can connect the utility of a thread-mill with the sublimity of a cataract.”

Pride and Stinginess.—No association is more common than pride and stinginess. We take from nature from real pleasures, nay from the stock of necessities, what we lavish upon opinion. One man adorns his palace at the expense of his kitchen; another prefers a fine service of plate to a good dinner; a third makes a sumptuous entertainment, and starves himself the rest of the year. When I see a side-board richly decorated, I expect the wine to be very indifferent. How often in the country, when we breathe the fresh morning air, are we tempted by the prospect of a fine garden! We rise early, and by walking gain a keen appetite, which makes us wish for breakfast. Perhaps the domestic is out of the way, or provisions are wanting, or the lady has not given her orders, and you are tired to death with waiting. Sometimes people prevent your desires, and make you a very pompous offer of everything, upon condition that you accept of nothing. You must fast till three o'clock, or breakfast with the tulips. I remember to have walked in a very beautiful park, which belonged to a lady, who, though extremely fond of coffee, never drank any but when it was at a very low price; yet she very liberally allowed her gardener a salary of a thousand crowns. For my part, I should chuse to have tulips less finely variegated, and to drink coffee whenever my appetite called for it.—Rousseau.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Cordial thanks to the Greenock Intelligencer. We are glad also to see that we are not unwelcome to the abundant and most miscellaneous pages of the Liverpool Albion.

The Musings on a Stone are highly creditable to the writer's youth; but somewhat too young at present for our columns. G. F.'s compositions do him equal credit on another score, not rendering them, however, available for our purposes.

Could Christie's Will be shortened?

The Proprietor of the Hall of Universal Information gives us capital reason for attending to his instruction, in saying that he likes us, and has our Journal regularly lying on his table; but we fear he would bring the formidable foot of the Stamp Office upon us.

We were unable to attend to J. N. at the moment, but will diligently consider his letter. Also the communications of J. D. and D. G. W. R. next week.

The letter of Mr W. L. R. was as welcome to us, as he will see his verses were. We shall not fail to notice the subject he mentions.

We shall duly consider the commendations of W. G.—y, who has our best thanks.

We should like to have found room for the facetious legalities of our friend John Capias (whether he intended them for publication or not) but fear that some of our readers would take them for another and a too-long advertisement of our Supplements. He is informed that three of the Supplements have now been published, and are to be had at all the usual places.

If the correspondent who sent us an extract from our columns, accompanied with the mention of a late eminent poet, is an honest man, we are sorry both for the mistake under which he labours, and for the deduction which he implies from it. It has been contradicted repeatedly, especially by the Editor; and as to what bitterness might still remain from his treatment by the critics, our correspondent overlooks the whole tone of this Journal, and the objects which it manifestly has in view. Besides, we have thoroughly discussed the spirit of that matter elsewhere, and distinctly settled it on a footing, which would have been approved by the excellent and generous poet himself.

An extract from the "Parterre" next week.

We were not aware of the welcome loan of the "Mirror of the Month" till just before the receipt of the second letter.

The verses sent us by J. S. do not do so much justice to his talent as his prose.

Squalliana Freckle should turn her fancy to pleasanter account.

FAIRIES.

THE word Fairy, in the sense of a little miniature being, is peculiar to this country, and is a southern appellation applied to a northern idea. It is the Fée and Fata of the French and Italians; who mean by it an imaginary lady of any sort, not of necessity small, and generally of the human size. With us, it is the Elf of our northern ancestors, and means exclusively the little creature inhabiting the woods and caverns, and dancing on the grass.

The progress of knowledge, which humanizes everything, and enables our fancies to pick and choose, has long rendered the English fairy a harmless being, rarely seen of eye, and known quite as much, if not more, through the pleasant fancies of the poets, than the earthier creed of the common people. In Germany also, the Fairy is said to have become a being almost entirely benevolent. But among our kinsmen of the north, the Swedes and Danes, and especially the insular races of Iceland and Rugen, the old opinions appear to be in force; and, generally speaking, the pigmy world may be divided into four classes.

First, the White or Good Fairies, who live above ground, dancing on the grass, or sitting on the leaves of trees—the Fairy of our poets. They are fond of sun-shine, and are ethereal little creatures.

Second, the Dark or Under-ground Fairies (the Dwarfs, Trolls, and Hill-folk of the continent), an irritable race, workers in mines and smithies, and doing good or evil offices, as it may happen.

Third, the House or Homestead Fairy, our Puck, Robin Goodfellow, Hobgoblin, &c. (the Nis of Denmark and Norway, the Kobold of Germany, the Brownie of Scotland, and Tomtegubbe, or Old Man of the House in Sweden). He is of a similar temper, but good upon the whole, and fond of cleanliness, rewarding and helping the servants for being tidy, and punishing them for the reverse.

And fourth, the Water-Fairy, the Kelpie of Scotland, and Nick, Neck, Nickel, Nickar, and Nix, of other countries, the most dangerous of all, appearing like a horse, or a mermaid, or a beautiful girl, and enticing people to their destruction. He is supposed by some, however, not to do it out of ill-will, but in order to procure companions in the spirits of those who are drowned.

All the Fairies have qualities in common; and for the most part, eat, drink, marry, and are governed like human beings; and all without exception are thieves, and fond of power. In other words, they are like the human beings that invented them. They do the same good and ill offices, are subject to the same passions, and are called good folk and good neighbours, out of the same feelings of fear or gratitude. The better sort dress in gay clothes of green, and are handsome; the more equivocal are ugly, big-nosed little knaves, round-eyed and hump-backed, like Punch, or the figures in caricatures. The latter dress in red or brown caps, which they have a great dread of losing, as they must not rest till they get another; and the Hill-folk among them are great enemies to noise. They keep their promises, because if they did not, the Rugen people say they would be changed into reptiles, beetles, and other ugly creatures, and be obliged to wander in that shape many years. The ordinary German Kobold, or House Goblin, delights in a mess of grits or water gruel, with a lump of butter in it. In other countries, as in England of old, he aspires to a cream bowl. Hear our great poet, who was as fond of a rustic supper as any man, and has recorded his roasting chesnuts with his friend Diodati.

Then to the spicy nut-brown ale,
With stories told of many a feat,
How faery Mab the junkets eat;
She was pinch'd and pull'd, she sed;
And he, by friar's lantern led;
Tells how the drudging Goblin swet,
To earn his cream-bowl duly set,
When in one night, ere glimpse of morn,
His shadowy flail hath thresh'd the corn,
That ten day-labourers could not end;
Then lies him down the lubbar fiend,
And stretch'd out all the chimney's length,
Basks at the fire his hairy strength;
And crop-ful out of door he flings,
Ere the first cock his matin rings.
Thus done the tales, to bed they creep,
By whispering winds soon lull'd asleep.

This gigantifying of Robin Goodfellow is a sin against the true Fairy religion; but a poet's sins are apt to be too agreeable not to be forgiven.* The friar with his lantern, is the same Robin, whose pranks he delighted to record even amidst the stately solemnities of Paradise Lost,—philosophising upon the nature of the Ignis Fatuus, that he might have an excuse for bringing him in.

Lead then, said Eve. He, leading, swiftly roll'd
In tangles, and made intricate seem straight,
To mischief swift. Hope elevates, and joy
Brightens his crest; as when a wandering fire,
Compact of unctuous vapour, which the night
Condenses, and the cold environs round,
Kindled through agitation to a flame,
Which oft, they say, some evil spirit attends,
Hovering and blazing with delusive light,
Misleads the amazed night-wanderer from his way
To bogs and mires, and oft through pond or pool;
There swallow'd up and lost, from succour far.
So glister'd the dire Snake.

We have remarked more than once, that the belief in supernatural existences round about us is indigenous to every country, and as natural as fears and hopes. Climate and national character modify it; parts of it may be borrowed; a people may abound in it at one time, and outgrow the abuse of it in another; but wherever human nature is to be found, either in a state of superstitious ignorance, or of imaginative knowledge, there the belief will be found with it, modified accordingly.

We shall not trouble ourselves, therefore, with attempting to confine the origin of the Fairies to this or that region. A bird, a squirrel, a voice, a tree nodding and gesticulating in the wind, was sufficient to people every one of them with imaginary beings. But creeds may oust creeds or alter them, as invaders alter a people; and there are two circumstances in the nature of the popular Fairy, assignable to that northern mythology, to which the belief itself has been traced: we mean, the smallness of its stature, and the supposition at one time prevailing, that it was little better than a devil. It is remarkable also, that inasmuch as the northern mythology is traceable to the Eastern invaders of Europe, our Fairies may have issued out of those same mountains of Caucasus, the great Kaf, to which we are indebted for the Peries and Genii. The Pygmies were supposed by the ancients to people the two ends of the earth, northern and southern, where the growth of nature was faint and stunted. In the north they were inhabitants of India, the cranes their enemies being Scythians: in the other quarters, they were found by Hercules in the desert, where they assailed him with their bows and arrows, as the Lilliputians did Gulliver, and were carried off by the smiling demigod, in the skin of his lion. Odin, the supposed Scythian or Tartar, is thought to have been the importer of the northern fables. His wandering countrymen, of the crane region, may have a higher personal acquaintance with the little people of the north, than is supposed. In the tales now extant among the Calmuc Tartars, and originating it seems in Thibet, mention is made of certain little children encountered by a wandering Khan in a wood, and quarrelling about "an invisible cup." The Khan tricks them of it in good swindling style; and proceeding onwards meets with certain Tchadhurs or evil spirits, quarrelling about some "boots of swiftness," of which he beguiles them in like manner.*

* 'Robin Goodfellow,' says Warton, 'who is here made a gigantic spirit, fond of lying before the fire, and called the lubbar-fiend, seems to be confounded with the sleepy giant mentioned in Beaumont and Fletcher's Knight of the Burning Pestle, Act iii, Sc. 1, vol. vi, p. 411, edit. 1751. There is a pretty tale of a witch that had the devil's mark about her. God bless us, that had a giant to her son that was called "Lob-lye-by-the-fire." Todd's Milton, vol. vi, p. 96. Burton, in a passage subsequently quoted, tells us, in speaking of these fairies, that there is "a bigger kind of them, called with us Hob-goblins and Robin Goodfellows, that would in those superstitious times grinde corn for a messe of milke, cut wood, or do any manner of drudgery worke." Melanct. part i, sec. 2, p. 42, edit. 1632. The tigness arose probably out of the super-human labour; but, though Milton has made fine use of the lubbar-fiend with his "hairy strength," it is surprising he should have sacrificed the greater wonder of the little potent fairy to that of a giant.

These may be chance coincidences; but these fictions are not of so universal a nature as most; and we cannot help regarding them as corroborations of the Eastern rise of our fablers of the north. We take this opportunity, before we proceed, of noticing another remarkable circumstance in the history of popular fictions; which is, that it is doubtful whether the Greeks had any little beings in their mythology. They regarded the Pygmies as a real people, and never seem to have thought of giving them a lift into the supernatural. And it may be observed, that although the Spaniards have a house-spirit which they call Duende, and Tasso, in the fever of his dungeon, was haunted with a Folletto, which is the Follet or Lutin of the French, it does not appear that these southern spirits are of necessity small; still less have those sunny nations any embodied system of fairyism. Their Fairies are the enchantresses of romance. Little spirits appear to be of the country of little people, commented on by their larger neighbours. It is true that little shapes and shadows, are seen in all countries: but the general tendency of fear is to magnify. Particular circumstances must have created a spirit a once petty and formidable.

We are of opinion, with the author of the Fairy Mythology, that the petty size of the household idols of antiquity argues nothing conclusive respecting the size of the beings they represented. Besides, they were often large as well as small, though the more domestic of them, or those that immediately presided over the hearth, were of a size suitable to convenience. The domestic idols of all nations have probably been small, for the like reason.

* See an excellent article in the "Quarterly Review," entitled Antiquities of Nursery Literature. Of similar merit and probably by the same hand (which we presume to be that of Mr Southey) is another on the Popular Mythology of the Middle Ages. We cannot refer to the volume, our copy happening to form part of a selection which we made some years ago from a bundle of the two reigning Reviews.

Whether the Lares were supposed to be of greater stature or not by the learned, it is not impossible that the constant sight of the little images generated a corresponding notion of the originals. The best argument against the smallness of these divinities is, that there is no mention of it in books; and yet the only passage we remember to have met with, implying any determinate notion of stature, is in favour of the Lares. We here give it, out of an old and not very sage author.

"After the victory had and gotten against the Gethes, the Emperor Domitian caused many shewes and triumphs to be made, in signe and token of joy; and amongst others hee invited publickly to dine with him, all sorts of persons, both noble and unno- ble, but especially the Senators and Knights of Rome, to whom he made a feast in this fashion. Hee had caused a certaine house of al sides to bee painted black, the pavement thereof was black, so likewise were the hangings, or seelings, the roofe and the wals also black; and within it hee had prepared very low room, not unlike a hollow vault or cell, full of emptie siddes or seats. Into this place hee caused the Senators and Knights, his ghests, to be brought, without suffering any of their pages or attendants to enter in with them. And first of all hee caused a little square pillar to be set near to every one of them, upon the which was written the partie's name sitting next it; by which theye hanged also a lamp burning before each seat, in such sort as is used in sepulchers. After this, there comes into this melancholicke and dark place a number of yong pages, with great joy and merriment, starke naked, and spotted or painted all over with a die or colour as blacke as inke: who, resembling these spirits called Manes, and such like idole, did leape and skip round about those Senators and Knights, who, at this unexpected accident, were not a little frighted and afraid. After which, those pages set them down at their feete, against each of them one, and there stayed, whilst certaine other persons (ordayned there of purpose) did execute with great solemnity all those ceremonies that were usually fit and requisite at the funeralls and exequies of the dead. This done, there came in others, who brought and served in, in black dishes and platters, divers meats and viands, all coloured black, in such sort that there was not any one in the place but was in great doubt what would become of him, and thought himself utterly undone, supposing he should have his throat cut, onely to give pleasure and content to the Emperour. Besides, there was kept the greatest silence that could be imagined. And Domitian himself being present, did nothing else but (without ceasing) speake and talke unto them of murders, death, and tragedies. In the end, the Emperour having taken his pleasure of them at the full, he caused their pages and lackies, which attended them without the gates, to come in unto them, and so sent them away home to their own houses, some in coaches, others in horselitters, guided and conducted by strange and unknown persons, which gave them as great cause of fear as their former entertainment. And they were no sooner arrived everyone to his own house, and had scant taken breath from the feare they had conceived, but that one of their servants came to tell them, that there were at the gates certaine which came to speake with them from the Emperour. God knows how this message made them stirre, what excessive lamentations they made, and with how exceeding feares they were perplexed in their minds; there was not any, no, not the hardiest of them all, but thought that hee was sent for to be put to death. But to make short, those which were to speake with them from the Emperour, came to no other purpose but to bring them either a little piller of silver, or some such like vessel or piece of plate (which had bene set before them at the time of their entertainment); after which, everyone of them had also sent unto him, for a present from the Emperour, one of those pages that had counterfeyted those Manes or Spirits at the banquet, they being first washed and cleansed before they were presented unto them."

Spirits of old could become small; but we read of none that were essentially little except the fairies. It was a Rabbinical notion, that angelical beings could render themselves as small as they pleased; a fancy of which Milton has not scrupled to avail himself in his Pandemonium.* It was proper enough to the idea of a being made of thought or fire; though one would think it was easier to make it expand like the genius when let loose, than be contracted into the jar or vial in the first instance. But if spirits went in and out of crevices, means, it was thought, must be taken to enable them to do so; and this may serve to account for the fairies themselves, in countries where other circumstances disposed the fancy to create them; but all the attributes of the little northern beings, its petty stature, its workmanship, its superiority to men in some things, its simplicity and inferiority in others, its supernatural practices, and the doubt entertained by its believers whether it is in the way of salvation, compire, we think, to render the opinion of M. Mallet in his "Northern Antiquities" extremely probable; viz., that the character of the fairy has been modified by the feelings entertained by our Gothic and Celtic ancestors respecting the little race of the Laplanders, a people whom they despised for their timid peacefulness, and yet could not help admiring for their industry, and fearing for their magic.

In the Edda, or northern Pantheon, the dwarfs are described as a species of beings bred in the dust of the earth, like maggots in a carcase. "It was indeed," says the Edda, "in the body of the Giant Ymer, that they were engendered and first began to move and live. At first they were only worms; but by order of the gods, they at length partook both of human shape and reason; nevertheless, they always dwell in subterranean caverns and among rocks."

Upon this passage, M. Mallet says (under correction of his translator) "We may discover here one of the effects of that ignorant prejudice, which hath made us for so many years regard all arts and handicrafts as the occupation of mean people and slaves. Our Celtic and Gothic ancestors, whether Germans, Scandinavians, or Gauls, imagining there was something magical, and beyond the reach of man in mechanic skill and industry, could scarcely believe that an able artist was one of their own species, or descended from the same common origin. This, it must be granted, was a very foolish conceit; but let us consider what might possibly facilitate the entrance of it in their minds. There was perhaps some neighbouring people, which bordered upon the Celtic or Gothic tribes; and which, although less warlike than themselves, and much inferior in strength and stature, might yet excel them in dexterity; and addicting themselves to the manual arts, might carry on commerce with them, sufficiently extensive to have the fame of it spread pretty far. All these circumstances will agree well enough with the Laplanders, who are still as famous for their magic, as remarkable for the lowness of their stature; pacific even to a degree of cowardice, but of a mechanic industry which formerly must have appeared very considerable. The stories that were invented concerning this people, passing through the mouths of so many ignorant relators, would soon acquire all the degrees of the marvellous, of which they were susceptible. Thus the dwarfs soon became (as all know, who have dipt but a little into the ancient romances) the forgers of enchanted armour, upon which neither swords nor conjurations could make any impression. They were possessed of caverns, full of treasure intirely at their own disposal. This, to observe by the by, hath given birth to one of the cabalistic doctrines, which is perhaps only one of the branches of the ancient northern theology. As the dwarfs were feeble, and but of small courage, they were supposed to be crafty, full of artifice and deceit. This, which in the old romances is called disloyalty, is the character always given of them in those fabulous narratives. All these fancies having received the seal of time and universal consent, could be no longer contested, and it was the business of the poets to assign a fit origin for such ungracious beings. This was done in their pretended rise from the dead carcase of a great giant. The dwarfs at first were only the maggots, engendered by its putrefaction: afterwards the gods bestowed upon them understanding and cunning. By this fiction the northern warriors justified their contempt of them; and at the same time accounted for their small stature, their industry, and for their supposed propensity for inhabiting caves and clefts of the rocks. After all, the notion is not everywhere exploded, that there are in the bowels of the earth fairies, or a kind of dwarfish and tiny beings, of human shape, remarkable for their riches, their industry, and their malevolence. In many countries of the north, the people are still firmly persuaded of their existence. In Ireland, at this day, the good folks shew the very rocks and hills, in which they maintain that there are swarms of these small subterranean men, of the most tiny size, but most delicate figures.

When Christianity came into the north, these little people, who had formed part of the national faith, were converted by the ordinary process into devils; but the converts could never heartily enter into the notion. Accordingly in spite of the endeavours of the clergy (which it is said, have been more or less exerted in vain to this day), a sort of half and half case was made out for them; and the inhabitants of several northern countries are still of opinion that elves may be saved, and that it is cruel to tell them otherwise. An author quoted in the Fairy Mythology, (vol. i. p. 136,) has a touching theory on this subject. We are informed in that work, "that the common people of Sweden and thereabouts believe in an intermediate class of elves who, when they show themselves, have a handsome human form, and the idea of whom is connected with a deep feeling of melancholy, as if bewailing a half-quenched hope of redemption." — "Afzelius is of opinion," says a note on the passage, "that the superstition on this point is derived from the time of the introduction of Christianity into the north, and expresses the sympathy of the first converts with their forefathers, who died without a knowledge of the Redeemer, and lay bound in heathen earth, and whose unhappy spirits were doomed to wander about these lower regions, or sigh within their mounds, till the great day of redemption."

Our old prose writers scarcely ever mention the Fairies without letting us see how they were confounded with devils, and yet distinguished from them. "Terrestrial devils," says Burton, "are those Lares, Genii, Faunes, Satyrs, Wood-nymphs, Follots, Fairies, Robin Goodfellowes, &c. which as they are most conversant with men, so they do them the most harm. Some think it was they alone that kept the heathen people in awe of old, and had so many idols and temples erected to them. Of this range was Dagon among the Philistines, Bel among the Babylonians, Astarte among the Sydonians, Baal among the Samaritans, Isis and Osiris among the Egyptians, &c. Some put our Fairies into this rank, which have been in former times adored with much superstition, with sweeping their houses, and setting of a pail of water, good victuals, and the like, and then they should not be pinched, but find money in their shoes, and be fortunate in their enterprises. These are they that dance on greens and heaths, as Lavater thinks with Tritemius, and as Olaus Magnus adds, leave that green circle which commonly we find in plains and fields, which others held to proceed from a meteor falling, or some accidental rankness of the ground; so Nature sports herself; they are sometimes seen by old women and children. Hieron Pauli, in his description of the city of Bercino (in Spain), relates how they have been familiarly seen near that town, about fountains and hills. Giraldus Cambrensis gives instance in a monk in Wales that was so deluded. Paracelsus reckons up many places in Germany, where they do usually walk in little courts some two foot long."

"Our mothers' maids have so frayed us," says gallant Reginald Scot, "with Bul-beggars, Spirits, Witches, Urchens, Elves, Hags, Fairies, Satyrs, Pans, Fauns, Syrens, Kit with the Canstik, Tritons, Centaurs, Dwarfs, Giants, Imps, Calcers, Conjurors, Nymphes, Changelings, Incubus, Robin Goodfellowes, the Spoon, the Mare, the Man in the Oak, the Hellwain, the Fire-drake, the Puckle, Tom Thumb, Hobgoblin, Tom Tumbler, Boneless,* and other such Bugs, that we are afraid of our own shadows: inasomuch that some never fear the devil but in a dark night; and then a polled sheep is a perilous beast, and many times is taken for our Father's soul, especially in a churchyard, where a right hardy man heretofore scant durst pass by night but his hair would stand upright."†

In consequence of this opinion in the popular Mythology, the merry and human-like Fairies during a degrading portion of the history of Europe, were made tools of, in common with all that was thought diabolical, to worry and destroy thousands of miserable people; but it is more than pleasant,—it is deeply interesting to an observer, to see what an instinctive impulse there is in human beings to resist

* There is a personage in Eastern history, who appears to have been of kin to this grim phenomenon. He was a sorcerer of the name of Setzeiah. He is described as having his head in his bosom, and as being destitute of bone in every part of his body, with the exception of his skull and the ends of his fingers. It was only when he was in a rage that he could sit up, anger having the effect of swelling him; but he could at no time be made to stand on his feet. When it was necessary to move him from place to place, they folded him like a mantle; and when there was occasion to consult him in the exercise of his profession, it was the practice to roll him backwards and forwards on the floor, like a churning-skin, till the answer was obtained. the growth of the worst part of superstition, and vindicate nature and natural piety. Do but save mankind from taking intolerance for God's will, and exalting the impatience of being differed with into a madness, and you may trust to the natural good-humour of the best of their opinions, for as favourable a view as possible of all with which they can sympathise. Even their madness in that respect is but a perversion of their natural wish to be liked and agreed with. The first thing that men found out in behalf of the Fairies, was that they were a good deal like themselves: the next was to think well of them upon the whole, rather than ill: and when Reginald Scot and others helped us out of this cloud of folly about witchcraft, the Fairies became brighter than before. In England, the darker notions of them almost entirely disappeared with the bigotries in church and state; and at the call of the poets, they came and adorned the books that had done them service, and became synonymous with pleasant fancies.

This subject will be concluded next week.

BALLAD SINGERS.

To the Editor of the London Journal.

I know of no object that makes me more melancholy than "Ballad Singers." Many and many a time have I stood and contemplated an individual, or a group of them, till my heart ached; and quite as often have I hurried past them, absolutely dreading the feelings they would create. In the world there is not a being more in love with song than I am—of song, that outflowing of the spirit, in which unassisted words are too weak to express all the heart feels; that divine voice which Burns sought for and found in the lovely scenes of nature, in the murmuring stream, the air-waved trees, the warble of birds, nay, in the springing flower, the dew-spangled herbage; that refined feeling which, floating on the breath of melody to the heart of hearts, carries with it a power to awaken some of the purest and most exalted sensations our being is capable of. The force of poetry, of painting, of eloquence, is great; but, clothe the beauty of verse in the appropriate notes of melody, and nothing can exceed the stirring of the best elements within us. We ascribe song to the angels; we believe it to be the most acceptable mode of addressing the Deity; and the history of the world shews its various people breathing their most exalting feelings, whether of devotion, love, or patriotism, in the shape of song.

And of all songs I love a ballad—the delightful mixture of sense with melody, which, passing through the ear to the heart, not only conveys pleasure of the most thrilling kind, but leaves us in that mood best suited to the exercise of individual friendship, or good-will to our fellow men. And yet nothing inspires me with a more melancholy feeling than the sight of Ballad Singers. It is not that their notes are "out of tune and harsh;" it is not the vulgar twang that affects me; these only reach and offend my ear—'tis the singers—'tis the ideas I attach to song that distress me. I see a poor, emaciated woman, with such remains of beauty as tell me she once might be deemed, by some happy lover, "fairest of the fair." I think of the hours in which she first exercised that talent by which she is now endeavouring to gain a morsel of bread to support her attenuated frame, or perhaps some disabled husband or sick child. I think of the delight with which her parents hailed the first attempts of a voice still good—of the applause that attended her song in her cheerful family meetings as she grew up—of the blush that mantled on her brow when first pressed to sing before the youth she most wished to please; and now, I see the downcast look, the labouring breast, the pallid cheek; and I hear the notes falling like drops of lead,—heavy, dull, trembling; the voice attempts to sing, but the heart is frozen, the music will not flow!

I once stood and listened to a street Ballad Singer of this, or rather of a superior kind, till I fancied I could trace her very history through all its windings; from its bright, sparkling start into light at its pure source, till its arrival at its melancholy "slough of Despond."

She was tall, with noble features, a dark complexion, and the largest hazel-eye I ever saw; or, perhaps, it was her wasted cheek that made it appear so—her mass of coal-black hair was immense. Her voice was sound, rich and full, and the depression of spirits under which she evidently laboured, to me, gave additional effect to the ballad she was singing. It was Carter's "O Nanny, wilt thou gang wi' me:" and never did I hear that most beautiful of all ballads better sung. But I would not hear her again! Her language was good, nay polished; her expression shewed not only a feeling heart, but a cultivated understanding. "Poor girl! Poor girl!" I exclaimed, as I turned from her; "sad has been thy fall; but thou art like the fabled Philomela, thou art melodious even after ruin!"

I walked on briskly, as if to get rid of the feelings she had raised; but it would not do: the melancholy fall of her full eye, the tones of her voice which, though rich, flowed with no free course, still possessed me.

I had passed on, upon her coming to the

"And when thy own true love shall die,"

absolutely fearing that her singing of that fine verse would make a fool of me in the public street. "Perhaps," said I, "thou wast born of gentle blood, thy mind has been cultivated, thy very air tells of better days." Fancy was awakened, and ere I got home, had painted her history. Her life, compared with her present state, appeared like the dancing of some bright stream on into the Dead Sea! Methought I saw her on her father's lawns, sporting in the frolic of childhood, listening to the warblers of the blooming shrubs, and soon endeavouring to vie with them in their wood-notes wild. I fancied the nascent talent observed and cultivated. I saw her grow up the pride of her mother, the paragon of her musical instructor, and the delight of the drawing-room. More than that, I saw the open window, still so nearly darkened by the intruding honey-suckle as almost to exclude the glimpses of the moon; and I heard the rich, round melody of her voice come gushing from amidst the flowers, and the song was love, and the arm of love encircled her waist, and the ear of love drank in intoxicating draughts of rapture! And now, the stately form was bent; the eye, though still beautiful, was like arch-angel fallen, shorn of its beams; and that voice which had made her pride, though yet breathing melody, came forth with an effort which said that the song sprang not from the heart. I shall never forget her Madonna face, nor her voice; and never since has Lord Herbert's kind compliment to the beautiful nun appeared extravagant.

The vulgar herd of singing sailors,—sailors who, in the words of Dibdin, never "knew stem from the stern of the ship,"—are not my Ballad Singers; their bellowing and state of demi-nudity make no impression upon me; but there is yet another class, which, though perhaps equally impostors with these, I never listen to without pain. I mean the poor children, who, encircling some tattered man or woman, join with their treble voices in the tuneless ditty. There was a wretched man who sang about the streets of London for years, with a dreadfully hollow voice, appearing to rise from a stomach to which food had long been a stranger, who was always surrounded by half a dozen of the poorest squalid little creatures; and yet they sang, or attempted to sing with all their might, though their cheeks were pinched by famine, and their uncovered little toes were smarting with the cold mud of the street. Reader! if thou hast, like me, some little darling Ellen, whose prattle sounds in thine ear like sweetest melody, O never pass such a group with closed hands! They may be hired, they may be impostors, but they are children, they are helpless, and they look hungry!

W. R.

AN AGED POET AND HIS YOUNG ENTHUSIAST.

[From the "Characteristics of Goethe," translated by Mrs Austen.]

WHEN Pope was a boy, he was taken, at his desire, to "have a look" at Dryden, and was gratified accordingly, by having his illustrious predecessor shewn to him as he sat in a coffee-house. One cannot help regretting that the old poet could not have been made aware of the young one. A similar feeling comes over us in reading the following letter, for though there is perhaps a little over-consciousness in it, and protestations of self-insignificance hardly natural, it is difficult not to expect that the writer will turn out an eminent man.

"With what animation and enthusiasm Goethe's aspect, (says the furnisher of the letter), even at a very advanced period of his life, inspired the young, may be seen in the following very remarkable letter of a boy of sixteen:—

Weimar, February 22, 1822.

"DEAREST FRIEND,—I should have written to you long ago, but I delayed from time to time, because I would not write till I had seen Goethe, for a glimpse of whom I had so long a desire.

"For two months I walked past his house every day; but in vain. It was indeed a great delight to me even to see his daughter-in-law with her lovely children at the window; but I wanted to see Goethe himself. One Sunday I had been taking a walk; my way home lay at the back of Goethe's house, by his garden. The garden gate stood open, and curiosity tempted me in. Goethe was not in the garden; but in a short time I saw his servant come in. I shut the garden gate for fear the man should see me.

"As I was thinking afterwards very sadly how all my endeavours to see Goethe had failed, I suddenly remarked another garden gate which likewise stood open; and as I entered at it I soon perceived that this was the neighbour's garden, the wall of which abutted on Goethe's, so that the walks of both were clearly to be seen from it. The circumstance was so propitious that I suddenly took courage, and asked the man to whom this house belonged, whether Goethe often walked in his garden, and at what time of day? He answered, every day, when the weather was fine: the hour, however, was not always the same—that often at ten o'clock, if the sun was out, the Goleimrath (Privy Councillor) was there; but that about noon, especially, he loved to be in his garden. The old gentleman held, as it seemed, with the hottest of the sunshine.

"Hereupon I questioned the good neighbour farther, to see how he stood disposed, and whether he would give me permission to visit his garden daily for half an hour, that I might see and watch the great poet—the man whom I so deeply revered.

"He answered me, quite indifferently, "Why not?—he could have no objection." It is, however, wonderful, dear friend, that people must pay a guilder to see a tiger, a bear, or a wild cat, while the sight of a Great Man, the rarest thing of the world, is to be had for nothing! I went home full of joy, and that night could not close my eyes.

"It seemed to me as if I, little dwarf as I was, had suddenly, through this hope of seeing a Great Man, grown a hand's breadth at least. The morning I thought would never come; the night seemed to me as long as a week, and longer. At length day broke, and brought the loveliest spring weather. When I saw the sunshine, I thought—this is a fine day for Goethe; and I was not mistaken.

"It was past ten when I reached the garden. He was there already, walking up and down. My heart beat violently. When I saw him, I thought I beheld Faust and Gretchen in one person, at once so gentle and so majestic did he look! I had my eyes ever fixed on him, that I might stamp his features well on my heart. And thus did I look at him a whole hour by the clock, with keen unaverted eyes, without his being once aware of me, by which, indeed, he lost nothing. When I had thus, as it were, lost myself in him, he gave me the slip, and went into the house again, and up stairs into his study, which is quite separate, with windows looking into a back court.

"Dearest friend, be well assured, Goethe's greatness manifests itself in his whole form and aspect. He is still hale and active as a man of forty. His majestic gait, his straight and lofty forehead, the noble form of his head, his fiery eye, arched nose—all about him cries aloud, Faust, Margaret, Götz, Iphigenia, Tasso, and I know not what besides. Never did I see so handsome and vigorous a man of so advanced an age.

"I see him, when the weather is fine, daily in his garden; and that is as great a delight and amusement to me as it is to others to look at busts, and fine pictures, and beautiful engravings. You may believe me or not, as you please; but when I tell you that I had rather see him than all the engravings and pictures in the world, I tell you only the pure and naked truth.

‘He usually goes up and down the garden walks with slow steps, without sitting; but often stops over against some plant or flower, and stands still, for half an hour at a time, observing or meditating. Could I but guess his thoughts and discourse with himself at such moments. Then, when he turns away from the plants and flowers, he sometimes goes to play with his sweet grandchildren.

‘I speak with Goethe through my eyes, though he sees me not; for I stand behind a hedge, hidden from him by the bushes. This all sounds very strange and romantic, but it is truly thus. And, indeed, thus is it well, and better than if I had really seen him and spoken with him,—I well know why. For suppose he condescended to talk with me, what in all the world could a boy of sixteen, like me, be to him in conversation? He talk to me! He has something better to do, indeed!

‘O, my most honoured friend, if you were but here for once, in the garden, and by my side! How happy shall I be when it is really spring, when the buds burst! Then will I diligently watch Goethe's conversation with the flowers, and the birds, and the light, in his nearer intercourse with nature; and I will write you all that I know about it, and all that I can so much as guess.

‘Yours, &c.’

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 1st, to Tuesday the 7th of October.

As flowers are now leaving us, we continue to make much of the trees. Not that we are insensible to the merits of such flowers as are left us. On the contrary, we value them more than ever; that is to say, if ever we can value at one time more than another the “rounds of the ardent marygolds,” and the “most genteel nasturtium” (as an Italian would call it), shewing its cups of refined fire amidst its drapery of curious leaves. Nasturtium is an “original” among flowers, and its elegance is equal to its peculiarity. There is a refinement in it throughout—in its colour, its leaves, and its taste. This is the flower which Linnæus's daughter discovered to emit sparks of fire on warm summer evenings. Then there is the amaranth, yellow and purple, the latter powdered with gold; and, above all, the dahlia—the splendid stranger, unknown to our ancestors, making, with its varieties, a garden by itself, the very sunset of the declining year. We are sorry we could not avail ourselves of a second opportunity, and see the magnificent shew of it, last Wednesday, at the Surrey Zoological Gardens; but we saw it in our mind's eye, and most magnificent it was.

The renewal of our acquaintance with Evelyn's “Silva” has made it impossible to us to resist giving another passage from that reverend and enthusiastic work, in which he does

HONOUR TO THE TREES.

[The passage we have marked in Italics would have done honour to any poet.]

The poets thought of no other heaven upon earth or elsewhere; for when Anchises was setting forth the felicity of the other life to his son, the most lively description he could make of it was to tell him

—— Lucis habitamus opacis,—

—— We dwell in shady groves.

And when Æneas had travelled so far to find those happy abodes,

Devenere locos lætos, et amœna vireta
Fortunatorum nemorum, sedesque beatas.

They came to groves of happy souls the rest,
To evergreens, the dwellings of the blest.

Such a prospect has Virgil given us of his Elysium; and therefore wise and great persons had always there sweet opportunities of recess, their Domos Silvae (Houses in the Wood), as we read (Kings vii. 2), which were thence called Houses of Royal Refreshment; or, as the Septuagint Οἶκος δρυῶν, not much unlike the lodges in divers of our noblemen's parks and forest-walks; which reminds me of his choice in another poem.

—— Pallas ques condidit arces

Ipse colat; nobis placeant ante omnia Sylve.

In lofty towers let Pallas take her rest,
Whilst shady groves love all things please us best.

And for the same reason Mæcenas,

Maluit umbrosam quercum—

—— Chose the broad oak.

And as Horace bespeaks them,

—— Me gelidum nemus

Nympharum que leves cum Satyris Chori

Secernunt populo—

We the cool woods above the rest advance,
Where the rough Satyrs with the light Nymphs dance.

And Virgil again,

Nostra nec erubuit Silvas habitare Thalia.

Our sweet Thalia loves, nor does she scorn
To hunt umbrageous groves.

Or as thus expressed by Petrarèh,

Silva placet Musis, urbs est inimica poetis.

—— The muse herself enjoys

Best in the woods: Verse flies the citie noise.

So true is that of yet as noble a poet of our own;

As well might corn as verse in cities grow,
In vain the thankless glebe we plough and sow;
Against th' unnatural soil in vain we strive:
'Tis not a ground in which these plants will thrive.

Cowley.

When it seems they will bear nothing but nettles and thorns of Satire, and, as Juvenal says, by Indignation too; and therefore almost all the poets, except those who were not able to eat bread without the bounty of great men, that is, without what they could get by flattering them (which was Homer and Pindar's case) have not only withdrawn themselves from the vices and vanities of the great world, into the innocent felicities of gardens, and groves, and retiredness, but have also commended and adorned nothing so much in their never-dying poems. Here then is the true Parnassus, Castalia, and the Muses; and at every call in a grove of venerable oaks, methinks I hear the answer of an hundred old Druids, and the bards of our inspired ancestors.

In a word, so charmed were poets with those natural shades, especially that of the Platanus, that they honoured temples with the names of groves, though they had not a tree about them. Nay, sometimes one stately tree alone was so revered: and of such an one there is mention of an inscription in a garden at Rome, where there was a temple built under a spreading beech-tree, sacred to Jupiter, under the name of Fagutalis.

Innumerable are the testimonies I might produce in behalf of groves and woods out of the poets, Virgil, Grætius, Ovid, Horace, Claudian, Statius, Silius, and others of later times, especially the divine Petrarch (for Scriptorum chorus omnis amet nemus), were I minded to swell this charming subject beyond the limits of a chapter. I think only to take notice that theatrical representations, such as were those of the Ionian, called Andria, the scenes of pastorals, and the like innocent rural entertainments, were of old adorned and trimmed up de ramis et frondibus, cum racemis et corymbis, and frequently represented in groves, as the learned Scaliger shews. Here the most beloved and coy mistress of Apollo rooted; and in the walks and shades of trees the noblest raptures have been conceived, and poets have composed verses which have animated men to heroic and glorious actions. Here orators, as we have shewed, have made their panegyrics, historians grave relations, and the profound philosophers have loved here to pass their lives in repose and contemplation.

Nor were the groves thus frequented by the great scholars and the great wits only, but by the greatest statesmen and politicians also. Thence that of Cicero, speaking of Plato with Clinius and Megillus, who were used to discourse de Rerum publicarum institutis, et optimis legibus, in the groves of cypress and other umbrageous recesses. It was under a vast oak, growing in the park of St Vincent, near Paris, that St Louis was used to hear complaints, determine causes, and do justice to such as resorted thither. And we read of a solemn treaty of peace held under a flourishing elm between Gisors and Treves, which was afterwards felled by the French King Philip in a rage against Henry II, for not agreeing to it. Nay, they have been sometimes known to crown their kings under a goodlie tree, or in some venerable grove, where they had their stations and conventions; for so they chose Abimaleck.—See Tostatus upon Judg. ix. 6.

The Athenians were wont to consult of their gravest matters and public concerns in groves. Famous for these assemblies were the Ceraunian, and at Rome, the Lucus Petelinus, the Valentinus, and others, in which there was held that renowned parliament after the defeat of the Gauls by M. Pomilius; for it was supposed that in places so sacred they would faithfully and religiously observe what was concluded amongst them:

In such green palaces the first kings reign'd,
Slept in their shades and angels entertained:
With such old counsellor they did advise,
And by frequenting sacred groves grew wise.
Free from th' impediments of light and noise,
Man then retir'd, his nobler thoughts employs.

Waller.

As our excellent poet has described it.

Our blessed Saviour, as we shall shew, chose the garden sometimes for his oratory—and dying, for the place of his sepulchre; and we do avouch for many weighty causes that there are no places more fit to bury our dead in than our gardens and groves, or airy fields, sub dio, where our beds may be decked and carpeted with verdant and fragrant flowers, trees, and perennial plants, the most natural and instinctive hieroglyphics of our expected resurrection and immortality; besides what they might conduce to the meditation of the living, and the taking of our cogitations from dwelling too intently upon more vain and sensual objects; that custom of burying in churches, and near about them (especially in great and populous cities,) being a novel presumption, indecent, sordid, and very prejudicial to health; for which I am sorry it is become so customary. Graves and sepulchres were, of old, made and erected by the sides of the most frequented high-ways, which being many of them magnificent structures and mausoleums, adorned with statues and inscriptions (planted about with cypress and other evergreens, and kept in repair), were not only graceful, but a noble and useful entertainment to the travellers, putting them in mind of the virtues and glorious actions of the persons buried; of which, I think my lord Verulam has somewhere spoken. However, there was certainly no permission for any to be buried within the walls of Rome, almost from the very foundation of it; for so was the Sanction XII. Tab. IN URBE NE SEPULTI REPERIRI, Uarro, “Neither to bury or burn the dead in the city;” and when long after they began to violate the law, Antoninus Pius and the emperor succeeding did again prohibit it. All we meet of ancient to the contrary, is the tomb of Cestius the Epiulus, which is a thick clumsy pyramid yet standing, sec in Urbe, sec in Orbe, as it were, but half in, and half without the wall. If then it were counted a thing so profane to bury in the cities, much less would they have permitted it in their temples; nor was it in use among Christians, who, in the primitive ages, had no particular Cemetery; but when (not long after) it was indulged, it was to martyrs only ad limina, and in the porches, even to the deposits of the apostles themselves. Princes, indeed, and other illustrious persons, founders of churches, &c. had sometimes their dormitories near the Basilicæ and cathedrals, a little before St Augustine's time, as appears by his book, De Cure pro Mortuis, and the concession was not easily obtained. Constantine, son to the great Constantine himself, did not, without leave, inhumate his royal father in the church porch of that august fabric, though built by that famous emperor: and yet after this, other great persons placed their sepulchres no nearer than towards the church walls, whilst in the body of the church, they presumed no further for a long time after, as may be proved from the Capitula of Charlemagne; nor hardly in the city till the time of Gregory the Great; and when connived at, it was complained of. We find it forbidden (as to churches) by the emperors Gratian, Valentinian and Theodosius; and so in the code, where the sanction runs thus: Nemo Apostolorum vel Martyrum Seden humanis corporibus existimet esse concessam, &c. And now, after all this, would it not raise our indignation to see so many extortioners, luxurious, profane, and very mean persons, without merit, not only affecting, but permitted to lay their carcasses, not in the nave and body of the church only, but in the very chancel, next the communion table, ripping up the pavements, removing the seats, &c. for some little gratification of those who should have more respect to decency at least, if for no other!

The fields, the mountains, the high-way sides and gardens, were thought honourable enough for those funeral purposes. Abraham and the patriarchs (as we have shewed) had their caves and criptæ in the fields, set about with trees. The kings of Judah had their sepulchres in their palaces, and not in the sanctuary and temple: and our most blessed Saviour's sepulchre was in a garden, which indeed seems to be most proper and eligible, as we have already shewed: nor even to this day do the Greek and Eastern Christians bury in churches, as is well known.

The late elegant and accomplished Sir W. Temple, though he laid not his whole body in his garden, deposited the better part of it, his heart, there; and if my executors will gratify me in what I have desired, I wish my corpse may be interred as I have bespoken them; not at all out of singularity or for want of a dormitory (of which there is an ample one annexed to the parish church), but for other reasons not here necessary to trouble the reader with, what I have said in general being sufficient. However, let them order it as they think fit, so it be not in the church or chancel.

Plato, as we noted, permitted trees to be planted over sepulchres, to obumbrate the departed; but with better reason we adorn their graves with flowers and redolent plants, just emblems of the life of man, which has been compared in Holy Scripture to those fading beauties, whose roots being buried in dishonour, rise again in glory.

Of this kind, and the like antiquity, we could multiply instances; nor is the custom yet altogether extinct in my own native country of Surrey, and near my dwelling, where the maidens yearly plant and deck the graves of their defunct sweethearts with rose-bushes, of which I have given account in the learned Mr Gibson's edition of Camden; and for the rest, see Mr Sumner "Of Garden Burial," and the learned Dr Cave's Primitive Christianity.

* At Ockley, in Surrey, there is a certain custom, observed time out of mind, of planting rose-trees upon the graves, especially by the young men and maids who have lost their lovers, so that this church-yard is now full of them. It is the more remarkable, because we may observe it to have been anciently used both among the Greeks and Romans, who were so very religious in it that we find it often annexed as a codicil to their wills, as appears by an old inscription at Ravenna, and another at Milan, by which they ordered roses to be yearly strowed and planted upon their graves. Hence that of Propertius, Lib. I. El. 2., implying the usage of burying amidst roses, "Et teneri pomeret ossa rosâ;" and old Anacreon, speaking of it, says that it does εμποις ἀμύνει—protect the dead. —Camd. Brit. vol. i., p. 236.

It is the universal practice in South Wales to strew roses and all kinds of flowers over the graves of their departed friends. Shakespeare has put the following lines into the mouth of a young prince, who had been educated, under the care of a supposed shepherd, in that part of the island:—

With fairest flowers,
Whilst summer lasts, and I live here, Fidele,
I'll sweeten thy sad grave. Thou shalt not lack
The flower that's like thy face, pale Primrose; nor
The azur'd Harebell, like thy veins; no, nor
The leaf of Eglantine; which, not to slander, Outsweeten'd not thy breath.—Cymbeline.

THE BREWER.

He comes over-night to see to the sticks and coal; and just tastes how the old ale is, and pronounces it capital. He takes a crust and a half-pint or so, to recruit his strength against the next day's work. He looks out his candles and sees whether the malt be ready ground, and in the right place. If a careful man, he also fills his copper. He is generally a man of great fore-knowledge—anticipating over-night that he shall want something to eat before breakfast in the morning. He, therefore, takes a store of provisions and a bottle of the old ale, with the key of the brew-house, to be in readiness.

The morning's work commences at two, and by the time you have arisen, he has mashed down the malt in your vessel, and the eating and drinking in his own! and is now ready for breakfast. After breakfast he lets off the wort, of which he tastes, to see how it is; and takes another pint of the old before luncheon. At luncheon he takes some cold meat and a little more of the old, and another pint between that time and dinner. Before dinner he inquires about the hops, and always advises you to have the highest in price. He generally gathers a short quantity—because (as he says) too much water spoils the beer. At dinner time the beer is ready to boil, and you are all in the fidgets lest he should let the copper boil over whilst trying another pint of the old. He has another at four o'clock, and another or two at supper.

The new beer having been set a working for the night, the next morning early the brewer is with you again to see that all is right; when he will call in two of his old cronies, Jack Drinkwater and Tom Hatemalt, to help him taste of the new. He will then ask for another pint of the old, and prepares for tunning, tasting of the new all the time, whilst you ejaculate to yourself inwardly, "I wonder how he finds room for both old and new."

A few days elapse, when he calls again to "hop down," and he takes his fee with another drop of the old, drinking your health at the same time, and wishing (you have no doubt conscientiously) that the new beer may be no worse than the old.

AN EPISODE

FROM

ONE OF GOETHE'S UNTRANSLATED NOVELS.

[We are indebted for the following story to the kindness of a friend who is conversant with German, and with the writings of the illustrious author. It is not given us as one of his best, but under the just impression, that any production of so great a writer would not be unwelcome. Much of it is indeed not unworthy of him, but the conclusion is surely otherwise unless more was intended to come of it. A mistress so much in the habit of setting her will above her considerateness, would have made but a perilous wife.]

Two neighbour children, of considerable families, a boy and a girl, of proportionate ages for being one day man and wife, were brought up together in this pleasant prospect, and the parents on both sides rejoiced in their future union. But it was soon remarked that the project appeared to miscarry; a singular aversion discovering itself between these two excellent natures. Perhaps they were too much alike. Both self-subsistent, distinct in their wishes, firm in their purposes; each individually the beloved and honoured of their playmates; ever antagonists when met together, ever building up for themselves alone, ever mutually destroying where they crossed each other, not striving towards one goal, but ever contending for one vantage; thoroughly well-disposed and estimable, and only perverse, even mischievous, in regard to one another.

This wonderful relation showed itself already in their childish sports, showed itself with their growing years. And as it is common for boys to play at war, to divide themselves into parties, and give battle to each other; so, on one occasion, did the audacious spirited girl place herself at the head of a band, and fight with so much vigour and bitterness, that the opposite party must have been shamefully put to flight, had not her personal antagonist conducted himself with great bravery, and finally disarmed his enemy, and taken her prisoner. But even then she continued to defend herself so furiously, that to preserve his eyes, and at the same time, do the fair foe no harm, he was obliged to pull the silk kerchief from his neck, and bind her hands with it behind her back.

This she never could forgive him; nay, she schemed and attempted so perseveringly in secret to do him mischief, that the parents, who had long had an eye on these strange vivacities, came to an explanation with each other, and resolved to part the two hostile beings, and renounce their favourite hopes.

The boy soon distinguished himself under his new circumstances. All kinds of instruction took effect on him. The wishes of his friends and his own inclination determined him to the military profession. Wherever he went he was loved and esteemed. His manful nature seemed to work only for the well-being and delight of others; and without being distinctly conscious of it, he was right glad at heart to have lost the only adversary nature had ever appointed him.

The girl, on the other hand, stepped at once into a new position. Her years, her increasing stature, and still more a certain inward feeling, withdrew her from the boisterous sports she had hitherto carried on in company of boys. On the whole, there seemed something wanting to her; there was nothing round her which would have been worth the hating; and loveable she had yet found no one.

A young man, older than her former neighbour antagonist, of rank, fortune, and consequence, a favourite in society, and sought after by women, fixed on her his exclusive regard. It was the first time that a friend, a lover, a servant, had made his court to her. The preference he gave her over many that were older, more advanced, with more show and pretension than herself, was highly gratifying to her. His attentions, at once constant and never importunate; his loyal support in divers unpleasant emergencies; his suit to her parents, explicit enough, yet quiet and only expectant,—for in fact she was still very young;—all this prepossessed her in his favour; besides which, habit, and their external relations, already taken for granted by the world, contributed their share. She had so often been called bride, that in the end she took herself for such; and neither to herself nor to any other did it occur that farther trial was necessary, when she exchanged rings with the individual who had so long passed for her bridegroom.

The quiet course which the whole affair had taken was not accelerated even by their betrothment. All was allowed on both sides to go on as heretofore; they rejoiced in their long joint existence, and were disposed to enjoy the present fair weather, as the vernal season of a future more earnest life.

Meanwhile the absent had cultivated himself at all points, had obtained meritorious promotion in his vocation, and came on leave of absence to visit his home. In a quite natural, yet strange manner, he again stood in the presence of his fair neighbour. She had latterly been entertaining none but friendly, bride-like, domestic sentiments; she was in harmony with all that surrounded her; she believed herself happy, and after a certain fashion actually was so. But now, for the first time after a great while, was something again opposed to her: it was not hateful, she was become incapable of hate; nay, the childish hatred, which, properly speaking, had been but a blind recognition of inward worth, expressed itself now in glad astonishment, delighted looks, obliging confessions, half willing, half unwilling, but irresistible approximation; and all this was mutual. A long separation gave occasion for long discourses. Even their former childish unreason served the now enlightened pair as an amusing remembrance; and it seemed to be regarded as a matter of necessity that they should atone at least for that mischievous hatred by all manner of kind attentions; should no longer leave their violent misunderstanding without openly expressed acknowledgment.

On the youth's side all this kept within the bounds of a wise moderation. His rank, his connexions, his pursuits, his ambition, found him such abundant employment, that he accepted the friendship of the fair bride as a grateful addition, without on that account regarding her with any personal views, or envying the bridegroom his possession; with whom he was furthermore on the best terms.

With her the case was very different. She seemed to herself awakened out of a dream. Contention with her young neighbour had been her earliest passion; and this violent contention had been, but under the form of antipathy, a violent, and as it were instinctive inclination. It even figured in her remembrance no otherwise than as though she had always loved him. She smiled at that hostile onset, sword in hand; she persuaded herself into a recollection of the pleasantest feelings, when he disarmed her; she imagined herself as having experienced the greatest bliss when he bound her; and all that she had attempted for the purpose of hurting and annoying him, now represented itself to her merely as a harmless expedient to attract his notice. She regretted that separation; she mourned the sleep into which she had fallen; she hated the stupid, dreamy habitude, through which she had realized so insignificant a bridegroom; she was perplexed, doubly perplexed, forward, backward, whichever way she viewed it.

Could any one have unravelled and taken part in her sentiments, which she kept entirely secret, he would not have been disposed to blame her: for in truth the bridegroom could not stand comparison with the neighbour for a moment, when one saw them together. If you could not refuse a certain trust to the one, the other excited your fullest confidence; if the one was an agreeable acquaintance, the other you wished for an associate; and if you thought of higher sympathies, of extraordinary accidents of fortune, there was ground to doubt of the one, where the other gave complete assurance. For such lineaments of character women have by instinct a peculiar tact; and they have reason, as well as opportunity, to cultivate it.

The more our lovely bride nourished such thoughts in her secret heart, and the less that any one was in a condition to urge what could tell to the bridegroom's advantage, what propriety, what duty seemed to counsel and command, nay, what an unalterable necessity seemed to exact beyond recall; so much the more did the tender heart indulge its partiality; and while, on the one hand, world, family, bridegroom, her own promise, were so many ties of indissoluble obligation; on the other, the aspiring youth made no secret of his thoughts, plans, and prospects, but conducted himself towards her as a faithful and never once-tender brother; and now there was even a talk of his immediate departure. Such being the posture of affairs, it seemed as though the spirit of her early childhood again awoke in her with all its splenetic violence, and now, on a higher stage angrily prepared itself for working to more serious and destructive purpose. She resolved on dying, to punish the once hated and now so violently loved, for his want of sympathy: since she could not possess him, at least she would marry herself to his imagination, to his repentance, for ever. He should never be delivered from her dead image, should never cease to reproach himself that he had not recognised her sentiments, had not investigated and appreciated them.*

This singular phrenzy accompanied her wherever she went. She consoled it under all sorts of forms, and although people perceived something singular about her, no one was attentive or discerning enough to discover the real inward cause.

Meanwhile, friends, relations, acquaintances, busied themselves in contriving all manner of festivities. Scarcely a day passed that something new and unexpected was not struck out. Scarcely was there a lovely spot in the province that had not been decorated and prepared for the reception of many joyous guests. Our young wayfarer also wished, before his departure, to perform his part, and invited the young pair, with an intimate family circle, to a pleasure excursion on the water. The party went on board a large, fine, richly ornamented vessel, one of those yachts that offer the accommodation of a small parlour and several rooms, and pretend to carry, on water, the conveniences of land.

Away they sailed, with music, up the broad river. The company, during the mid-day heat, had assembled below to amuse themselves with games of chance and skill. The young host, who never could remain inactive, had placed himself at the helm to relieve the old skipper, who, on his side, was gone to sleep; and just at that particular time our steersman, his substitute, needed all his caution, as he neared a place where two islands shortened the bed of the river, protruding their flat, gravel shores, now on this side, now on that, preparing a dangerous passage. The careful and attentive steersman was almost tempted to awake the master, but he trusted in himself, and bore towards the strait. In the same moment his fair enemy appeared on deck with a flower-garland on her hair. She took it off, and cast it towards the steersman. "Take this," she cried, "for a remembrance." "Do not disturb me," he called back to her, while he picked up the garland; "I have need of all my strength and attention." "I will disturb thee no further," she cried; "thou seest me for the last time!" So saying, she hastened to the fore deck of the ship, and sprang from thence into the water. Several voices called out "Help, help! she is drowning!" He was in the dreadfulest perplexity. At the noise awoke the old skipper; he seized the rudder; the younger resigned it to him; but it was no longer time for changing masters: the ship stranded, and, in the same instant, casting off the most cumbersome of his garments, he plunged into the water, and swam after his fair enemy.

The water is a friendly element for him who is acquainted with it, and knows how to manage it. It bore him up; and the skilful swimmer used it with mastery. He had soon reached the beauty that drifted before him; he caught hold of her, managed to raise her up, and carry her; both were violently swept along by the current till the islands and quicksands were left behind, and the river again began to flow broad and slow. And now he collected himself, and recovered from that first feeling of a pressing necessity, under the influence of which he had acted, without reflection, merely mechanically. He looked about with upraised head, and swam with all his might towards a level bushy spot, which ran out, pleasantly and commodiously, into the river. There he brought his fair prize on dry land; but no breath of life was to be traced in her. Despairing, his eyes lighted on a foot-path, leading through the thicket. He loaded himself with the dear burden anew; he soon descried, and reached a solitary dwelling. There he found worthy people, a young married pair. The mischance, the extremity of the case, declared itself in a moment. A bright fire burned; woollen coverlids were laid on a bed; furs, fleeces, whatever warm thing was in the house, were quickly brought. Nothing was left undone to call the fair, half-stript, half-naked body back into life. It succeeded. She unclosed her eyes; she espied her friend; she embraced his neck with her heavenly arms. In this position she remained a long time. A stream of tears gushed from her eyes, and completed her cure. "Wilt thou leave me," she exclaimed, "when I thus find thee again?" "Never," he cried; "never!" and he knew not what he said or did. "But spare thyself," he added; "spare thyself! Have consideration on thyself, for thine own sake and mine."

She now collected herself, and remarked for the first time the condition she was in. She could not be ashamed before her darling, her saviour; but she willingly let him go, that he might look after himself; for the clothes he had on were still drenched and dripping.

The young couple consulted with each other. He presented the youth, and she the lady, with their respective wedding apparel, which still hung there all complete, equipping them in right bridal fashion from head to foot. In a short time our two adventurers were not merely clothed, but full dressed. They looked quite charmingly; they stared at each other when they came together: and, with excessive emotion, yet unable to help a sort of glad laughter at their masquerade, fell passionately into each others' arms. Youth, health, and love, made it seem as if they had undergone no danger, no anguish.

To have passed from water to earth, from death to life, out of the family circle into a wilderness, out of despair into extacy, out of indifference into inclination and passion, all in an instant,—the mere head would not have been adequate to comprehend it, or to endure it. In such case the heart must do its best, that so great a surprise may be borne.

Quite lost in one another, it was some time before they could bring themselves to think of the anxiety, the cares of those they had left behind; and hardly could they themselves think without anxiety of the manner in which they should again meet them. "Shall we fly—shall we hide ourselves?" said the youth. "We will remain together," said she, hanging about his neck.

The countryman, who had heard the story of the stranded boat, hastened without further question towards the shore. The vessel came safely sailing along; it had been with much trouble got loose. They proceeded on at a venture, in hope of again finding the lost ones. When the countryman had with cries and signs attracted the notice of those on board, he ran to a point where an advantageous landing-place presented itself, and ceased not making signals and calling out, till the vessel turned in towards the shore; and what a spectacle was it when they landed! The parents of the two lovers pressed first to the shore. The loving bridegroom had well nigh lost his wits. Scarcely had they heard that the dear children were in safety, when they, in their strange masquerade, slipped, as it were, out of their coppice. No one recognised them, until they were close at hand. "What do I see?" cried the mothers. "What do

I see!" cried the fathers. The saved cast themselves on their knees before them. "Your children!" exclaimed the pair. "Pardon!" cried the damsel. "Give us your blessing!" cried the youth. "Give us your blessing!" cried both, while the spectators all remain mute in astonishment. "Your blessing!" resounded for the third time, and who could have refused it?

DR JOHNSON'S FATHER.

THE following curious memorandum is from a new provincial magazine, published at Worcester, and entitled the Analyst. We are heartily glad to see such a publication, and congratulate it on the great improvement manifested in its second number.

Dr Johnson's father seems to have been "a good fellow;" and as for that matter, so was his illustrious son, for all his dogmatical ways. The document before us, even though upon a matter of business, is full of bon homie. And what renders it more interesting, is, that you see in it some evidences of the tracks of reading that helped to influence the character of his son. Sons, in truth, are made up, more or less, of the character of their parents and other predecessors, with ulterior modifications, of course; but still always with an indelible reference to those first causes. A book on the parental relationships of men of genius is a desideratum. It would be an addition, not merely to the curiosities of biography, but to the groundworks of moral and social knowledge.

The father of Dr Samuel Johnson, the celebrated Lexicographer, is well known, in early life, kept a book-stall in Lichfield, and attended on market days, as was then customary, the neighbouring towns. There was, a few years ago, a copy of one his original sale catalogues, in the possession of Thomas Fernyhough, Esq. of Peterborough, from which the following title of the catalogue, and Mr Johnson's address to his customers, are extracted:—

"A Catalogue of choice Books in all Faculties, Divinity, History, Travels, Law, Physic, Mathematicks, Philosophy, Poetry, &c. together with Bibles, Common Prayers, Shop Books, Pocket-books, &c., also fine French Prints for Staircases and large Chimney Pieces, Maps, large and small. To be sold by Auction, or he who bids most, at the Talbot in Sidbury, Worcester, the sale to begin on Friday, the twenty-first this instant March, exactly at six in the afternoon, and continue till all be sold. Catalogues are given out at the place of sale, or by Michael Johnson, of Lichfield.

"CONDITIONS OF SALE.

"I. That he who bids most is the buyer, but if any difference arise which the company cannot decide, the book or books to be put to sale again.

"II. That all the books, for aught we know, are perfect; but if any appear otherwise before taken away, the buyer to have the choice of taking or leaving them.

"III. That no person advance less than 6d. each bidding, after any book comes to 10s. nor put in any book or set of books under half value.

".. Note.—Any gentleman that cannot attend may send his orders, and they shall be faithfully executed.

"To all Gentlemen, Ladies, and others, in and near Worcester. I have had several auctions in your neighbourhood, as Gloucester, Tewkesbury, Evesham, &c. with success, and am now to address myself, and try my fortune with you. You must not wonder that I begin every day's sale with small and common books; the reason is, a room is sometime a-filling, and persons of address and business, seldom coming fast, they are entertained till we are full; they are ever the last books of the best kind of that sort, for ordinary families and young persons, &c. But in the body of the Catalogue you will find Law, Mathematicks, History, and for the learned in Divinity, there are Drs South, Taylor, Tillotson, Beveridge, and Flavel, &c. the best of that kind; and to please the Ladies I have added store of fine pictures and paper hangings; and by the way I would desire them to take notice that the pictures shall always be put up by noon of that day they are to be sold, that they may be viewed by daylight. I have no more but to wish you pleased, and myself a good sale, who am,

"Your humble servant,
"M. JOHNSON."

* These impulses, which are painted with great truth, are surely very unamiable, and do not warrant the air of prospective comfort and security given to the end of the story.—ED.

POISONING AT A FEAST.

In the following extract, the simultaneous progress of the courtly feasting and deathly sin are mingled and contrasted in so skilful a manner, that its necessary length has not deterred us from introducing it to our readers.

Sigismund Augustus, King of Poland and Grand Duke of Lithuania, had married Barbara Radziwill, a Lithuanian lady, much against the approbation of a great part of his Polish subjects; still more against the wishes of his mother, Bona Sforza, a sort of inferior Catherine de Medicis. He manages, however, to quiet all opposition, and she becomes the crowned Queen of Poland. A young friend of hers is to be betrothed to a nobleman in her suite, and the new Queen and the King interest themselves greatly in the ceremony. An old noble, Peter Kmita, Grand Marshal, originally one of the Queen's severest opposers, but now quite reconciled to his mistress, shews his friendly zeal by begging that the entertainment to be made on the occasion may be permitted to take place at his castle; and, accordingly, he has the honour of receiving the young couple and their royal friends.

A banquet is laid out in the hall, and the servants are in waiting; the pages are expecting their high-born masters and mistresses. Among the latter is young Lacki, a youth who had formerly, at the peril of his life, saved the young Queen from the fury of a urochs, or bison. Since then he has concealed a hopeless and most respectful passion for her, and is now, to his great grief, about to be removed to a higher post than the loved office of cup-bearer to his honoured mistress. While these people are still waiting, a fellow, a discarded servant of old Kmita (the master of the castle), now belonging to the Queen-mother, is observed officiously bustling about the hall. He is a notorious rascal; and Kmita coming into the hall, orders his willing servants to turn him out. The fellow first bullies, then begs to whisper a word to the Grand Marshal. Kmita listens, looks sorely displeased, but molests him no more. The guests enter, and the feast begins.

The company entered the banquetting hall, preceded by the Seneschal of Kmita's household, who held uplifted his ebony staff, ornamented with a silver head. Queen Barbara advanced with the King on her right hand, and on her left Kmita, on whose arm she was slightly leaning. Immediately after her came the Queen-mother, between the Duke of Prussia and the Court Marshal Firley; the Princess of Mazovia was conducted by the Duke of Pomerania, and her daughter by the Prince of Brandenburg, and by her betrothed, the Starost of Samborz. The rest of the company proceeded according to their respective ranks. The Bishop of Cracow, in whose diocese the castle of Wisnietz was situated, said grace, and the guests sat down in the order of precedence in which they entered. When the first course was over, the curtains which concealed the ornamental dishes were withdrawn at a signal from the master of the house, and displayed a great number of sugar ornaments and sweetmeats, arranged in form of different animals, towers, trees, &c. every one having either the initials of Sigismund Augustus and Barbara, or the arms of Poland and Lithuania. Before each of the royal and princely personages was placed a basket wrought in gold, and filled with little slices of bread, and a similar one of silver, for every four of the other guests. The most distinguished of the company had napkins of gold and silver brocade, and the others of silk, all which became after the repast the property of the attendants, according to the custom of the time. At the commencement of the dinner, when the first dish was presented to the King, the Grand Marshal, who stood behind the chair of his master, took the golden dish from the hands of his Seneschal, and dipped into it a bit of bread, which, having tasted, he cast it into a large silver basket, held by a servant, and with a deep obeisance presented it to the King. Some noblemen belonging to his household performed the same service for the Queens. When Sigismund Augustus had finished eating, the Grand Marshal took a richly wrought cup, poured a little of its contents into the hollow of his hand, tasted it, and after having wiped his hand, presented the cup to the monarch. Whilst the King was drinking all the company arose from their places, but reseated themselves immediately after, except Kmita, who continued standing. The Queen and the other ladies declined the cups, conformably to the custom, which, at that time, permitted them to drink only pure water and a decoction of orange-flowers or chicory, except at toasts, when was allowed them to sip a little Malmsey. The King then begged the master of the house to give himself no more trouble, but to partake of the meals he had provided for his guests. This was a sign that etiquette should be no longer observed, and an invitation to convivial mirth and hilarity.

When Kmita, following the monarch's command, took a place opposite to him, the restraint which till now had pervaded the assembly began to disappear, and many a jest was heard between the clattering of bowls and dishes. Even the Queen-mother seemed to partake of the general hilarity that reigned at the table, and lent herself with apparent good humour to the lively conversation which the King endeavoured to maintain; she even addressed herself sometimes to Barbara; and the King, whose heart was always open to every kind feeling, began to cherish the hope that time, necessity, and habit, would overcome by degrees the animosity which embittered his domestic happiness. The young Queen partook less of this agreeable illusion, for women do not easily deceive their own sex; she would not, however, destroy the delusive joy in which she saw that her husband was indulging himself, and answered Bona's address with animation and courtesy.

"We pity the ladies," said Sigismund Augustus, after the conversation had lasted some time, "that they are obliged to forego the best seasoning of a cheerful repast, the most powerful enemy to care and anxiety, one which shews the character in its true light, and banishes all grief from the oppressed soul. Corpo di Bacco! our lady queen resembles not in this respect the ladies of her ancestors, who, till the time of Wladislaw Jagellon, quaffed at the festivals of Lada horns filled with mead, as well as their fathers and brothers." "And even were it the custom now, I could no longer follow it," answered Barbara, laughing, "since through the affection of my sovereign and spouse I have lately become a Polish woman by name, though I have long been so in my heart. The Polish ladies despise the gifts of Bacchus, as we have now proof in the example of the first among them, her majesty our lady mother, and our princely cousins." "Oh, you must not speak of our little cousin Helena," exclaimed Sigismund Augustus; "she has now to do with another duty, and a more dangerous one, too, than that which lurks in this cup, which I will empty in silence to her welfare." "Your majesty anticipates us," interrupted Bona: "it is not yet time for the Vinea, and we will join in it also to honour the young lady of Podolia." "My royal lord," said Helena, bowing, "if I should express the feeling of my heart by drinking, I might easily fall into a suspicion of ingratitude; but if your majesty commands, I shall do my best, if my mother will permit my doing to day a thing so unusual." "You are leaving to day in some respects my jurisdiction," answered the Princess of Mazovia, in a manner sufficient to damp the real or apparent hilarity which reigned in the assembly; "so you are entitled to make any use of your new liberty which seems good, either to you, or to those who had graciously offered to take my place with you." Barbara perceived a light cloud on the brow of her husband, and exclaimed in a merry tone, "We must not permit our excellent host to suppose we have slighted his liquors, and the lady of Podolia will forgive her daughter if she follows the example given by the queens. Is it not true, my lord duke," said she, addressing the Duke of Prussia, "that in your country the ladies entirely abandon to the gentlemen the worshipping of Bacchus, as we do in Poland?" "Your majesty is right," answered Albert of Brandenburg, with great courtesy; "in our country also the ladies devote themselves only to the service of the powerful deity of love, though perhaps his shafts are not so sharply pointed as they are in this country, whilst we are often obliged to invoke the assistance of the other deity, in order to gain resolution for supporting the cares of life." The conversation continued in the same strain; many compliments were exchanged among the company, of which the betrothed lovers and the young Lacki received their full share. The bravery of the page was mentioned in the most honourable manner, and the king, as well as the young queen, frequently expressed to him, by flattering allusions, that it was for the last time he now performed his present office, and that he should be immediately exalted to a higher rank, as a reward of the repeated proofs of his fidelity. Meanwhile the banquet drew nearly to a close, the desert was placed on the table, and the moment arrived when the solemn toasts were to be pledged. Kmita arose from his seat, in order himself to present the great cup to the monarch; the seneschal lifted his staff, the trumpeters prepared themselves for the mighty blast which was to be sounded when the king should approach the cup to his lips, and the pages kept themselves in readiness to fulfill the orders of the ladies. Barbara turned to Lacki, and said, "Sir Lacki, may it please you to take this trouble once more, it is the last time that you will have to serve us in this capacity."

The pages hastily passed into the room where the sideboards were placed, in order to fill the goblets destined for the use of the ladies. Stanislaw Lacki was going to pour the contents of the flask he had guarded with so much care into the little cup we have described, after having first carefully wiped it with a fine clean linen. The golden drops were already sparkling on the glittering metal, when on a sudden he felt himself pushed so violently that a part of the costly liquor, contained in the cup, he held in his hand was spilt on the ground. He looked angrily around, and saw standing before him the very man whom Kmita had been on the point of treating in so unceremonious a manner; he appeared quite unconcerned, and instead of making the slightest excuse to the page for his awkwardness, he stared on him with an air of stupid insolence. Lacki was going to scold him for his impertinent behaviour, when he addressed him in the following manner: "Ay, my pretty lordling, you make but a sorry cup-bearer; every one may see by the awkward manner in which you perform the service that you were not born for it. You high-born lordlings may understand how to drink, but to manage the cup handsomely is something quite different." The irritated page was going to answer this speech with a hard blow, and his comrades, attracted by the noise, were ready to join him in giving a good thrashing to Wacław Siewrak, who seemed to be purposely created for that kind of amusement, when the first blast of the bugles resounded in the great hall, and all the pages hastened to their duty.

Wacław Siewrak's assurance increased when he found himself left almost alone with Lacki, who holding fast his flask and cup, threatened him with words, and he exclaimed in a most insolent tone of voice, "Strike, only strike! it is nothing extraordinary that two servants are fighting with each other, and you wear a livery as well as I do." "Down, our!" cried Lacki, "or thou shalt repent it." "What shall I repent?" retorted Siewrak, with a stammering voice, and drawing closer to the page; "for a fight with fists I am a match with every one, but your little sword is to-day out of the question; for it is royal peace, and I suppose you have no wish to lose your little white hand." The youth's anger now got the better of him; he set down the flask and cup which he held in his trembling hands, and accosting his boorish antagonist in a menacing attitude, said, "Be ware, low-born knave, that I forget not that it is beneath a nobleman to bandy blows with such a mean scoundrel as thou art, and that I do not give thee a cut to match that red scar which is on thy ugly face, and one that will not be cured until thou art hanged." "I have told you once, high-born Sir Page, that cuts are to-day out of the question," replied the other; "we are not now amongst bushes, where a worthy lord's servant may catch anything of that, in a manner he himself knows not how. Only do your duty, and if you do not understand it let me teach it to you." And saying these last words, he stretched out his hand towards the little flask. His scar, and his mention of the bushes, brought back to Stanislaw's memory the affair in the gardens of Lobzou, and a sudden idea crossed his mind that he might be the same man that he had then cut over the face. He pushed back the impertinent fellow with all his strength, and laid his hand upon his little sword; but before he was able to draw it, Siewrak overturned his flask, so that all its contents were spilt on the ground, and laughing aloud, he left the hall reeling, but quickening his steps as soon as he had passed the door. Lacki was so carried away by the desire of inflicting an exemplary punishment on the mean fellow who had taunted him, that he forgot his duty for a moment, and ran after him with his drawn sword; but the object of his wrath soon disappeared in the maze of the winding corridors.

It was with much trouble that the young Lacki found his way through the winding corridors to the room he had left; and when he had entered it all the attendants had disappeared, and the goblet of his royal mistress was gone. Vexed to the utmost by so untoward an event, and puzzled what to do, he approached the door of the banquetting hall, supposing that one of his fellow-pages was performing his neglected duty; but he saw that all the company, with goblets in their hands, were waiting for his queen, who stood without having a cup, and visibly surprised at his absence. How could he excuse the neglect of a duty which, as the queen had graciously signified to him, he was now performing for the last time. An idea flashed on his mind that all this rash behaviour of the apparently drunken fellow was nothing but an arranged trick to get possession of the cup entrusted to his care; he therefore returned once more to pursue the thief, in order to bring him with the cup, as the best means of excusing his negligence. He was now, however, no more fortunate than he had been before, and met with nobody in the intricate corridors through which he passed. The blasts of the bugles which resounded from the banquetting-hall bewildered him entirely, by the idea that they were waiting for him; he completely lost his way, and ran like a madman through many passages and staircases till he found himself in a gallery with a door at each end of it. He chose one of them at random, and entering it found himself in a little hall, which led to an apparently dark room by a door which was not quite closed.

He was going to open it, in hopes to find somebody who would set him right, when he heard two voices conversing in a foreign language. He stopped for a moment, and heard some very strange words uttered in Italian. "Make haste," said one of the voices, sounding hollow, as if out of a vault, and trembling, as if the jaws of the speaker were chattering with cold: "Make haste, I say; it is cold here below as on the top of Etna; make haste, in the name of the devil, that I may return to the daylight." "Directly, directly," replied the other, who, judging by the sound, seemed to be nearer, and who till now was muttering something to himself, "have a little patience, if you wish me to count the drops. Seven, eight." "Eleven," said the first person; "eleven—not a single drop more nor less; this time it has succeeded well, and the old woman has provided the right thing, which she does not always do; but hasten to finish it, for who knows but this cursed page may come; your servant is a dolt, who does things only by halves, and it is cold here as in a grave." "Eight, nine, ten," continued the other.—"In the grave you will have it, perhaps, much warmer, my learned master." "Do you not hear something rustling, Assano? It sounds as if the sand on the pavement was pressed by some light footsteps." "Eleven." It sounded again. "Now it is ready, take it."

At this moment Stanislaw peeped into the dark room, and saw a withered trembling arm stretched from the cellar below, as if to receive something. "Your hand shakes so that you will spill it," said Assano, who was standing outside: "hasten, hasten, ere the page gets loose. Do you hear the blast of trumpets?" Saying this, he turned, and Lacki saw the cup of Barbara trembling in his hand. With one spring the page stood in the middle of the room close to the opening of the cellar, and the arm which had been stretched out from it immediately disappeared. He ascended in a bold manner the old man, who stared on him with a look glaring with fury, and said, "What are you doing, ye rake-hells?" "Wherefore have the evil stars led thee hither, thou son of misfortune? What dost thou seek here?" retorted Assano. "My queen's goblet!" exclaimed the youth: "that is it; give it me directly, or fear my sword!" "Fear thee, boy!" answered Assano, with rage and scorn; and having placed the goblet on the ground with his right hand, seized the page with his left, and pressed him with a gigantic force. Stanislaw sought in vain to make use of his weapon; in vain he struggled to free himself from the iron grasp of the hoary villain; he could only utter some words of complaint and threatening from his suffocating breast. A double edged knife glittered in the Neapolitan's hand, and it was instantly plunged up to the hilt in the bosom of the young Lacki, whose complaints died away in a low murmur, and the flush of anger which covered his cheeks turned into a deadly paleness. Still he whispered in a scarcely audible voice, "Farewell, Hippolyte! Barbara, farewell!" The eyes of the faithful Stanislaw closed in death, his tender limbs hung powerless in the clutch of the assassin, who bent over the lifeless body, and whispered in his ear, "Thou wert called Lacki, I think. Go then, and when thou seest thy father, tell him that thou also hast known Hassan, although half a century later than he!" "Blood! blood again!" resounded from the cellar, in an agonizing voice, "give, give it me quickly, for I cannot remain longer in this place of horror." "Take it, cowardly wretch," replied Assano; "this boy's death has greatly increased our reckoning." He then seized the still warm corpse by its flowing hair, and dragged it to the door of the cellar, and threw it into the deep pit.

Meanwhile Kmita pledged the usual toast—"The welfare of the king and of the royal family;" and custom required that the monarch should answer it by pledging the health of the master of the house, and that of the senate and of the equestrian order; but Barbara was still waiting with increasing surprise for her goblet. The music played continually to fill the unexpected pause, and a large circle of distinguished personages closely surrounded the young queen, when an arm dressed in her colours, blue and silver, reached the long expected goblet out of the crowd. Barbara being in a great hurry, paid no attention to the person by whom it was presented; the bugles sounded a blast; the king expressed his thanks to the master of the house, and his wishes to him, to the senate, and to the equestrian order. The queens and his nephew Albert of Brandenburg joined him in these complimentary expressions; the bugles sounded again, and the cups were quaffed.

Other toasts followed during a quarter of an hour, when at last Sigismund proposed the health of the affianced couple, in which he was joined by every one, except the princess of Mazovia. Barbara arose from her seat and went up to the bride, who had just perceived with great anxiety that her betrothed had absented himself; she embraced Helena, expressing her cordial wishes for the happiness which she herself had so much promoted; when at that moment her arms suddenly lost their strength, and fell down powerless from the embrace; her head leaned on Helena's shoulder, and her discoloured lips whispered,

"Hold me, Helena, I am strangely unwell." The amazed bride exerted herself to support the swooning queen, when her mother accosted her, saying, "It seems that her Majesty is unwell; it is necessary to call for her women, who will understand how to take care of her better than you do." The crowd and the noise which reigned in the hall had for a moment prevented the king from seeing what had occurred to Barbara; but when Lucy Ostrorog, who hastened to the assistance of her mistress, burst out into a cry of terror, he flew to his beloved, and embracing, pressed her to his heart. "I am ill, my husband," said Barbara, in a whisper; "I feel myself very ill—ill unto death." Sigismund Augustus was plunged into the greatest consternation; his eye caught the grand marshal; but he saw on his countenance the unfeigned expression of astonishment and displeasure; he then cast down his eyes on her whom he held in his arms, as if afraid to direct a look of suspicion to another side.

ARTHUR'S SEAT.

Dear hill, thou ever in my heart shalt rest
Deeper than sleeps thy shadow in the lake
In the dewy morning, ere the breeze doth wake
The darkling ripple o'er its glossy breast;
In memory's haunted mirror shalt thou dwell;
Thine is the green—the daisy-sprinkled zone,
The many-tinted ever-shifting throne
Of gorgeous clouds—the playthings of the gale.
Oh! not for these I love thee; thou art dear,
Dearer than words can utter; that you woe
All tender thought and feeling on this sod,
The bright feet of the beautiful have trod,
The blue-eyed maiden hath been straying here—
Here the fair presence my heart's slumber broke.

A LONG DESIDERATUM, APPARENTLY WELL SUPPLIED.

[From the Parterre, a cheap and elegant new weekly publication, embellished with excellent wood-cuts. We are glad to echo the opinion expressed by the editor relative to Mr Guilford's fitness for his task, as manifested by the above extract.]

The Beauties of Beaumont and Fletcher. By Horace Guilford. Birmingham; Wrightson and Webb; and Simpkin and Marshall, London.—"Another batch of beauties!" exclaims some sour-featured critic, "there is no end to these mutilations of our best authors!" True, there have been many attempts to cull for the use of the indolent, or those who cannot read much for want of leisure, the beauties which abound in the works of our poets and dramatists. But by whom has this been performed? Generally by persons whose reason and judgment are far below the standard of those for whom they presume to select. It is not so with the compiler of this little tome: his writings shew him to be a gentleman of much good taste and sound judgment; and in this selection he has given additional evidence of the possession of both these qualities; but hear what he says for himself, and the motives which induced him to turn compiler.

"It was in the depth of the last winter night, when November and December were sailing by in all their paraphernalia of gloom, and rain, and wind,—when the fire-place surpasses the sun in warmth, and the clean hearth the meadows in beauty,—that I took up Beaumont and Fletcher in the evenings, deeming their volumes no incongruous accompaniments to the roaring of the storm, and the chuckling flame that went merrily up the old chimney.

"At first I contented myself with noting in pencil lines the parts that struck me by their grandeur, their pathos, and their wit, or by the fidelity and force with which they illustrated the tone and colouring of that gorgeous pageant of society, the Elizabethan and Stuart periods.

"These and similar passages, however, grew so rapidly on my hands, that I had recourse to a common-place book, and began right earnestly to transcribe each passage as it pleased me.

"Then it was, and while kindling with the splendid and endless procession of fine things which appeared and passed by, that I began to notice with disgust the foul unsightly creatures that mingled with them, and, in many places, almost obscured them.

"The most deliberate outrages upon delicacy, the most wanton exuberance of obscenity, unutterable abominations of language and conception, and an absolute wallowing in the sty of impurity, are all so interwoven with the several Plays, as to defy even the skill of a Bowdler himself; and must ever render the productions of Beaumont and Fletcher a sealed book, such as no father of a family could conscientiously put into the hands of his children.

"Such it might have remained for me, had I not been irresistibly impressed by the conviction, that there was by far too vast a preponderance of good to be overcome of evil.

"That conviction was the sole origin of this little publication; whether the cause was adequate or not those who read must decide. There were rubies, and emeralds, and diamonds thick sown upon a cloth of frieze; I have ventured to pluck them away, with little care for their uncomely ground-work, and to wreath them into a carcanet, which may sparkle before the purest eyes that ever shone in kindred rays."

Our readers will not hesitate to acknowledge, that he who could write thus was well qualified for the task he has so ably performed. "Horace Guilford" has, indeed—to borrow the motto from his title-page—heaped together

"Infinite riches in a little room."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Cordial thanks to the Western Luminary (Exeter).

S.'s letter unfortunately came too late for its purpose. But he surely need not regret it. Such an error would not be heeded amidst so much good matter. Correspondents are requested to bear in mind, that we must have their communications a fortnight before they can reckon with certainty upon our ability to give them attention. We are obliged to be considerably before-hand with our day of publication.

E. B. in our next. We are happy to have suggested some walks to him, and do hereby take them with him in imagination, whether in mud or meadow.

We have received a little volume by John and Mary Saunders, in which there are passages of true poetry. We shall take a speedy opportunity of giving it further notice.

H. B., who wrote the letter respecting Ghosts, wishes to say, "by way of postscript," that the following passage from Coleridge interprets his feelings on the subject more nearly than his letter appears to have done:—

Ordonio. Believe you then no supernatural influence?

Believe you not that spirits throng around us?

Teresa. Say rather that I have imagined it
A possible thing;—and it has soothed my soul
As other fancies have, but ne'er seduced me
To traffic with the black and frenzied hope
That the dead hear the voice of witch or wizard.

Remorse, act iii, sc. 1.

We shall probably have more than one occasion to notice the distinction which our Correspondent makes between Good Nature and Good Temper, and which certainly exists, though we are glad to see his fair friends think otherwise; for of course we are bound to construe their identification of the terms, on the charming side.

We have but just become aware of the lines by "H. C." They shall receive the proper attention.

The Kent Herald says, that the heroine of a correspondent's ballad, entitled Betty Bolaine, which appeared in the London Journal a week or two back, was one of the "worthies of Canterbury," and that she left an immense property to one of the Prebendaries of the cathedral of that city.

An accident has obliged us to omit "The Romance of Real Life" intended for our present Number.

Giving Pain.—In the application of evil for the production of good, never let it be applied for the gratification of mere antipathy; never but as subvenient to, and necessary for the only proper ends of punishment, the deterrent of others by example. In the interest of the offender, reformation is the great object to be aimed at; if this cannot be accomplished, seek to disable him from inflicting the like evil on himself and others. But always bear in mind the maxim which cannot be repeated too often:—Inflict as much and no more pain than is necessary to accomplish the purpose of benevolence. Create not evil greater than the evil you exclude.—Bentham's Deontology.

FAIRIES.

It may be agreeable to follow up the growth of this good-humoured light in something like chronological order. The old romances began it. Oberon, the beautiful and beneficent, afterwards king of the fairies, made his appearance very early. He is the Elberich, or Rich Elf, of the Germans, and became Oberon, with a French termination, in the romance of "Huo de Bourdeaux." The general reader is well acquainted with him through the abridgment of the work by the Count de Tressan, and the Oberon of Wieland, translated by Mr Sotheby. He is a tiny creature, in the likeness of a beautiful child, with a face of exceeding loveliness; and wears a crown of jewels. His cap of invisibility, common to all the Fairies (which is the reason why they must not lose it) became famous as the Tarn-Kappe, or Daring Cap, otherwise called the Nebel or Mist-Cap, and the Tarn-hut, or Hat of Daring.* In the poem of the German Voltaire, he possesses the horn, which sets everybody dancing. He and his brother dwarfs, of the northern mythology, are the undoubted ancestors of the fallen but illustrious family of the Tom Thumbs, who became sons of tailors and victims of cows. Of the same stock are the Tom Hickathrifts and Jack the Giant-Killer, if indeed they be not the gods themselves, merged into the Christian children of their former worshippers. Their horrible coats, caps of knowledge, swords of sharpness, and shoes of swiftness, are, as the Quarterly Reviewer observes, "all out of the great heathen treasury." Thumb looks like an Avatarkin, or little incarnation of Thor. Thor was the stoutest of the gods, but then the gods were little fellows in stature, compared with the giants. In a chapter of the Edda, from which the Reviewer has given an amusing extract, the giant Skrymner rallies Thor upon his pretensions and size, and calls him "the little man."† As the god nevertheless was more than a match for these lubbers of the skies, his worshippers might have respected the name in honour of him; a panegyricall rallery not unknown to other mythologies, nor unpractised towards the "gods of the earth."‡ The West of England, it may be observed, is a great Fairy country, though even the miners and their natural darkness have not been able to obscure the sunnier notions of Fairy-land, now prevailing in that quarter as much as any. The De-

* Tarn, from taren, to dare (says Dohenell), because they gave courage along with invisibility. Kappe is properly a cloak, though the tarn-kappe or nebel-kappe is generally represented as a cap or hat.—Fairy Mythology, vol. ii. p. 4. Perhaps the word cape, which may include something both of cap and cloak, might settle their apparent contradiction. Hood implies both; and the goblin is sometimes called Robin Hood, and Hoodekin.

† In the agreeable learning which the reviewer has brought to bear on this subject, in the Antiquities of Nursery Literature, he has deprived us of our old friend the giant Cormoran, who turns out to be a mistake of the printer's devil for Corinoran, "the Corineus, probably, of Jeffery of Monmouth and the Brut." However, a printer's devil has a right to speak to this point; and we cannot help thinking that Cormoran ought to be the word both on account of the devouring magnitude of the sound, and its suitability to the brazen tromp of a Cornish mouth—

Here's the valliant Cornish man,
Who slew the giant Cormoran.

Abraham Cann or Polkinghorn ought to speak it; or the descendants of the Danish hero Kolson, who have ora rotunda in that quarter.

‡ Little Will, the scourge of France,
No godhead but the first of men;—

says Prior, speaking of William the 3d., and rebuking, at the same time, Boileau's dedications of Louis. So Frederick or Napoleon, or both, were called by their soldiers "the Little Corporal."

[From the Steam-Press of C. & W. REYNELL, Little Pultney-street.]

vonshire Pixies or Pucksies, are the reigning elves, and are among the gayest and most good-humoured to be met with. Mr Coleridge, in his juvenile poems, has put some verses into their mouths, not among his best, but such as he may have been reasonably loth to part with. The sea air which he breathed at a distance, and "the Pixies' Parlour" (a grotto of the roots of trees, in which he found his name carved by the hands of his childhood, were proper nurseries for the author of the Ancient Mariner.

Chaucer's notion of Fairies was a confused mixture of elves, and romance-ladies, and Ovid, and the Catholic diablerie. We had taken his fairies for the regular little dancers on the green (induced by a line of his to that effect in the following passage); but the author of the Fairy Mythology has led us to form a different opinion. The truth is, that a book in Chaucer's time was a book, and everything to be found in those rare authorities became a sort of equal religion in the eyes of the student. Chaucer, in one of his verses, has brought together three such names as never met, perhaps, before or since,—"Samson, Turnus, and Socrates." He calls Ovid's Epistles "the Saint's Legends of Cupid." Seneca and St Paul are the same grave authorities in his eyes; in short, whatever was written was a scripture; something clerical, and what a monk ought to have written if he could. His Lady Abbess wears a broach exhibiting a motto out of Virgil. Elves, therefore, and Provençal Enchantresses, and the nymphs of the Metamorphoses, and the very devils of the Pope and St Anthony, were all fellows well met, all supernatural beings, living in the same remote regions of fancy, and exciting the gratitude of the poet. He is angry with the friars for making more solemn distinctions, and displacing the little elves in their walks; and he runs a capital jest upon them, which has become famous.

"In olde dayes of the kinge Artour,
Of which that Britons speke gret honour,
All was this land full filled of faerie;
The Elf-queene, with her joly compaignie,
Danced ful oft in many a grene mede.
This was the old opinion as I rede,
I speke of many hundred yeres ago;
But now can no man see non elves mo,
For now the grete charitee and prayeres
Of limitoures and other holy freres,
That serchen every land and every streame,
As thikke as motes in the sonne-beme,
Blissing halles, chambres, kichenes, and boures,
Citees and burghes, castles highe and toures,
Thropes and bernes, shepenees and dairies,
This maketh that ther ben no faeries;
For ther as wont to walken was an elf,
Ther walketh now the limitour himself,
In undermeles and in morwenings,
And sayth his matines and his holy thinges,
As he goth in his limitation.
Women may now go safely up and down;
In every bush and under every tree,
Ther is non other incubus but he."

In another poem, we meet with Pluto and Proserpine as the King and Queen of Faerie; where they sing and dance about a well, enjoying themselves in a garden, and quoting Solomon. The "ladies" that wait upon them are the damsels that accompanied Proserpine in the vale of Enna, when she was taken away by his Majesty in his "griesly cart." This is a very different cart from a chariot made of the gristle of grasshoppers.

The national intellect, which had been maturing like an oak, from the time of Wickliffe, drawing up nutriment from every ground, and silently making the weakest things contribute to its strength, burst forth at last into flowers and fruit together, in the noon-day of Shakspeare. A shower of fairy blossoms was the ornament of its might. Spenser's fairies are those of Romance, varied with the usual readings of his own fancy; but Shakspeare, the popular poet of the world, took the little elfin globe in his hand, as he had done the great one, and made it a thing of joy and prettiness for ever. Since then the fairies have become part of a poet's belief, and happy ideas of them have almost superseded what remains of a darker creed in the minds of the people. The profound playfulness of Shakspeare's wisdom, which humanized everything it touched, and made it know its own value, found out the soul of an activity, convertible into good, in the restlessness of mischief; and Puck, or the elf malicious, became jester in the Court of Oberon the Good Fairy,—his servant and his help. The "Elves" in the Tempest are rather the elemental spirits of the Rosicrucians, confounded both with classical and popular mythology. It is in the 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' that the true fairies are found, as they ought to be; and there amidst bowers and moonlight, will we indulge ourselves awhile with their company. We make no apology to the reader for our large quotations. They have been repeated many times, and lately on the present subject; yet we should rather have to apologise for the omission, considering how excellent they are. To add what novelty we could, or rather to make our quotations as peculiar to our work as possible, we had made up our minds to bring together all the passages in question out of Shakspeare's drama, as far as they could be separated from other matter, and present them to our readers under the title of a Fairy Play; but we began to fear that the profane might have some colour of reason for complaining of us, and accusing us of an intention to swell our pages. We have, therefore, confined ourselves to selections which are put under distinct heads, so as to form a kind of gallery of Fairy pictures. We shall take the liberty of commenting as we go, even if our remarks are called forth on points not immediately belonging to the subject. It is not easy to read a great poet, and not indulge in exclamations of fondness. Besides there is something fairy-like in having one's way.

EMPLOYMENT OF A DAMSEL OF THE FAIRY COURT.

Fairy. Over hill, over dale,
Thorough bush, thorough briar
Over park, over pale,
Thorough flood, thorough fire,
I do wander every where,
Swifter than the moon's sphere;
And I serve the fairy queen,
To dew her orbs upon the green:
The cowslips tall her pensioners be;
In their gold coats spots you see;
Those be rubies, fairy favours:
In those freckles live their favours;
I must go seek some dew-drops here,
And hang a pearl in every cowslip's ear.

Flowers, in the proper fairy spirit, which plays betwixt sport and wisdom with the profoundest mysteries of nature, are here made alive, and turned into fantastic servants.

In Fairy-land whatever may be, is. We may gather from this and another passage in Cymbeline, that Shakspeare was fond of cowslips, and had observed their graces with delight. It is a delicate fancy to suppose that those ruby spots contain the essence of the flower's odour, and ~~was~~ present them their ruling sprite. And the hanging a pearl in every cowslip's ear (besides the beauty of the line) seems to pull the head of the tall personages sideways, and make him ~~again~~ ^{again} ~~sensitively~~ ^{sensitively} ~~conscious~~ ^{conscious} of his new favour.

FLOWER OF QUEEN TITANIA.

I know a bank whereon the wild thyme blows,
Where ox-lips and the nodding violet grows;
Quite over-canopied with lush woodbine,
With sweet musk-roses, and with eglantine;
There sleeps Titania, some time of the night,
Lull'd in these flowers with dances and delight.

What beautiful lines are these? Observe in the next the goggle-eyed owl, who is nightly astonished at the Fairies, as if amazement were his business; and also the child-like warning to the snails and daddy long-legs, to keep aloof.

THE QUEEN IN HER BOWER.

Tita. Come, now a roundel, and a fairy song;
Then, for the third part of minute, hence;
Some to kill cankers in the musk-rose buds;
Some war with rear-mice for their leather wings,
To make my small elves coats; and some keep back
The clamorous owl, that nightly hoots and wonders
At our quaint spirits: sing me now asleep;
Then to your offices, and let me rest.

SONG.

1st Fairy. You spotted snakes, with double tongue,
Thorny hedge-hogs, be not seen;
Newts and blind-worms do no wrong;
Come not near our fairy queen.

Chorus. Philomel, with melody,
Sing in our sweet lullaby;
Lulla, lulla, lullaby; lulla, lulla, lullaby;
Never harm, nor spell nor charm,
Come our lovely lady nigh,
So, good night, with lullaby.

2d Fairy. Weaving spiders come not here;
Hence, you long-legged spinners, hence;
Beetles black, approach not near;
Worm, nor snail, do no offence.

Chorus. Philomel, with melody, &c.

1st Fairy. Hence, away; now all is well.
One, aloof, stand sentinel.

TRICKS OF THE FAIRY KING ON HIS QUEEN.

Titania, by practice of Oberon, falls in love with a weaver, on whom Puck has clapped an ass's head. Enter Puck with him and some others. Imagine the weaver to be Liston.

Quince. O monstrous! O strange! we are haunted. Pray, masters! fly masters! help! (Exeunt Clowns.)

Puck. I'll follow you, I'll lead you about, around,
Through bog, through bush, through brake, through brier;

Sometime a horse I'll be, sometime a hound,
A hog, a headless bear, sometime a fire,
And neigh, and bark, and grunt, and roar, and burn,
Like horse, hound, hog, bear, fire, at every turn.

Bot. Why do they run away? this is a knavery of them to make me afraid.

Re-enter Snout.

Snout. O Bottom, thou art changed! What do I see on thee?

Re-enter Quince.

Quin. Bless thee, Bottom! Bless thee! thou art translated.

Bot. I see their knavery: this is to make an ass of me, to fright me if they could. But I will not stir from this place, do what they can: I will walk up and down here, and I will sing, that they shall hear I am not afraid.

The ouzel-cock, so black of hue,
With orange-tawny bill;
The thrush with his note so true,
The wren with little quill.

Tita. What angel wakes me from my flowery bed?

Bot. The finch, the sparrow, and the lark,
The plain-song cuckoo gray,
Whose note full many a man doth mark,
And dares not answer, nay;

for, indeed, who would set his wit to so foolish a bird?—who would give a bird the lie, though he cry cuckoo never so?

Tita. I pray thee, gentle mortal, sing again:
Mine ear is much enamoured of thy note,
So is mine eye enthralled to thy shape;
And thy fair virtue's force perforce doth move me,
On the first view, to say, to swear, I love thee.

Bot. Methinks, mistress, you should have little reason for that: and yet, to say the truth, reason and love keep little company together now-a-days: the more the pity, that some honest neighbours will not make them friends. Nay, I can gleek upon the occasion.

Tita. Thou art as wise as thou art beautiful.

Bot. No so, neither: but if had wit enough to get out of this wood, I have enough to serve mine own turn.

Tita. Out of this wood do not desire to go;
Thou shalt remain here whether thou wilt or no.

I am a spirit of no common rate;
The summer still doth tend upon my state,
And I do love thee: therefore, go with me;
I'll give thee fairies to attend on thee;
And they shall fetch thee jewels from the deep,
And sing, while thou on pressed flowers dost sleep;
And I will purge thy mortal grossness so,
That thou shalt like an airy spirit go.
Peas-blossom! Cobweb! Moth! and Mustard-seed!

1st Fairy. Ready.

2nd Fairy. And L.

3rd Fairy. And I.

4th Fairy. Where shall we go?

Tita. Be kind and courteous to this gentleman;
Hop in his walks and gambol in his eyes;
Feed him with apricocks, and dewberries;
With purple grapes, green figs, and mulberries;
The honey-bags steal from the humble-bees,
And, for night-tapers, crop their waxen thighs,
And light them at the fiery glow-worm's eyes.
To have my love to bed, and to arise;
And pluck the wings from painted butterflies,
To fan the moonbeams from his sleeping eyes:
Nod to him, elves, and do him courtesies.

1st Fairy. Hail mortal!

2nd Fairy. Hail!

3rd Fairy. Hail!

4th Fairy. Hail!

Bot. I cry your worship's mercy, heartily. I beseech your worship's name.

Cob. Cobweb.

Bot. I shall desire of you more acquaintance, good Master Cobweb: If I cut my finger, I shall make bold with you. Your name, honest gentleman?

Peas. Peas-blossom.

Bot. I pray you remember me to Mistress Squash, your mother, and to Master Peascod, your father. Good Master Peas-blossom, I shall desire of you more acquaintance too. Your name, I beseech you, sir?

Mus. Mustard-seed.

Bot. Good Master Mustard-seed, I know your patience well: that same cowardly, giant-like, ox-beef hath devoured many a gentleman of your house: I promise you, your kindred hath made my eyes water ere now. I desire of you more acquaintance, good Master Mustard-seed.

Tita. Come wait upon him; lead him to my bower.
The moon, methinks, looks with a wat'ry eye;
And when she weeps, weeps every little flower,
Lamenting some enforced chastity.
Tie up love's tongue, and bring him silently.

The luxurious reduplication of the rhyme in this exquisite passage has been noticed by Mr Hazlitt.

Again, in act the fourth:—

Tita. Come, sit thee down upon this flow'ry bed,
While I thy amiable cheeks do coy,
And stick musk-roses in thy sleek smooth head,
And kiss thy fair large ears, my gentle joy.

Bot. Where's the Peas-blossom?

Peas. Ready.

Bot. Scratch my head, Peas-blossom: Where's Monsieur Cobweb?

Cob. Ready.

Bot. Monsieur Cobweb; good Monsieur, get your weapons in your hand, and kill me a red hipp'd humble-bee on the top of a thistle; and good Monsieur, bring me the honey-bag. Do not fret yourself too much in the action, Monsieur: and good Monsieur, have a care the honey-bag break not; I would be loth to have you overflow with a honey-bag, Signor. Where's Monsieur Mustard-seed?

Mus. Ready.

Bot. Give me your neif, Monsieur Mustard-seed. Pray you, leave your courtesy, good Monsieur.

Mus. What's your will?

Bot. Nothing, good Monsieur, but to help Cavalero Cobweb to scratch. I must to the barber's Monsieur; for methinks I am marvellous hairy about the face: and I am such a tender ass, if my hair do but tickle me I must scratch.

Tita. What wilt thou hear some music, my sweet love?

Bot. I have a reasonable good ear in music: let us have the tongs and the bones.

Tita. Or say, sweet love, what thou desirest to eat.

Bot. Truly a peek of provender; I could munch your good dry oats. Methinks I have a great desire to a bottle of hay; good hay, sweet hay, hath no fellow.

Tita. I have a venturous fairy that shall seek the squirrel's hoard, and fetch thee new nuts.

Bot. I had rather have a handful or two of dried peas. But, I pray you, let none of your people stir me; I have an exposition of sleep come upon me.

Tita. Sleep thou, and I will wind thee up my arms.
In my arms, my arms, my arms,
And be all ways away,
And do the wood-birds the sweet honey-suckle
Mostly entreat, the female insect
Enrings the barks fingers of the elm.
O, how I love thee! how I dote on thee!

THE FAIRIES BLESS A HOUSE AT NIGHT-TIME.

Enter Puck.

Puck. Now the hungry lion roars,
And the wolf howls the moon;
Whilst the heavy ploughman snores,
All with weary task fordone.
Now the wasted brands do glow,
Whilst the scritch-owl, scritch'ing loud,
Puts the wretch, that lies in woe,
In remembrance of a shroud.
Now it is the time of night,
That the graves, all gaping wide,
Every one lets forth his sprite,
In the church-yard paths to glide:
And we fairies that do run
By the triple Hecate's team,
From the presence of the sun,
Following darkness like a dream,
Now are frolick; not a mouse
Shall disturb this hallow'd house;
I am sent, with brooms, before,
To sweep the dust behind the door.

Enter Oberon and Titania with their Train.

Oberon. Through this house give glimmering light,
By the dead and drowsy fire:
Every elf, and fairy sprite,
Hop as light as bird from brier;
And this ditty, after me,
Sing and dance it trippingly.
Tita. First, release this song by rote,
To each word a warbling note,
Hand in hand, with fairy grace,
Will we sing, and bless this place.

SONG AND DANCE.

Oberon. Now, until the break of day,
Through this house each fairy stray.
To the best bride-bed will we,
Which by us shall blessed be;
And the issue, there create,
Ever shall be fortunate.
So shall all the couples three Ever true in loving be;
And the blots of nature's hand
Shall not in their issue stand:
Never mole, hare-lip, nor scar,
Nor mark prodigious, such as are Despised in nativity,
Shall upon their children be.
With this field-dew consecrate,
Every fairy take his gait!
And each several chamber bless,
Through this palace with sweet peace:
E'er shall it in safety rest,
And the owner of it be blest.
Trip away;
Make no stay;
Meet me all by break of day.

It is with difficulty that in these, and indeed in all our quotations, we refrain from marking particular passages. One longs to vent one's feelings, like positive grappling with the lines; and besides, we have the temptation of the reader's company to express our admiration. But we fear to do injustice to what we should leave unmarked; and indeed to be thought impatient with the others. Luckily where all is beautiful, the choice would often be difficult, if we stopped to make any; and if we did not, we should be printing nothing but Italics.

Queen Mab, as the author of the 'Fairy Mythology' remarks, has certainly dethroned Titania; but we cannot help thinking that both he, and the poets who have helped to dethrone her, are in the wrong; and that Voss is right, when he rejects the royalty of both monosyllables. Queen or Quean is old English for woman, and is still applied to females in an ill sense. Now Mab is the fairies' midwife, plebeian by office, indiscriminate in her visits, and descending so low as to make elf-locks, and plait the manes of horses. We have little doubt that she is styled queen in an equivocal sense, between a mimicry of state and something abusive; and that the word Mab comes from the same housewife origin as Mop, Moppet, and Mob-cap. The a was most likely pronounced broad; as in Mall for Moll, Malkin for Maukin; and Queen Mab is perhaps the Quean in the Mob-cap,—the midwife riding in her chariot, but still vulgar: and acting some such part with regard to fairies and to people's fancies, as one of Sir Walter Scott's fanciful personages (we forget her name) does to flesh and blood in the novel.

The passages in Ben Jonson regarding Fairies want merit enough to be quoted; not that he had not a fine fancy, but that, in this instance, as in some others, he overlaid it with his book-reading, probably in despair of equalling Shakspeare. The passages quoted from him by the author of the 'Fairy Mythology,' rather out of respect than his usual good taste, are nothing better than so many common-places, in which the popular notions are set forth. There is, however, one striking exception, out of the 'Sad Shepherd':—

There, in the stocks of trees, white fays do dwell,
And span-long elves, that dance about a pool
With each a little changeling in their arms.

This is very grim, and to the purpose. The changeling supernaturally diminished adds to the ghostliness, as if born and completed before its time.

For our next quotation, which is very pleasant, we are indebted, amongst our numerous obligations, to the same fairy historian. There is probably a good deal of treasure of the same sort in the rich mass of Old English poetry; but the truth is, we dare not trust ourselves with the search. We have already a tendency to exceed the limits assigned us; and on subjects like these we should be tolled on from one search to another, as if Puck had taken the shape of a bee. The passage we speak of is in Randolph's pastoral of 'Amyntas, or the Impossible Dowry.' A young rogue of the name of Dorylas 'makes a fool of a fantastique shepherd,' Jocastus, by pretending to be Oberon, King of Fairy." In this character, having provided a proper retinue (whom we are to suppose to be boys) he proposes a fairy husband for Jocastus's daughter, and obliges him by plundering his orchard. We take the former of these incidents for granted, from the context, for we have not seen the original. Dorylas appears sometimes to act in his own character, and sometimes in that of Oberon. In the former, the following dialogue takes place between him and his wittol; descriptive of

A FAIRY'S JOINTURE.

Thestylis. But what estate shall he assure upon me?
Jocastus. A royal jointure, all in Fairy land.

Dorylas knows it.

A curious park—

Dorylas. Paled round about with pickteeth.

Joc. Besides a house made all of mother of pearl.

An ivory tennis-court.

Dor. A nutmeg parlour.

Joc. A sapphire dairy-room.

Dor. A ginger hall.

Joc. Chambers of agate.

Dor. Kitchens all of crystal.

Am. O, admirable! This it is for certain.

Joc. The jacks are gold.

Dor. The spits are Spanish needles.

Joc. Then there be walks—

Dor. Of amber.

Joc. Curious orchards—

Dor. That bear as well in winter as in summer.

Joc. 'Bove all, the fish-ponds, every pond is full—

Dor. Of nectar. Will this please you? Every grove Stored with delightful birds.

Dorylas proceeds to help himself to the farmer's apples, his brother rogues assisting him. This license, it must be owned, is royal. But what is still pleasanter, we are here presented for the first time with some fairy Latin, and very good it is, quaint and pithy. The Neapolitan Robin Good-fellow, who goes about in the shape of a little monk, might have written it.

FAIRIES ROBBING AN ORCHARD, AND SINGING LATIN.

Dor. How like you now my grace? Is not my countenance

Royal and full of majesty? Walk not I
Like the young prince of pigmies? Ha! my knaves, We'll fill our pockets. Look, look yonder, elves;
Would not yon apples tempt a better conscience
Than any we have, to rob an orchard? Ha!
Fairies, like nymphs with child, must have the things
They long for. You sing here a fairy catch
In that strange tongue I taught you, while myself
Do climb the trees. Thus princely Oberon
Ascends his throne of state.

Elves. Nos beata Fauni proles,
Quibus non est magna moles,
Quamvis lunam incolamus,
Hortos sæpe frequentamus.

Furto cuncta magis bella,
Furto dulcior puella,
Furto omnia decora,
Furto poma dulciora.

Cum mortales lecto jacent,
Nobis poma noctu placent;
Illa tamen sunt ingrata,
Nisi furto sint parata.

We the Fairies blithe and antic,
Of dimensions not gigantic,
Though the moonshine mostly keep us,
Oft in orchards frisk and peep us.

Stolen sweets are always sweeter;
Stolen kisses much completer;
Stolen looks are nice in chapels;
Stolen, stolen be your apples.

When to bed the world are bobbing,
That's the time for orchard robbing;
Yet the fruit were scarce worth peaking,
Were it not for stealing, stealing.

Jocastus's man Bromio prepares to thump these pretended elves, but the master is overwhelmed by the condescension of the princely Oberon in coming to his orchard, when

His Grace had orchards of his own more precious Than mortals can have any.

The elves therefore, by permission, pinched the officious servant, singing

Quoniam per te violamur,
Ungues hic experiamur;
Statim dicis tibi datam
Cutem valde variatam.

Since by thee comes profanation,
Taste thee, lo! scarification.
Noisy booby! in a twinkling
Thou hast got a prettifying crinkling.

Finally, when the coast is clear, Oberon cries,

So we are clean got off: come, noble peers
Of Fairy, come, attend our royal Grace.
Let's go and share our fruit with our Queen Mab
And the other dairy-maids: where of this theme
We will discourse amidst our capes and cream.

Cum tot poma habeamus,
Triumphos læti jam canamus:
Faunos ego credam ortos,
Tantum ut frequentent hortos.

I, domum, Oberon, ad illas,
Que nos manent nunc ancillas,
Quarum osculemur sinum,
Inter poma, lac, et vinum.

Now for such a stock of apples,
Laud me with the voice of chapels.
Fays, methinks, were gotten solely
To keep orchard-robbing holy.

Hence then, hence, and let's delight us
With the maids whose creams invite us,
Kissing them, like proper fairies,
All amidst their fruits and dairies.

We must beg the reader's indulgence for one more paper on this subject.

Caution to Dogmatic Deniers. Progress of Knowledge.—Previous to the establishment of the rotundity of the earth, and during the centuries of discussion which took place upon this point, the existence of the antipodes was the theme of constant ridicule in the mouths of the opposers of the globular figure. The sentiments of Lactantius, De Falso Sapientid, cap. 23, may be taken as a fair specimen of the common objections. He asks, is there any one foolish enough to think that there are men whose feet are higher than their heads? with whom those things that we place upon the earth, hang downwards from the earth? who have trees and vegetables turned upside down? and rain and snow falling the wrong way? Will any one henceforward place the hanging gardens among the seven wonders of the world, when the philosophers make hanging seas, and fields, and mountains! The confusion that here takes place between the words upwards and downwards will be now universally apparent, but was not so in the time of Lactantius, who lived A.D. 311; who, had he simply confined himself to the assertion, that the existence of antipodes could not be demonstrated, and treated it as a philosophical speculation, possibly true, but probably false, would have been justified by the general state of knowledge then existing. But not so when he asserts that he can prove the thing to be impossible, and professes that he sees no alternative, but supposing its professors to be joking, or intentionally lying. The French Encyclopædia is incorrect in stating that he appeals to the sacred writers as deciding the point.—Penny Cyclopædia.

CALLANT AND AFFECTION CONSIDERED OF MR GALT'S LITERARY AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

(Just Published.)

I HAVE thus undervalued to give an account of my separate publications to the best of my recollection, and also something of the feeling which I entertain myself towards them: I do not say cherish, because I doubt if I could do so justly, and because some of them have been preferred by the public more than others, which I seriously think have been consigned to unmerited neglect.

Before considering the materials of this particular lucubration, I had no right notion of having attempted so much: I had kept no account of my essays, nor do I know even where many of my novels may be found; yet those who see with what rapt ardour I enter into a subject, can have no idea that, after the task is finished, I could ever become so indifferent to the result.

It is not, however, altogether owing to this indifference that I have been led apparently to undervalue the mere literary character. Many years ago,

"A change came o'er the spirit of my dream" of life, and I was moved to desire, rather than to make books from topics designed by others, to furnish a topic for myself. I cannot state when this happened, but the place and occasion are still vividly in remembrance. I was reading in the Lazaretto of Messina the life of Alfieri, and was prodigiously affected by the incidental observation, where he remarks that the test of greatness is the magnitude of a man's undertaking to benefit the world. The truth descended on me like inspiration. I rose agitated from my seat, and could think of nothing all the remainder of the day, but of corroborative circumstances. Since that time I have ever held literature to be a secondary pursuit—the means of recording what has been done; and thus, although a voluminous author, I cannot persuade myself how in that way I should have ever merited the distinction to which I aspired, or attained the glittering goal towards which my hopes struggled.

The sentiment of Alfieri did not, however, cause me to enter a new line of life; but it elevated my motives, and lent energy to the impulses by which I was actuated, for I had previously determined, as I have narrated, to be distinguished; it only made me observe, that distinction without benevolence was unworthy of a rational being's pursuit. The creation of books did not appear to me to fall within the scope of his sublime idea of greatness; and therefore I conceive that, although few authors have published, in so short a time, more various productions, I have not earned, estimated by his test, which I think the true one, any claim to a better reward than is due to indefatigable exertion. However, I am not the first in whom the desire of fame has been greater than the talent to acquire it. From my earliest recollection, both by meditation and action, I have been devoted to what I thought the accomplishment of useful purposes, and my chief recompense is the satisfaction, undoubtedly, of my own bosom. Yet my efforts, I think, have not been altogether ineffectual, and the consciousness if this emboldens me to say, that I must be much misunderstood by those who imagine that the pressure of disease, and the embraces of poverty, could darken the cheerfulness of mind in reflecting that I have not been ordained in vain. A pining sickly expression, no doubt, often escapes me, but I am in the habitual practice of uttering what I think, and it may indulgently be called to mind, that in addition to being deprived of locomotion and rendered helpless, I often suffer anguish and merciless pain to a degree that ought to be allowed in extenuation of this human offence. I do not, however, always repine, and I can look on the moral green around me, though I see arid spots here and there, with comparative complacency and pleasure, as I repeat a sentiment of my aspiring years.

"Benevolence is like the generous sun
Whose free impartial splendour fosters all;
It is the radiance of the human soul,
The proof and sign of its celestial birth.
All other creatures of corporeal ore
Partake the common qualities of man;
Love, hatred, anger, all particular aims;
But in that infinite and pure effusion,—
That only passion of divinity,—
He owns no rival but the Heavenly God."

Antonie.

* Surely there have been books, than which nothing greater or more serviceable to man was ever by man created. What does our author say to his friend Shakspeare? to the great poets in general? to Newton, Bacon, and a hundred others?—Ed.

Judgment of Books.—I have no other rule by which to judge of what I read, than that of consulting the dispositions in which I rise up from my book; nor can I well conceive what sort of merit any piece has to boast, the reading of which leaves no benevolent impression behind it, nor stimulates the reader to any thing that is virtuous or good.—Rousseau.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

It is proper to state, that we have no other authority for the following story than that of the fair unknown, who has sent it us; but we take for granted, from the style of her letter, that she is, in every sense of the word, "fair;" and this is one of the reasons why we have not thought fit to alter it. We need not add how delighted we are with her approbation, nor that we cordially agree with the remarks which accompany her quotation from Burns.

Mrs Garrick was brought into the English world under the patronage of Lord Burlington, as a Mademoiselle Violette, a dancer. She had great reputation in her art, and was very handsome. Horace Walpole somewhere manifests the delicate distress he suffered under (poor man,) in being asked by a brother patrician, in a large party, who she was. He was obliged to confess that she was 'a dancer;' that is to say, that they had a beautiful young lady in their company, who had talents enough to earn herself a livelihood by charming the world.

XXXVIII.—THE LIFE OF A YOUNG JACOBITE SAVED BY MRS GARRICK.

DEAR SIR,—Be not surprised at so familiar an address from a stranger, for, although I may be, and am, a stranger to you, you are not a stranger to me, but, on the contrary, an old and well known friend, with whose modes of thought and feeling I am intimately acquainted, although I have never seen your face, nor heard your voice. I am not very old (I may yet call myself two years on the sunny-side of thirty), but for by far the greater part of my life, I have been an admiring and sympathising reader of yours.

Judge then of my joy at hearing of the first appearance of the London Journal, which (even in my remote habitation, a little "nook of mountain ground" in green Erin,) I managed to procure immediately, and which it delights me to find every way worthy of the name it bears.

After all this preamble, it is time I should get to the real business of my letter, which is to offer you a true story, which I think not unworthy a place amongst your "Romances of Real Life." I shall give it to you as nearly as I can in the words of the person who related it to me, now some years since, when it made a very strong impression on my mind.

My informant, Mr N., was related on the mother's side to an ancient Catholic family named Wilding, of the North of England. In the rebellion of 1715, this family were steady in their loyalty to the house of Hanover, so much so, that when the rebel army approached the town (either Preston or Carlisle) in which they resided, they fled from it with the other Loyalists. However, the family mansion, being one of the largest in the place, was made use of by the rebels as their head quarters. When the rebels were driven out, Mr Wilding's mansion was again seized by the triumphant army, and maugre his representations, and the absolute proofs he produced of his loyalty, was totally dismantled, and much valuable property carried off, whilst his complaints were unheeded; and, being a Catholic, he could get no redress.

Such a reward for loyalty was not likely to increase it in the bosoms of the sufferers; the injury rankled in their hearts; and when the Pretender's standard was again hoisted in 1745, among the first who flocked to it was the then head of the family (son to the loyalist of 1715) with his only son, a fine boy of fifteen.

The disastrous results of that ill-fated undertaking are well known. Among the prisoners taken and condemned to death, was young Wilding; but through the interest of the Earl of Burlington, then Secretary of State, the young man received a pardon, on condition of banishing himself for life to the North American Colonies, where he entered the army, and was some years after killed in a skirmish with the Indians—being the last male descendant of his ancient family.

These facts were communicated by an old maiden grand-aunt, a sister of young Wilding, to Mr N., when about going for the first time to London, with a strict charge to procure an interview with the late Mrs Garrick, to whose intercession with Lord Burlington, whose natural daughter she was supposed to be, the pardon of Wilding was ascribed; and to assure her that the surviving members and connexions of that family, retained the warmest gratitude towards her. Various circumstances combined to prevent Mr N. from performing this duty at that time; nor was it till a short time before her death that his interview with Mrs Garrick took place. He said the old Lady appeared scarcely to heed or understand his words, whilst apologising for his visit, and explaining its cause, until he mentioned the name of Wilding, when her countenance became lit up with sudden animation, and she said "Wilding! O yes! I remember him as it were but yesterday; yet it is long, long since. I was scarce more than a child myself;" and she commenced the narrative with a precision and vivacity, strongly contrasted with her former apathy.

It was, she said, not long after her arrival in England, Lord Burlington had, as was his frequent practice, called on her in his carriage to take an airing. As soon as she was seated, he ordered the coachman to the Tower, saying carelessly to her, "I must first go there to see the state prisoners ordered for execution to-morrow; it is a customary form; if you like, you can come in with me." She felt shocked at the manner in which he spoke, yet curiosity prevailed, and she entered the Tower with him. The prisoners were summoned, and the usual inquiries made whether there was any indulgence they might wish for; any last request. Amongst the number were some of note; the gallant and handsome Dawson, the hero of Shenstone's touching ballad, for whom a young heart was then breaking; and the youthful Wilding. "I see him now," said Mrs Garrick, kindling as she spoke, "the beautiful boy, as he stood calm and unmoved before us; I shuddered as I thought of Lord Burlington's fatal words before they entered: 'Every one you are to see, must die to-morrow,' and I vowed inwardly they should not shed that boy's young blood. No sooner were the prisoners removed, than I flung myself at Lord Burlington's feet; I wept; I implored him to save the youth. Astonished at my vehemence, he tried to put me off; but I persisted;—I became more urgent;—I declared I should never know a moment's peace were he to die. Lord Burlington was moved by the agony of his child; for he was my father," continued she; "he promised, and performed his promise. The pardon was obtained, and I was satisfied."

Such is my story. Mr N. added his suspicion that Mrs Garrick's sudden zeal had been caused by a passion for the young captive; that she had, as the vulgar phrase is, "fallen in love at first sight." But I reject the inference; I know my sex better; and I think (you I hope will agree with me) that there is a sufficiency of what Burns calls "the melting blood in woman's breast" to account for her exertions on principles of pure humanity, called into immediate action by the extremity of the case (and it was a shocking case; a youth—a child almost—condemned to death for merely following the advice and example of his father, when incapable of judging for himself),—and perhaps rendered more acute by the callousness of the man who could bring his daughter to witness such a scene. Should you admit the above into your pages, clothing it in your own language, you will give me very great pleasure.

I remain, dear Sir,

With sincere good wishes for your health and prosperity, and in particular for the success of your present undertaking,

Your constant Reader,

F. N. L.

XXXIX.—STORY OF FIRMEN DA COSTA.

THIS man should have married the heroine of Goethe's story, given in our last Number. They would have kept one another in order. Firmien had virtues, but accompanied by a frightful power of sacrificing them to his will and self-love. Under no circumstances would his fiery nature have made living with him a very secure or comfortable business. He was of the "loaded musket" order. Nobody could have been sure whether he would not go off. His master was a noble soul.

Firmien da Costa was a Portuguese negro, the property of a respectable and humane merchant at Lisbon.

This extraordinary slave, attending a public spectacle, and, stimulated by curiosity, had, with other spectators, trespassed beyond the prescribed boundaries, and after being repeatedly desired to keep back, was slightly goaded by a soldier with his bayonet.

Exasperated by this provocation, Firmien declared, with bitter oaths and execrations, that the want of a weapon alone prevented him from laying his assailant dead on the spot; with these, and other expressions of ungovernable passion, he departed breathing vengeance.

Making himself acquainted with the regiment, company, and name of the man who had offended him, he, a few evenings after, decoyed him, by a pretended message, to a retired spot near his master's house, and stabbed him to the heart.

Not satisfied with mere murder, he inflicted deep wounds on various parts of the soldier's body, whispered to the dying man who he was, mentioned the affront he had received, as his reason for perpetrating the bloody deed, declared himself satisfied, quitted his master's service, and concealed himself in a distant wood.

The place in which the dead body was found, the mark on the instrument of death, which was lying near it, and the circumstance of the master of the murderer being the last person who had been seen speaking to the soldier, strongly marked him as an object of suspicion.

It was in vain that the unhappy merchant declared his innocence, appealed to the general inoffensive mildness of his character, and pointed out the flight of one of his slaves as a presumptive evidence of the fugitive's guilt; he was committed to prison, and circumstance, in a case where no positive proof could be found, being admitted in its place, was condemned to die.

The sentence of the law reached the ears of the assassin in his retreat, and the wretch, who, rather than submit to a trifling injury, had, with circumstances of peculiar barbarity, imbrued his hands in the blood of a fellow-creature, could not bear the self-accusation of ingratitude and injustice, to a master from whom he had long experienced kindness and indulgence.

Nature, or Nature's God, triumphed in his bosom; yielding to the salutary impulse, he presented himself before a judicial tribunal, and confessed himself the murderer. The judges paused with astonishment; they could scarcely believe that the man who exhibited so transcendent an instance of heroic virtue and strength of mind, had recently proved himself a merciless and a blood-thirsty savage; after a reluctant pause, for examination and regret, the defendant was taken into custody. It is not easy to describe the feelings of the merchant; although suddenly and unexpectedly rescued from an ignominious death, the joy of deliverance was considerably diminished when he reflected on the guilt of his slave; when he discovered the fondest and most faithful of his domestics, attached to him by long servitude, and valuable for tried integrity, was an atrocious murderer. Yet a character of such a cast was not a desirable inmate, nor a safe attendant; the same ungovernable ferocity of passion which hurried him into assassination, on some trifling occasion of pettishness, ill-temper, or accidental affront, might have impelled him to destroy his master, his mistress, their children, and the whole of his property.

Many applications were made to save the culprit's life; but all intercession was in vain. With every appearance of triumphant joy, rather than repentant sorrow, the negro was led to execution.

In a country like Portugal, which affords scanty materials for panegyric, I record with pleasure an example of grateful attachment, and inflexible uncorrupted justice: Da Costa's master, Emanuel Cabral, whose name I omitted mentioning, and on the faith of one of whose descendants I relate the circumstance, would have given half his property to save the offender's life.

Defects and Merits of Others.—To abstain from bringing into view the infirmities of others, is one of the marks of negative efficient benevolence. To hold up to view the accomplishments or merits of another, occupies the corresponding place in the regions of positive benevolence.—Bentham.

Berghem was of a pleasant temper, his nature was like his landscapes cheerful and quiet; he loved to sing at his easel, nor was he one who believed in the influence of set times and seasons, for he rose early and painted late, and always wrought happily when in good health. He was a careful finisher of his works; nature, he said, finished all hers with much minuteness, and artists ought not to be wiser in their own conceit than nature.—Major's Cabinet Gallery.

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 1st, to Tuesday the 6th of October.

THE PLINIES. DESTRUCTION OF THE ELDER PLINY BY MOUNT VESUVIUS.

The late frightful eruption of Mount Vesuvius will render interesting, even to those who have read it in other works, the following account of the death of Pliny the Elder, taken from a new volume (which has just appeared) of the Edinburgh Cabinet Library, entitled Lives of Eminent Zoologists. Of the eruption we shall probably speak again, and therefore say no more of it in this place.

Pliny was a man of fortune in the age of the Cæsars, and author of a History of his own time which is lost, and of a Natural History which is a huge miscellaneous compilation of all sorts of knowledge existing up to his time, bad and good, exhibiting more style than discernment. He was, however, a most industrious gentleman, valuable for preserving better things than he could have found out for us; and that he was a bold one, the following narrative will testify. His nephew, Pliny the Younger, whom he educated, and whose fame also surpasses his deserts as an author, though he too was an amiable man and an elegant writer, is chiefly known by his Letters. His style is too conscious and artificial. Both the Plinies may be looked upon as the artificial products of the highly wrought, but cold and imitative literature of those times, the polish of a despotism which repressed originality. But they both appear to have been good men; and they maintained a degree of political independence in the worst times, highly honourable to the spirit of knowledge.

The death of the Elder Pliny took place during the eruption which is understood to have destroyed the cities of Herculaneum and Pompeii.

He was at Misenum, where he commanded the fleet which protected all that part of the Mediterranean comprised between Italy, the Gauls, Spain, and Africa, when a great eruption of Vesuvius took place. His sister and her son, the latter of whom was then about eighteen years of age, were with him. He had just retired to his study, when he was apprized of the appearance of a cloud of the most extraordinary form and size. It resembled a pine-tree, having an excessively elongated trunk, from which some branches shot forth at the top, and appeared sometimes white, sometimes dark and spotted, according as the smoke was more or less mixed with earth and cinders. Anxious to discover the cause of this singular appearance, he ordered a light vessel to be got ready, and was proceeding on board, when he met the mariners belonging to the galley stationed at Retina, who had just escaped from the danger. They conjured him not to advance and expose his life to imminent peril; but he ordered the fleet immediately to put to sea, for the purpose of rendering aid to such as might require it; and so devoid of fear was he, that he noted all the variations and forms which the cloud assumed. By this time the vessels were covered with ashes, which every moment became hotter and more dense, while fragments of white pumice and stones, blackened and split with the heat, threatened the lives of the men. They were likewise in great danger of being left aground by a sudden retreat of the sea. He stopped for a moment to consider whether he should return; but to the pilot, who urged him to this expedient, he replied,—"Fortune helps the brave—steer to Pompeianus." That officer was at Stabie, and being in sight of the danger, which, although still distant, seemed always coming nearer, had put his baggage on board, and was waiting a more favourable wind to carry him out. Pliny, finding him alarmed, endeavoured to recall his firmness. In the meantime, the flames were bursting from Vesuvius in many places, so as to illuminate the night with their dazzling glare. He consulted with his friends whether it were better to remain in the house, or to flee to the open fields; for the buildings were shaken by frequent and violent shocks, so as to reel backwards and forwards, and in the open air they were not less in danger from the cinders. However, they chose to go forth, as the less hazardous alternative, covering their heads with pillows, to protect them from the stones. It was now morning, but the country was enveloped by thick darkness. He proceeded towards the shore by the light of torches, but the sea was still so much agitated that he could not embark; and, seating himself on a sail which was spread for him, he asked for some water, of which he drank a little. The approach of flames, preceded by the smell of sulphur, put his companions to flight, excepting two slaves, who assisted him to rise, when he seems to have immediately fallen, suffocated by the vapours and ashes. On the following day, his body was found in the same place without marks of external violence, and resembling a person asleep rather than one who had suffered death. This event took place on the 24th of August, in the seventy-ninth year of the Christian era, and a few months after the demise of Vespasian.

As a specimen of the bad and good, the ridiculous and the interesting, in Pliny's "Natural History," we quote from the Lives of the Zoologists his account of the Lion's Sickness, and the famous story of Cleopatra's Pearl. The former is taken from the old translation of him by Holland.

HOW TO CURE A SICK LION.

The lion is never sick but of the peevishness of his stomach, loathing all meat; and then the way to cure him is to tie unto him certain shoes, which with their wanton mocking and making mowes at him, may move his patience and drive him, for the verie indignitie of their malapert sauciness, into a fit of madness; and then, so soone as he hath tasted their blood, he is perfectlie well againe; and this is the only remedie.

CLEOPATRA'S PEARL.

Pearls were very highly esteemed in Pliny's days. The ladies wore them dangling at their fingers and ears, took great delight in hearing them rattle, and not only appended them to their garments, but even embroidered their buskins with them. It will not suffice them, says he, nor serve their turn, to carry pearls about them, but they must tread among pearls, go among pearls, and walk as it were on a pavement of pearls. Lollia Paulina, the wife of Caligula, was seen by him, on an ordinary occasion, ornamented with emeralds and with pearls, which he valued at forty millions of sesterii (about 300,000.)

The two finest specimens ever seen were in the possession of the celebrated Cleopatra, who, on being sumptuously feasted by Mark Anthony, derided him for the meanness of the entertainment; and on his demanding how she could go beyond him in such a matter, answered that she would spend upon him in one supper ten millions of sesterii. Anthony, conceiving it impossible for her to make good her boast, laid a great wager with her about it. When the supper came, although it was such as to befit the condition of the hostess and guests, it presented no extraordinary appearance, so that Anthony jeered the Queen on the subject, asking, by way of mockery, for a sight of the bill of fare; whereupon she affirmed that what had as yet been brought to the table was not to be reckoned in the count, but that even her own part of the supper should cost sixty millions. She then ordered the second service to be brought in. The servants placed before her a cruet of vinegar, and she put into it one of the pearls which were appended to her ears. When it was dissolved she took up the vessel and drank its contents; on which Lucius Plancus declared that she had gained the wager. Afterwards, when Cleopatra was taken prisoner, and deprived of her royal estate, the other pearl was cut into two, and affixed to the ears of the statue of Venus, in the Pantheon at Rome.

We have been surprised, not very pleasantly, to find by these Lives of the Zoologists, that Linnæus, whom we took for a man mild as his flowers, was of so very irascible and vindictive a nature; and that he was miserly. He once, it appears, had serious thoughts of killing a man,—assassinating him! for taking away his character. However, his studies helped him to get rid of these frightful absurdities (the more honour be unto them!) and his miserliness is accounted for by the narrow means with which he once struggled.

The following portrait of him is drawn by himself:—

The head of Linnæus had a remarkable prominence behind, and was transversely depressed at the lambdoid suture. His hair was white in infancy, afterwards brown, in old age greyish. His eyes were hazel, lively, and penetrating; their power of vision exquisite. His forehead was furrowed in old age. He had an obliterated wart on the right cheek, and another on the corresponding side of the nose. His teeth were unsound, and at an early age decayed, from hereditary tooth-ache. His mind was quick, easily excited to anger, joy, or sadness; but its affection soon subsided. In youth he was cheerful, in age not torpid, in business most active. He walked with a light step, and was distinguished for agility. The management of his domestic affairs he committed to his wife, and concerned himself solely with the productions of nature. Whatever he began he brought to an end, and on a journey he never looked back.

As Linnæus grew old, the best parts of his nature (money-wards excepted) seem to quite outgrown the others, and to have exhibited him in the condition desiderated by Mr Southey in his beautiful lines on the Holly-tree, the thorny leaves of which become smooth as they mount towards heaven. The following picture of his manners and amusements is given (says our author) by his pupil, Fabricius:—

We were three, Kuhr, Zoega, and I, all foreigners. In summer we followed him into the country. In winter we lived facing his house, and he came to us every day in his short red robe-de-chambre, with a green fur cap on his head, and a pipe in his hand. He came for half an hour, but stopped a whole one, and many times two. His conversation on these occasions was extremely sprightly and pleasant. It consisted either of anecdotes relative to the learned in his profession with whom he got acquainted in foreign countries, or in clearing up our doubts, or in giving us other kinds of instruction. He used to laugh then most heartily, and displayed a serenity and an openness of countenance, which proved how much his soul was susceptible of unity and good fellowship.

Our life was much happier when we resided in the country. Our habitation was about half a quarter of a league distant from his house at Hammerby, in a farm-house, where we kept our own furniture, and other requisites for house-keeping. He rose very early in summer, and mostly about four o'clock. At six he came to us, because his house was then building, breakfasted with us, and gave lectures upon the natural orders of plants as long as he pleased, and generally till about ten o'clock. We then wandered about till twelve upon the adjacent rocks, the productions of which afforded us plenty of entertainment. In the afternoon we repaired to his garden, and in the evening we usually played at the Swedish game of trisnet in company with his wife.

On Sundays the whole family usually came to spend the day with us. We sent for a peasant who played on an instrument resembling a violin, to the sound of which we danced in the barn of our farm-house. Our balls were certainly not very splendid, the company was but small, the music superlatively rustic, and no change in the dances, which were constantly either minuets or Polish; but regardless of these defects, we passed our time very merrily. While we were dancing, the old man, who smoked his pipe with Zoega, who was deformed and emaciated, became a spectator of our amusement, and sometimes, though very rarely, danced a Polish dance, in which he excelled every one of us young men. He was extremely delighted whenever he saw us in high glee, nay, if we even became very noisy. Had he not always found us so, he would have manifested his apprehension that we were not sufficiently entertained.

A SCENE AFTER A THUNDER STORM.

The storm hath passed away, and I am free;
The foamy torrent flashes in the sun,
The giant shadows o'er the meadows run,
They chase each other o'er the sunny sea;
The hare is sporting in the spangled lea;
In the blue cleft of the precipitous cloud
The lark is singing,—lows the ox aloud
In the sharp shadow of that beechen tree.
Ah, me! the fascination of that day
A deeper happiness within me wrought
Than is the joy of philosophic thought,
Touching on issues that can ne'er decay.*
Dear Henrietta to my heart I caught,
And wept th' excess of happiness away.

* I fear I express myself very indistinctly. An anecdote from the life of Newton will make it clear. "Newton having noted down the length of the degree obtained by Picard, began to recompute his former calculation from the new data. Finding, as he advanced, the manifest tendency of these numbers to produce the long wished for results, he suffered so much excitement that, becoming unable to go on with the calculation, he entreated one of his friends to complete it for him!"

Tyranny of Vice under a Mask.—Vice is never so much at ease, never more tyrannical, never more ambitious, than when it imagines it has found a mask, under the cover and protection of which it may pass off for virtue. And masks there are, which, to a certain extent, deceive even the wearers; a deceit to which they lend themselves with alacrity, and find, in their own delusion, encouragement to make daring experiments on the credulity, timidity, or dependence of others.—Bentham.

Numerous Households.—I have narrowly examined into the management of great families, and have found it impossible for a master who has twenty servants to know whether he has one honest man among them, and not to mistake the greatest rascal perhaps to be that one. This alone would give me an aversion to riches. The rich lose one of the sweetest pleasures of life, the pleasure of confidence and esteem. They purchase all their gold at a dear rate!—Rousseau.

WARS WITH WILD BEASTS.

(From Mr Pringle's "African Sketches.")

I shall now give some account of our wars with the beasts of prey, allowing, of course, due precedence to the lions. The first actual conflict of the Glen Lynden settlers with this formidable animal, occurred in June, 1821, while I was absent from home, having gone to meet the acting governor at Somerset. The following were the circumstances as detailed to me by the parties present. A horse was missing, belonging to old Hans Blok, one of our mulatto tenants, which, after some search, was discovered by the footpoints to have been killed by a lion. The boldest men of the settlement having assembled to give battle to the spoiler, he was traced to a secluded spot, about a mile or upwards from the place where he had seized his prey. He had carried the horse with him to devour it at his leisure, as is the usual practice of this powerful animal. On the approach of the hunters, the lion, after a little demur, retreated to a thicket in a shallow ravine at no great distance. The huntsmen followed cautiously, and having taken post on an adjoining height, poured volley after volley into the thicket. This bombardment produced no perceptible effect; the lion kept under covert, and refused to give battle; only when the wolf-hounds were sent in to tease him, he drove them forth again with a savage growl, killing two of those who had dared to approach him. At length Mr George Rennie, the leader of the hunt, and a man of daring hardihood, losing patience at this fruitless proceeding, descended from the height and approached the thicket, and threw two large stones into the midst of it. This rash bravado brought forth the lion. He sprung fiercely from his covert, and with another bound would have probably laid our friend prostrate under his paw, but most fortunately, at this critical moment, the attention of the savage beast was attracted by a favourite dog of Mr Rennie's, which ran boldly up to the lion and barked in his face. The poor dog was destroyed in a moment; a single blow from the lion's paw rewarded his generous devotion with death. But that instant was sufficient to save his master. Mr Rennie had instinctively sprung back a pace or two: his comrades on the rock fired at once with effect, and the lion fell dead upon the spot, with eight balls through his body.

Our next serious rencounter with the monarch of the wilderness occurred about the close of April, 1822. I was then residing on my farm at Eildon, in the bee-hive cabin, which I have described in the preceding chapter. My nearest neighbour at that time was Capt. Cameron, a Scotch officer of the 72nd regiment, who had lately come to occupy the farm immediately below me on the river. I had gone down one evening with another gentleman and two or three female relatives to drink tea with Capt. Cameron. The distance being little more than three miles we considered ourselves next door neighbours; and, as the weather was fine, we agreed to ride home by moonlight—no lions having been seen or traced in the valley for nine or ten months. On our return, we were jesting about wild beasts and Caffers. That part of the valley we were passing through is very wild, and encumbered in several places with thickets of evergreens; but we had no suspicion at the moment of what afterwards appeared to be the fact—that a lion was actually dogging us through the bushes the whole way home. Happily for us, however, he did not then show himself, or give us any indication of his presence; being probably somewhat scared by our number, or by the light dresses of the ladies waving in the moonlight.

About midnight, however, I was awakened by an unusual noise in the kraal, or cattle-fold, close behind our cabin. Looking out, I saw the whole of the horned cattle spring wildly over the high thorn fence, and run scampering about the place. Fancying that a hyena, which I had heard howling when I went to bed, had alarmed the inhabitants by breaking into the kraal, I seized my gun, and sallied forth, undressed as I was, to have a shot at it. Though the cloudless full moon shone with a brilliant light (so bright in that fine climate that I frequently read print by it) I could discover no cause for the terror of the cattle, and after calling a Hottentot to shut them again into the kraal, I retired once more to rest. Next morning Capt. Cameron rode up to inform me that his herdsmen had discovered by the traces in the path that a large lion had followed us up the valley the preceding night; and upon further search it was discovered that this unwelcome visitant had actually been in my fold the preceding night, and had carried off a sheep. But as he appeared by the traces to have retreated with his prey to the mountains, we abandoned for the moment all idea of pursuing him.

The lion was not disposed, however, to have done with us on such easy terms. He returned that very night, and killed my favourite riding horse, little more than a hundred yards from the door of our cabin. I then considered it full time to take prompt measures in self-defence, and sent a messenger round the location to call out a party to hunt him, being assured by our Hottentots that, as he had only devoured a small portion of the horse, he would certainly be lurking in the vicinity. The huntsmen speedily assembled to the number of seventeen horsemen, including Mulattoes and Hottentots; bringing with them a goodly number of strong hounds.

The first point was to track the lion to his covert. This was effected by a few of the Hottentots on foot. Commencing from the spot where the horse was killed, they followed the spoor, or track, through grass, and gravel, and brush-wood, with astonishing ease and dexterity, where an inexperienced eye could have discovered neither footprint nor mark of any kind,—until at length we fairly tracked him into a large boach, or straggling thicket, of brushwood and evergreens, about a mile distant.

The next object was to drive him out of this retreat, in order to attack him in close phalanx, and with more safety and effect. The approved mode in such cases is to torment the animal with dogs till he abandons his covert, and comes forth into the open plain. The whole band of hunters then march forward together, and fire deliberately, either one by one, or in volleys. If he does not speedily fall, but grows furious and advances upon his assailants, they must then stand close in a circle, and turn their horses rear outward; some holding them fast by the bridles, while the others kneel to take a steady aim at the lion as he approaches, as he will sometimes do up to the very horses' heels,—crouching every now and then as if to measure the distance and strength of his enemies. This is the moment to shoot him fairly in the forehead or some other mortal part. If they continue to wound him ineffectually, till he waxes desperate; or if the horses, startled by his terrific roar, grow frantic with terror, and burst loose, the business becomes rather serious, and may end in mischief,—especially if all the party are not men of courage, coolness, and experience. The frontier boors are, however, generally such excellent marksmen, and without so cool and deliberate, that they seldom fail to shoot him dead, as soon as they can get within a fair distance.

In the present instance, we did not manage matters quite so discreetly. The Mulattoes, after recounting to us all these and other savage laws of lion-hunting, were themselves the first to depart from them. Finding that our hounds made little impression on the lion, they divided themselves into two or three parties, and rode round the jungle, firing into the spot where the dogs were barking round him, but without effect. At length, after some hours spent in thus beating about the bush, the Scottish blood of some of my countrymen began to get impatient; and three of them, Messrs George and John Rennie, and James Ekron, a servant of my father's, announced their determination to march in, and beard the lion in his den, provided three of the Mulattoes, who were superior marksmen, would support them, and follow up their fire should the enemy venture to give battle. Accordingly, in they went, (in spite of the warnings of some more prudent men among us), to within fifteen or twenty paces of the spot where the animal lay concealed. He was couched among the roots of a large ever-green bush, with a small space of open ground on one side of it; and they fancied, on approaching, that they saw him distinctly lying glaring at them from under the foliage. Charging their coloured allies to stand firm, and level fair should they miss, the Scottish champions let fly together, and struck—not the lion, as it afterwards proved, but a great block of red stone beyond which he was actually lying. Whether any of the shot grazed him is uncertain, but, with no other warning than a furious growl, forth he bolted from the bush. The Mulattoes, in place of now pouring in their volley upon him, instantly turned and fled helter-skelter, leaving him to do his pleasure upon the defenceless Scots, who, with empty guns, were tumbling over each other, in their hurry to escape the clutch of the rampant savage. In a twinkling he was upon them—and with one stroke of his paw, dashed John Rennie (my brother-in-law,) to the ground. The scene was terrific! There stood the lion with his foot upon his prostrate foe, looking round in conscious power and pride upon the band of his assailants,—and with a port the most noble and imposing that can be conceived. It was the most magnificent thing I ever witnessed. The danger of our friends, however, rendered it at the moment too terrible to enjoy fully either the grand or the ludicrous part of the picture. We expected every instant to see one or more of them torn in pieces; nor, though the rest of us were standing within fifty paces, with our guns cocked and levelled, durst we fire for their assistance. One was lying under the lion's paw, and the other scrambling towards us in such a way as to intercept our aim at him. All this passed far more rapidly than I have described it. But luckily the lion, after steadily surveying us for a few seconds, seemed willing to be quits with us on fair terms; and, with a fortunate forbearance turned calmly away, and driving the hounds like rats from among his heels, bounded over the adjoining thicket like a cat over a footstool, clearing brakes or bushes twelve or fifteen feet high, as readily as if they had been tufts of grass; and, abandoning the jungle, retreated towards the mountains.

After ascertaining the state of our rescued comrade, (who fortunately had sustained no other injury than a bloody scratch on the back, and a severe bruise on the ribs, from the force with which the animal had dashed him to the ground,) we renewed the chase with our Hottentot allies and hounds in full cry. In a short time we again came up with the enemy, and found him standing at bay under an old mimosa tree, by the side of a mountain stream which we had distinguished by the name of Huntly Burn. The dogs were barking round, but afraid to approach him, for he was now beginning to growl fiercely, and to brandish his tail in a manner that showed he was meditating mischief. The Hottentots, by taking a circuit between him and the mountain, crossed the stream, and took their station on the top of the precipice overlooking the spot where he stood. Another party of us occupied a position on the other side of the glen; and placing the poor lion thus between two fires, which confused his attention and prevented his retreat, we kept battering away at him till he fell, unable again to grapple with us, pierced with many wounds.

He proved to be a large full-grown lion, about six years of age, as our coloured friends affirmed. He measured fully eleven feet from the nose to the tip of the tail. His fore leg below the knee was so thick that I could not span it with both my hands; and his neck, breast, and limbs appeared, when the skin was taken off, a complete congeries of sinews. His head, which seemed as large and heavy as that of an ordinary ox, I caused to be boiled, for the purpose of preserving the skull,* and tasted the flesh from curiosity. It resembled very white coarse beef, rather insipid, but without any very disagreeable flavour.

Our neighbours, the nimrods of the Tarka, disapproved highly of our method of attacking this lion in the bush, and said it was a wonder he did not destroy some of us. They were highly diverted with the discomfiture of our three champions; and the story of "Ian Rennie en de Leewo," long continued to be one of their constant jokes against the Scotchmen,—at which I have often seen some of them laugh till the tears ran over their cheeks. However, the Scotchmen, and especially the Rennies, were not long in redeeming their credit as huntsmen, equally adroit as adventurous.

Several other lions were killed at Glen Lynden and its vicinity during my residence there; but I shall content myself with the description of another hunt, extracted from a letter written by my friend Mr Philipps, of Glendour, in Albany, who happened to be at the time on a visit to me. Being no great Nimrod myself, I was not present on the occasion.

After describing the rousing of the lion in a wild desert place near the Zwartkei river, in the country of Amatembra Caffers, Mr Philipps proceeds:—

The lion abandoned the grove of mimosas, and we followed him in full cry across the open plain. The Caffers, who had just come up and mixed with us, could scarcely clear themselves of our horses; and their dogs howling and barking—we hallowing—the lion full in view making for a small copse about a mile distant, with the great number and variety of antelopes on our left, scowring off in different directions, formed altogether one of the most animating spectacles that the annals of sporting could produce.

Diederik Muller and Lieutenant Sheppard, being on very spirited horses, were the foremost. Christian Muller gave the signal to dismount, when we were about two hundred yards from the copse. He desired us to be quick in tying the horses, which was done as fast as each came up; and now there was no retreating. We were on lower ground than the lion, with not a bush around us. The plan was, to advance in a body, leaving our horses with the Hottentots, who were to keep their backs towards the lion, for fear they should become unruly at the sight of him.

These preparations occupied only a few seconds, and were not quite completed when we heard him growl, and imagined he was making off again. But no!—as if to retrieve his character from suspicion of cowardice for his former flight, he had made up his mind to attack us in his turn. To the growl succeeded a terrific roar; and at the same instant we beheld him bearing down upon us, his eye-balls glaring with rage. We were taken unprepared, his motion was so rapid no one could take aim; and he furiously darted at one of the horses while we were at their heads, without a possibility of preventing it. The poor horse sprang forward, and with the force of the action wheeled all the other horses round with him. The lion likewise wheeled, but immediately couched at less than ten yards from us. Our left flank thus became exposed; but on it fortunately stood Christian Muller and Mr G. Rennie. What an anxious moment! For a few seconds we beheld the monster at this little distance meditating, as it were, on whom he should first spring. Never did I long so ardently to hear the report of a gun. We looked at them taking aim,—and then at the lion. It was absolutely necessary to give him a mortal shot, or the consequences might be fatal to some of the party. Every second seemed a minute. At length Christian fired. The under jaw of the lion dropped,—blood gushed from his mouth,—and he turned round with a view to escape. Mr Reanie then shot him through the spine, and he fell.

At this moment he looked grand beyond expression. Turning again towards us, he rose upon his fore feet—his mouth gushing blood—his eyes flashing vengeance. He attempted to spring at us, but his hind legs denied him aid. He dragged them a little space, when Stephanus put a final period to his existence, by shooting him through the brain. He was a noble animal, measuring nearly ten feet, including the tail.

GOOD NEWS FOR THE READERS OF THE FAIRIE QUEENE.

CHARACTER OF SPENSER.

(From Blackwood's Magazine.)

We have, we hope, many hundred things to say of all those bright devils of dances and damozels—the denizens of the woods, and meres, and mountains of that enchanted Forest. The air often seems to sigh as if sick with love. Edmund was the most voluptuous of all pure poets; and in his daring dalliances with nature's supreme delights, his pictures do indeed dazzle our senses, "reeling and drunk with beauty." Beauty, as if overcome by his resistless strains, unveils, in the twilight of shaded air or water, all her hidden charms of limb, and waist, and bosom, to him who seems privileged to enjoy all that is loveliest in love's own world. Yet imagination etherealizes passion—glowing, but not gross—gazing, but not gloating—enjoying all mortal transport—but as a god a goddess.

Poetry is in the gleams of light that revealed temptations heaped up on the happy hills, where Innocence in heaven's own dews preserves for ever unfaded her whitest lilies. Desire, like that fire of scented cedar in Calypso's cave, is purified by what it feeds on. Pleasure is felt not to be sin—and nature's great law holy, which, on an earth where death would fain have sole dominion, sustains perpetual life, and balances bliss against all the weight of woe which else would overwhelm mortality. "Whatever hypocrites austere hold," we hold, with Spenser and Milton, that such is the religion of nature.

Spenser's Fable, quoth Hughes, "though often wild, is always emblematic; and this may very much excuse that air of romance in which he has followed Ariosto."—"Very much excuse!" A bird of light and music excused for light and soaring, and shining and singing in the sky. "Often wild!" Would he have fables to be tame? "Air of romance!" And what air is purer? Not even empyrean. Hughes thinks stories of knights, giants, castles, and enchantments, and all legendary adventures, "in themselves trifling;" that knights in armour, and ladies errant, are as antiquated figures to us as the court of that time would appear, if we could see them now in their ruffs and fardingales. Hurd knew better, and scorned the pseudo-philosophic criticism of the shallow school that spoke of all tales of Faery as unnatural and absurd, surpassing all bounds, not of truth only, but of probability, and more like the dreams of children than the manly inventions of poets. But those Tales of Faery, he reminded the scornful, are not the wild fancies of plebeian poets, but the golden dreams of Ariosto—the celestial visions of Tasso. True that a poet must follow nature. "But not," says the enlightened prelate, "only the known and experienced course of affairs in this world. The poet has a world of his own, where experience has less to do than consistent imagination. He has, besides, a supernatural world to range in. He has gods, and fairies, and witches at his command; and

"O! who can tell
The hidden power of herbs, and might of magic spell!"

"Thus, in the poet's world, all is marvellous and extraordinary; yet not unnatural in one sense, as it agrees to the conceptions that are readily entertained of the magical and wonder-working natures." It is pleasant to hear Hurd applying these just sentiments to the "Faery Queen," and showing that Spenser is the poet of the chivalrous, as Homer was of the heroic age. The days of chivalry are not yet gone from all men's imaginations; and we know far more about them than of the days of the older heroism. Shall our own Spenser then be neglected by his own people, and the "Faery Queen" be unread, while in a year we have a second edition—for behoof of those who have no Greek—of Sotheby's Homer?

"[No, no, no]" cry we of the London Journal, echoing the cry of our wise, enthusiastic brother. Nature, knowledge, imagination, cry No. Spenser will no more perish than the woods and waters; and the golden light and shades that haunt them. "Nature is vindicated by her children." We have sometimes half thought that the errors and violence of the age of chivalry were well redeemed by the fables they have left us, and might even have been permitted by providence for that purpose, as well as for the greater amenity of manners that they produce, and the brave deference to women! For there must have been some reasons for the thing, and what better than these? The ugliness of it has gone by. Its beauty remains in that amenity and in these books. The storm has burst from the castled hills, and the castles are gone with it; but from out of it there has run, and will run for ever, in the most sequestered places of thought, these brooks of gentleness and beauty, haunted by fair forms that purify the air of passion, and helping to supply half the mind of man with a world fit for it, till the world itself grow fitter.]

THREE OGRESSES v. GIBBON.

[The alleged mistake, mentioned by our correspondent, is Gibbon's own. Indeed, we quoted from his Autobiography at the time. We must add, however, that we partook of it with him. It is new to us, that "Ogresses" are any thing but the lovely creatures we had hitherto supposed them. But, after all, does not the term imply, that Ogresses' heads (as such, and in the popular meaning of the word) are still to be understood as included in the heraldic figure? May not the knights of chivalry have brought them, as they did fictions of ogres, from the East, during the time of the crusades? And might not Gibbon's ancestor, who was a herald, have intended to be at once scientific and jocose?]

16th Sept. 1834.

DEAR BENEFICENT,—Your candour will easily pardon the freedom I take in pointing out an odd mistake that you have either made, or copied (as I have not the book, I cannot say which), in your last Supplement. At page 12, you state that an ancestor of Gibbon "changed the three escallop shells in his arms" into as many Ogresses, or female cannibals, to spite three ladies, &c. Now, Sir, without noticing the absurdity or insufficiency of such means to such end, I have only to observe, that an OGRESS is not the "fearful wild fowl" you take it to be. Guillim, Edmonson, or any other learned pundit of the "Divine Art of Blazon," will inform you, that OGRESSES are neither more nor less than balls of pitch. For your edification (pardon the assumption) I subjoin the passage as it appears in the "Rudiments of Honour." By the way, what a vast idea does it not give us of the circulating medium of those early ages of "barbaric pearl and gold!" Verily the office of pursebearer to a rich traveller (before banks or paper-money were invented) could be no sinecure—while the difficulty of "getting change" must at times have been almost insurmountable; on the other hand, a man might very well be reduced to his last piece without any serious apprehension as to the needs of to-morrow.

"When in any coat of arms, one or more of these round pieces shall be found of the colour of ore, then in blazon they are always termed bezants, and are taken for pieces of gold," which were anciently the coin of Bizantium, and were in weight one hundred and four pounds and two ounces troy; being equal in value to 3150*l.* sterling; but, when any of these figures are found of the colour of red, they must always be called tortoiseaux; if blue, harts; if green, pomes; if black, pellets, or ogresses; if purple, golpes, &c."

That your endeavours to put a spirit of youth in everything, may be crowned by complete success, is the sincere wish of your poor disciple,

TABLE TALK.

Annibale Caracci's Christ Appearing to St Peter.—This fine picture is not scriptural, as some have imagined: it embodies a tradition of the Romish church. The New Testament tells us that Christ after his resurrection appeared to St Peter; but it was more consistent with the aim and practice of the church, when losing its simplicity, to give currency to obscure or doubtful legends, rather than draw attention to the true and accredited narrative of the gospel. Peter, says the tradition, not finding at the time any liking for martyrdom, made his escape from Rome, when he met Jesus bearing the cross, "Lord, where goest thou?" inquired the astonished saint. "I am going to Rome to be crucified a second time," was the answer, "for I find that my disciples are afraid of attesting the truth of my cause with their blood." The rebuked saint returned and suffered martyrdom. The legend is a very beautiful one; it is in keeping with the timid character of Peter; and serviceable, too, to the Church of Rome, which claimed supremacy over all Christian churches. Those who imagined the legend, found an admirable interpreter in Caracci: it is admitted by very fastidious critics that this picture (in the National Gallery) is one of the best studied and effective of all his performances in this country. — Major's Cabinet Gallery. [The picture is a most beautiful one, and worthy of the legend.]

Noble Occupation for the Leisurely.—Whenever you have nothing else to do,—in other words, whenever you have no particular object in view, of pleasure or profit, of immediate or remote good,—set yourself to do good in some shape or other;—to men, to sensitive beings, rational or irrational; to one or to many; to some individual, or to the whole race.—Bentham.

Taste of the Gypsies.—The upper part of the wood (in a picture of Gainsborough's) is tenanted by a horde of gypsies; their asses are grazing among the glades; the party-coloured coverings of their wandering camp are visible among the shafts of the trees, and a thin and scarcely distinguished smoke curls slowly away amid the boughs of the forest. This is one of the painter's marks to indicate great natural beauty of scene; he knew that the taste of that roving people was, as far as regarded a feeling for the charms of external nature, essentially poetic. If a lovely spot lies within seven miles of their line of march, there will they fix their tents and make their abode for the night; were landscape painters to follow their footsteps, and paint the scenes in which they establish themselves, they could not fail to produce a series of fine poetic compositions.—Major's Cabinet Gallery.

Morland's Rural Taste.—To Londoners, and one so dissipated as Morland, it is next to a wonder that images of country simplicity and rustic modesty should have presented themselves: he was, when very young, made intimate with much of the folly and vice of the town; he assumed the dress of the fop, and copied the manners of the man of pleasure, and in all, save his paintings, was artificial and affected. The moment he took up the pencil, folly resigned her rule and nature reigned in her stead: his mind wandered from the wine vaults and the gin shops to homely cottages, barn-yards, calf-cribs, and piggeries; he forgot the hungry creditor, the griping pawnbroker, and the drouthy companion, and saw but a horde of gypsies bivouacked with their motley tents, tawny children, and tethered asses.—Major's Cabinet Gallery.—[But this was the reason. He wanted a contrast to his feverish existence. The people of a metropolis are apt to be fonder of the country, than country-people themselves. It is rarer to them: they have been taught more of its beauties from books; and their state of health gives them more need of it.]

A FLOOD.

THE mountain torrents, rushing fierce and high,

Bearing away the riches of a strath,

Are kind as a good mother in their wrath:

The man who thinks aright—who has an eye

To scan the works of nature, and apply

Their cogent moral rightly to the heart,

Shall find the consolation they impart,*—

That in all seeming evil good doth lie:

The flood shall fertilize, or if you scan

Its path in desolation, hath it not

A better, since a moral harvest, wrought?

How hath it fertilized the heart of man,

Taught it to yield a tenderness unbought,

And better sympathies than interest can.

* We made a passing jest a week or two ago upon "Aeons and impart verses," which we notice in this place, merely to say that it had no reference to our correspondent; though he writes so well as to be able to afford an involuntary admonition against condescending to the use of these new obsolete helps to a rhyme.

BELIEF IN SPIRITS; &c.

To the Editor of the London Journal.

Dalston, 27th Sept. 1834.

MANY thanks, worthy Sir, for the entertainment your London Journal affords me, and still more for the religion of love and hope which it breathes. Amidst the ravings of those who please to revile poor human nature, and who bid us believe this beautiful earth is but our prison-house and scene of our sufferings and trials, and the majority of our fellow-creatures the victims of a mysterious and awful destiny, it is truly refreshing to turn to your pages and find there one, at least, who does not consider man quite so depraved, or the world quite so uninviting as is represented. Dr Watts says, "Religion never was designed to make our pleasures less;" but it seems strange that, among all nations and in all creeds, the service of the Deity should be considered to involve a denial, in a greater or less degree, of the pleasures of this world; as if he who placed us here and gave us reason to use, and senses to enjoy his gifts, delighted in witnessing the perpetual conflict of our inclinations and our duty. It is our ignorance of the character of the Supreme which makes us undervalue his works. If our hearts were duly impressed with the conviction that He was the fountain of love, and not the tyrant of the universe, we should view the world more as an Elysium than a place of sorrow, and our fellow-men as beings susceptible of indefinite improvement, and bound to our hearts by the ties of sympathy and philanthropy.

Go on then, Mr Editor, in your labour of love, and prosper. Render men more in humour with themselves and each other, and assist in that "consummation devoutly to be wished"—the full and perfect emancipation of the mind. So far has my heart responded to all you have said, till I come this week to your remarks on Spirits,—there I candidly own I stop. However pleasing the ideas such a belief may awaken, I feel convinced it is delusive, and tends to countenance the darkest superstition, and gives the imagination too large a field for its range. Any vagary of the brain would be received with attention, and no doctrine would be unsubstantiated, if this was admitted, for if such creatures as Spirits exist, it does not seem probable they would not affect us, and if they did so, where would our free will be? Or, supposing them to be passive, for what purpose then were they sent into a material visible world to mix with humanity unseen, and witness actions and feelings in which they could have no participation. I regret you did not offer more evidence for their existence, as I should like to be possessed of the reasons which have led your mind to this conclusion; till then I must venture to express my dissent, and still continue to believe that this world has no other inhabitants but those I see, or is fitted for the abode of any but material beings. I am glad, however, to part with your paper in unison of sentiment respecting the existence of a Devil. Those who think that such a being exists, must have very confused and imperfect ideas of the omnipotence and love of the Deity. A more rational creed whispers, "Man alone is the author of all the evil he endures, and that happiness is within his reach, and easily attained by the disciplined and virtuous mind."

Washington Irvine has an exquisite passage on Spirits in his 'Bracebridge Hall,' which, along with your own remarks, would almost seduce me to become a proelyte to your theory. I have written it out, as I feel assured you will approve of it.

Who yet has been able to comprehend and describe the nature of the soul in connexion with the body, or in what part of the frame it is situated? We know merely that it does exist, but whence it came, and when it entered into us, and how it is sustained, and where it is seated, and how it operates, are all matters of mere speculation and contradictory theories. If then we are thus ignorant of this spiritual existence, even while it forms a part of ourselves, and is continually present to our consciousness, how can we pretend to ascertain or to deny its powers and operations, when released from its fleshy prison-house? It is more the manner, therefore, in which this superstition has been degraded, than its intrinsic absurdity, that has brought it into contempt. Raise it above the frivolous purposes to which it has been applied; strip it of the gloom and horror with which it has been surrounded, and there is none of the whole circle of visionary creeds that could more delightfully elevate the imagination, or more tenderly affect the heart. It would become a sovereign comfort at the bed of death, soothing the bitter tear wrung from us by the agony of our moral separation. What could be more consoling than the idea that the souls of those whom we once loved were permitted to return and watch over our welfare? That affectionate and guardian Spirits sat by our pillows when we slept, keeping a vigil over our most helpless hours? That beauty and innocence which had languished into the tomb yet smiled unseen around us, revealing themselves in those blest visions wherein we live over again the hours of past endearments?

A belief of this kind would, I should think, be a new incentive to virtue, rendering us circumspect, even in our most secret moments, from the idea that those we once loved and honoured, were invisible witnesses of all our actions. It would take away too from that loneliness and destitution, which we are apt to feel more and more, as we get on in our pilgrimage through the wilderness of this world, and find that those who set forward with us lovingly and cheerily on the journey, have one by one dropped from our side. Place the superstition in this light, and I confess I should like to be a believer in it. I see nothing in it incompatible with the tender and merciful nature of our religion, nor revolting to the wishes or affections of the heart. There are departed beings that I have loved as I shall never again love in this world,—that have loved me as I never again shall be loved. If such beings do ever retain in their blessed spheres the attachments they have felt on earth, if they take an interest in the poor concerns of transient mortality, and are permitted to hold communion with those whom they have loved on earth, I feel as if now, at this deep hour of night, in this silence and solitude, I could receive their visitation with the most solemn but unalloyed delight.

J. W. A.

[We thank our correspondent for this beautiful extract from Mr Washington Irvine, with whose writings it makes us desirous to be better acquainted. We have often had the feelings described in its concluding sentence. As to Spirits, it surely does not follow, from their existence, that they are to affect the human beings around them, any more than other creatures affect us,—the birds in the trees, for instance. We hold, that out of all faiths and all possibilities, it is the business of a cultivated human mind to extract whatsoever enlivens and enlarges its sense of existence, provided it be consistent with analogy and God's goodness; and we see all visible nature crammed so full of life, that it appears to us equally due to the modesty of man's ignorance, and the comprehensiveness of his wisdom, to suppose that invisible nature is equally so.]

Four Parties in a Family consisting of Four Persons.

—Before I introduce you to the family of my host, I must premise, that the inhabitants of the Comtat are divided into four parties, who persecute each other with inexorable hatred. The first still adheres to the Pope, and consists principally of the old people and ecclesiastics; the second, which is called the Aristocratic party, wishes the country, it is true, to remain under the sovereignty of France, but only on condition that the monarchy shall be fully restored; the third is perfectly satisfied with the present order of things, and is called the Democratic party; and the fourth consists of those who, under the conduct of Sourdun, enriched themselves by plunder, and whose prime wish therefore is to break the chains of their hero, and see him raised again to his former power; these are comprehended under the title of Brigands. It was to me one of the most curious, as well as the most lamentable of political phenomena, to find these four parties united in my inn, where the family consisted of only four persons. The father, a bigotted old man, to whom the metamorphosis of the papal crown over the gate had occasioned more than one sleepless night, was a papist; the mother, a vehement democrat; the daughter, who had been a favourite with the former Archbishop of Aix, an aristocratic enragée; and the son, as having been lieutenant under Sourdun, a furious brigand. The enmity between the two young people did not seem carried to so great a height as between the father and mother, who were almost always quarrelling. When I asked the young lady if one might sleep in security under their roof, as her brother, according to her own account, was a brigand, she answered, "Do not be alarmed, sir; he is a very good lad when he is here, but when he is with Sourdun, he must perform his duty to his captain."—Matthison's Travels.

CHORDS TOUCHED.

Ah, how that plaintive strain recalls
The happy hour I heard it last;
And seems, while on my ear it falls,
A dream-like whisper from the past!
What mingled thoughts of joy and pain
From the same source unbidden flow,
To hear those well known tones again,
And, oh, to hear them thus—and now!

A voice in every cadence dwells—
In every mournful note a sigh—
Of other, happier days it tells,
Unvalued as they glided by!
Of those I've loved, o'er whom the pall
Of funeral darkness seems to be,
And, oh! of worse than these, than all,
Of buried hope it speaks to me!

MEMOR.

Progress of Good.—The historian of Anson's Voyages, speaking of scurvy, says, "the cure seems impossible by any remedy or by any management that can be employed." In the present day, instead of the remedy being unknown, it is, happily, the disease: a fact which suggests the most important subject for contemplation, and justifies the reflections and language of Sir Gilbert Blane: "Does it not afford a cheering and consolatory prospect, amidst the thousand shocks that flesh is heir to, that there may be still in store for us, in the boundless progression and endless combination of knowledge, other hidden means of advancing human happiness, of mitigating human misery, and of making accessions to the dominion of man over nature which have not yet been dreamed of in our philosophy?"—Penny Cyclopaedia.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have again to thank the Greenock Advertiser for its very kind and zealous commendations of our Journal. Such praises, too, are always the more valuable, of course, in proportion to the talents of the praiser.

Our feelings are particularly touched also by what is said of the Journal in the Windsor and Eton Express.

J. C. is informed that there will be eight Supplements in the course of twelve months, and that those upon the subject of London will have an index.

The Fourth Number of the Supplement was published with our last week's number, and should have been served by all the venders.

We shall be glad to hear again from our friend JEAN ANDRÉ-SON; and meanwhile will make use of what he has sent us.

ARNOLD next week.

We have handed Mr G. F.'s letter to a quarter, in which we hope it may do him service.

The pamphlet sent us by Mr W. G. shall be attended to.

We should be happy to oblige Solomon Gundy, but fear it is out of our power. Also our friend C. D. M.; but doubt whether the readers would think the re-publication of the verses consistent towards their demand for newer matter.

Some of J. D.'s verses in our next. Those of Philer have been unavoidably delayed to the same time.

The observations of J. D. OBSERVATOR were very welcome.

Mr G. B. is informed in the negative. We are under no need of acting upon that plan. Mr J. M. C. will understand to what part of his letter the same answer applies.

Mr J. W. B. will probably think that the spirit of his remarks has been anticipated.

Attention will be paid to the book sent us by Mr J. B., who is thanked for the other book that accompanied it, and for his letter.

B'ees throng upon us,—and all as dulcet as industrious.

Mr J. B.'s letter from Suffolk was highly welcome.

ROMANCE OF COMMON-PLACE.

EVERY sentiment, or want of sentiment, pushed to excess, bears, from that excess, a character of romance; even dullness may be romantic. We remember our friend C. L., many years ago, giving us, with his exquisite tact, an account of a deceased acquaintance of his who carried "common-place" itself to a pitch of the "romantic," and who would way-lay you for half an hour with a history of his having cut his finger, or mislaid a pair of shoes. This gentleman did not draw infinite somethings out of nothing, like the wits of the Lutrin, or the Rape of the Lock, or the Italian expatiators upon a Cough or a Christian-name. He got hold of nothing, and out of it, with a congeniality of emptiness, drew nothing whatever. But it was he that drew the nothing, and you that listened to him; and thus he got a sense of himself somehow. If you ran against him in the street, it was an event in his life, and enabled him to stand breathing, and smiling, and saying how much it did not signify, for the next intense five minutes. He once met a lady, an acquaintance of his, who was going to have a tooth drawn.

Dear me, Madam, and so you are going to have your tooth drawn?

Yes, Sir.

By Mr Parkinson, I presume?

Yes.

Dear me! I fear you have suffered a good deal, Madam?

Not a little, indeed.

God bless me! I am very sorry to hear it,—very sorry. How long pray may you have suffered this tooth-ach?

I should think a week.

God bless me! A week! That is a long time! And by night as well as by day, I presume?

I have hardly had any sleep for these two nights.

Dear me! That is very sad. God bless me! No sleep for these two nights! Want of sleep is a very sad thing,—highly distressing. I could not do without my regular sleep. No, no; none of us can. It is highly undermining to the constitution. Produces such fatigue—such lassitude—such weariness. H'm! h'm! (Humming with a sort of sympathy and gentlemanly groan, as if his own face were bound up.) I see you are suffering now, Madam?

It will be soon over now.

H'm! You are very bold, Madam,—very resolute; but that is extremely sensible. H'm! Dear me! And you have tried clove, I presume, and all that?

Why, I am not young, and do not like to part with my teeth.

Ah—oh—h'm! just so—very natural—ah—yes—dear me! h'm! A double tooth, I suppose?

(The lady nods.)

Ah—afraid of the cold air—you are right not to open your mouth, Madam. Cold gets in. Ah—h'm—yes—just so. (Nodding, bowing, and groaning.)

(Lady turns to go up a court, and makes a gesture of bidding him good morning.)

Oh—ah—dear me! ay, this is the place—so it is—I wish you a happy release, Madam—I hope the process will be easy—h'm! ha-a-ah! (Takes farewell between a sort of breath and a groan. Lady goes into the dentist's, has her tooth drawn, and on returning down the court, is astonished to find the gentleman waiting at the corner, to congratulate her!)

Well, Madam (bowing and smiling), the tooth is drawn, I presume?

(Lady acquiesces.)

Dear me! ah!—H'm!—very painful, I fear—a long while drawing?

Lady. 'Tis out, at last. (Aside. I wonder when the man will have done with his absurdity.)

A skilful dentist, Mr Parkinson, Madam?

(Lady acquiesces.)

I have not been to a dentist myself these—let me see—ah, yes, it must be—now—these twenty years. I had one bad tooth, and caught a cold sitting in the draught of a coach—very dangerous thing—and chaises are worse—very dangerous things, chaises—h'm—very. You are suffering still I see, Madam? from the ghost of the tooth, I presume?—(laughing)—but, dear me! I am keeping you in the draught of this court, and you go the other way. Good morning, Madam—Good morning—I wish you a very GOOD morning—Don't speak, I beg—GOOD morning.

And so, thus heaping emphasis upon emphasis upon this very new valediction, and retaining a double smile amidst his good wishes, from his very new joke about the ghost of a tooth, our Hero of Common-place takes his leave.

We have been led to write more of this dialogue than we intended; so we put it at the head of our paper, in order to avoid beginning three successive weeks with the same subject,—which, our printer tells us, has a look of dangerous experiment with the reader in these variety-loving times. All that we meant to say was, that there is a romance in the least things as well as the greatest, even in shabbiness itself, if of a very excessive kind; and this remark we intended as an introduction to our present week's which is romantic if only for the excess of meanness exhibited by the wretched subject of it, in his application to Mr Fox to save his life, at the moment he was defending himself elsewhere at the expense of that gentleman's character. The Mr Fox in question, afterwards first Lord Holland, was father of the celebrated Fox, and grandfather of the present accomplished nobleman. We take the narrative from the third volume of Mr Britton's History of Wiltshire,—in the preface of which, by the way, we were much interested by the author's candid account of his rise from humble life. Some of the engravings also much interested us, especially that of Mr Bowles's residence, Bremhill Parsonage, a proper nest for a clerical poet.

XL.—CASE OF JOHN AYLIFFE.

Tockenham in the last century was the birth-place of an individual who was executed for forgery, under peculiar circumstance; and whose fate attracted much of the public attention, from his previous connexion with Henry Fox, the first Lord Holland. The following account of this transaction is taken principally from the statements published in the 'Annual Register' for 1759.

The parents of John Ayliffe were upper servants to Gerard Smith, Esq. He was early in life placed at Harrow school, and qualified to become a teacher at the free-school of Lyneham, with a salary of ten pounds a year. While in that situation he married the daughter of a clergyman of Tockenham, with a fortune of five hundred pounds, against the consent of her relatives.

• A fact.

This money he spent extravagantly, and about two years after his marriage, he was taken into the family of Mrs Horner, mother of Lady Ilchester, as house-steward; and subsequently he was employed as an agent for the management of her estates. This lady probably recommended him to Mr Fox, who procured for him the post of commissary of the musters. He then built himself a house at Blandford Forum, in Dorsetshire, and filled it with pictures and costly furniture. By this extravagance, and by his abortive projects to gain money, he dissipated his income, though it was very considerable, and involved himself deeply in debt. Thus pressed for money, he had recourse to several fraudulent contrivances to relieve himself. He forged a promise of presentation to the rectory of Brinkworth, in the hand-writing of Mr Fox, adding the names of two persons as subscribing witnesses. By means of this paper, he prevailed on a clergyman to become his security in borrowing money, and also to engage to marry a certain young woman. It happened that the marriage had not taken place when Ayliffe's affairs became desperate; but his failure ruined the unfortunate clergyman, who died broken-hearted. After his death the following paper was found in his pocket.

"July 29, 1759,—wrote the following letter to John Ayliffe Satan, Esq.

"Sir,—I am surprised you can write to me, after you have robbed and most barbarously murdered me. Oh! Brinkworth!—Yours, T. E.—d."

In April 1759, Ayliffe committed the forgery for which he suffered. Mrs Horner, to whom he had been steward, at her death, left her property chiefly to Mr Fox, and requested that gentleman to make some provision for Ayliffe. Accordingly Mr Fox executed the lease of an estate in Wiltshire to him for life, and for those of his wife and son, reserving a rent of only thirty-five pounds, which was much below the real annual value of the property. Ayliffe, some time after, borrowed money on the security of this lease; and, to make it appear more valuable, he copied it on a fresh skin of parchment, altering the reserved rent from thirty-five to five pounds. To this copy he forged the name of Mr Fox, and of those witnesses who had subscribed the real lease. To conceal this transaction from the knowledge of Mr Fox, he proposed to the persons from whom he borrowed the money an oath of secrecy. This was not agreed to, and he was obliged to be satisfied with a promise that Mr Fox should not be told of the mortgage. But the interest of the money not being regularly paid, the mortgagee felt himself no longer bound to keep the secret; and he accordingly applied to Mr Fox to pay off the mortgage. This Mr Fox declined doing; and in the course of the affair, the amount of the reserved rent was mentioned, the deed was produced, and the fraud became manifest. In the meantime, about a month after Ayliffe had forged the lease, he was arrested for sums amounting to one thousand one hundred pounds, and thrown into the Fleet Prison. During his confinement there, he produced a deed of gift from Mrs Horner to himself of four hundred and twenty pounds per annum, and three thousand pounds in money. Mrs Horner had died towards the close of the year 1757; and Ayliffe alleged that she, being unwilling to let Lady Ilchester and her relations know how she had disposed of this property, directed him not to mention the donation till after her death. He said he had since concealed the circumstance from Mr Fox, lest it should hurt his interest with that gentleman.

Soon after this claim was set up, the forgery of the lease was found out, and a prosecution instituted against Ayliffe for the crime. In the meantime, he affected to represent Mr Fox's proceedings as being instituted with no other view than to extort from him a renunciation of the deed of gift which he professed to have received from Mrs Horner. So far did he persist in this diabolical accusation, that at the very time he was supplicating Mr Fox for mercy, he wrote thus to the Secretary of State:—

"Mr Fox is now pleased to disown the signing or setting his hand to the lease, alleging it not to be original, though he acknowledged his having signed the same lease, so mortgaged as aforesaid, to several persons; and for this your paper is censured and sentenced to death."

At the same time that he sent the above accusation against Mr Fox, he forwarded the following letter to that gentleman:—

"HONOURED SIR,—The faults I have been guilty of shock my very soul, and particularly those, sir, towards you, for which I heartily ask God and your pardon. The sentence I have had pronounced me fills me with horrors such surely as never was felt by any mortal. What can I say? Oh, my good God! that I could think of anything I could do to induce you to have mercy on me, and prevail on you, good sir, to intercede for my life. I would do anything in the whole world, and submit to anything for my life, either at home or abroad. For God's sake, good sir, have compassion on your unhappy and unfortunate servant, JOHN AYLIFFE.

"Press Yard, Newgate,
Oct. 28th, 1759."

Two days before he sent these letters, he was tried and convicted at the Old Bailey Sessions, and received the usual sentence.

Mr Fox, throughout the whole affair, had treated his ungrateful servant with much kindness and generosity, procuring for him every convenience which his situation would admit, and sending him money and provisions, and paying the rent of his apartment in prison. A proof of the excessive depravity of this man is further evinced in a letter he wrote to Mr Pitt, who had ever been the political antagonist of Mr Fox. In this he stated that it was in his power to make some disclosures relative to the conduct of the latter as a minister of state, so much to his disadvantage, that the knowledge of them would leave him entirely at the mercy of Mr Pitt. This application proved worse than fruitless, as that gentleman was the last person in the world who would have adopted so mean a mode of undermining a rival. He forwarded Aycliffe's letter to Mr Fox, who, in justice to his own character, left the unfortunate man to his fate.

Finding his artifices as ineffectual as they were wicked, Aycliffe then wrote again to Mr Fox, offering to make a full confession of his guilt. In reply, that gentleman told him, that, although he pitied him, and forgave him, he was not to expect any advantage from his disclosures; and that he could only advise him to make his peace with God. The culprit, finding his hopes of mercy were at an end, confessed that the deed of gift from Mrs Horner was a fraud; and that he had prepared it ready for signing, and slipped it among some leases which Mrs Horner executed without reading.

Aycliffe suffered the penalty of the law, at Tyburn, November 19th, 1759; when he was about thirty-six years of age.

THE WORD "FAIRY."

SIR,—I have been much amused with an article in your last Number on Fairies. Allow me to make a remark on the use of the word fairy being peculiar to this country. Mr Keightley has, I think, satisfactorily shown (see Appendix to his 'Tales and Popular Fictions,') that the word fairy was not originally applied, as at present, to any little being, but was used in the sense of the French faerie, signifying "enchantment," as "the land of fiery," in which sense Spenser and others use it. Our fay, the French fée, Italian fata, and Provençal fada, were the words used to designate the being we now term a fairy; and this last word is only the faerie of the French transplanted into England. If the word existed in Latin, it would be fatatio, but the Romans were a deplorably unimaginative people, and did not know what enchantment meant. There are some curious remarks on this subject, in the book I have above referred to on Popular Fictions.

Excuse my troubling you with these remarks, from

Yours, &c.

Puck.

* * We meant to imply what our Correspondent has noticed relative to the word "faerie," when we spoke, in commencing this subject, of "a southern appellation applied to a northern idea." It would have been more correct had we defined the word "fairy" to be the name of the sphere applied to the inhabitants. The curious reader cannot do better than go to Mr Keightley's Popular Fictions and Fairy Mythology for information on those subjects. We shall speak of the primitive root of the word fairy in a future article on the "Fairies of the East."

DREAMS OF DISPUTATION—CURTAIN LECTURES—GAMING HOUSES—RESPECT FOR RANK—MUCH "IN A NAME"—"BOOTHIA" AND OTHER NAMES OF PLACES—INCONVENIENT STREETS—GREENWICH'S "NINETY TO ONE."

[It is proper to state that the correspondent who favoured us with the following pleasant medley of thoughts, entitled it "Quotations from Johnson," and gave it a motto from the famous passage in Swift's Tale of a Tub, in which the three brothers resolve to find in their father's Will (the Testament, to wit) whatever they please,—if not in so many sentences, yet in so many words; and if not in so many words, yet in so many letters. Our correspondent modestly wished it to be inferred from this, that all his reflections were to be found, by a like process, in Dr Johnson's Dictionary; and hence the title he gave them. In so doing, however, (besides the mystification of the thing), he appeared to do an injustice to himself, not compensated to him or to the reader by a jest which was the least successful pleasantry in his paper; and accordingly we have ventured to change the title.]

Set your mind, gallant reader, in order; prepare for a magna contentio within yourself. Make an imaginary division of forces—the Pro and Con of the discussion. Or, like the idiot that acts "Crook-back'd Richard," and "Simple Henry," in the street, say the saying for the one side, and then jump to the other and reply. Having given your supposititious antagonist a knock-down argument, throw yourself into his situation, and retaliate. The dispute is at first carried on with words, and looks "as cool as a cucumber;" then it gets warm—warmer—now energetic—hot—next boisterous—at last, like Jonathan Wild, one of the disputants "cocks his hat and looks fierce." The other cannot stand that in due course; "words proceed to blows" (imaginary of course), and the contention ends like the wakening of day dreamers, according to magazine story-tellers, by your kicking over your footstool, your candle, your lamp, the table, your pot of porter, or (more brittle) decanters of wine, or your glass of rum and water; or it may be, (for lying half awake a-bed is a famous field for mental argument) giving your sleeping spouse a sanguinary blow on the nose; and on striking a light, you find her, according to newspaper phraseology, "weltering in her gore."

A curtain lecture perhaps follows, which is at length interrupted by the braying of your nasal trumpet. The curtain lectures of a benedict's lifetime, I have little doubt, would form a not uninteresting volume; but I am afraid rather monotonous. They might consist of a course under the following heads. Lecture I. (this happens shortly after marriage.) Upon the heinousness of the guilt of dining and taking tea from home, and not coming home till evening—having met an old cronic whom you have not seen since boyhood. Lecture II. Upon the crime of paying too much attention to somebody else at a party. Your wife has walked home with you, with merely the tips of her fingers on your arm, without speaking a word; or has ridden in your carriage, sitting opposite you, or by your side, at the most extreme corner, without opening her lips. You get into your house, she calls for Betty to bring the chamber candlestick, and straightway goes to bed, without asking you to accompany her,—all this time "nursing her wrath to keep it warm." Your inquiries if she is not well, fatigued, or whether any one has offended her, are only answered by looks. After she has thus left you, as she imagines, to your reflections, the temptation of a snug fire, warm slippers, a stiff glass of toddy, and the last new novel or magazine assails you, and perhaps hours pass in the delightful society of books; the volume falling from your hand into the hearth, and your nodding drowsiness, at last send you to bed; then, in addition to what would have been inflicted under the prior offence only, you will be edified by Lecture III., On your growing indifference to the wife of your choice. In the ordinary matrimonial course, Lecture IV. would be

On the sin of getting groggy at home, with some old friends.—Lecture V. On the deadly sin of enjoying your grog abroad, and coming home ditto. Perhaps on the next night, being worn out by a day's illness, the effect consequent on the before-mentioned cause, and wanting a good night's rest to refresh you, you are entertained with Lecture VI. On your indifference to your own health, considering that you are now not your own, but your wife's. The subjects indeed are innumerable, upon which a wife takes upon herself to be the instructress of her husband. The lectures are generally carried on in the interrogative-without-waiting-for-an-answer style, and are interspersed with sundry half-articulated, sleepyish "Yes mi dears"—"No mi dears"—"D'n know mi dears," which at last verge into an unmeaning guttural enunciation. For an excellent specimen, I would refer to "Don Juan," canto I. stanzas cxlv. to clvii., though I must say for the honour of the British community, "there are not many who quarrel like Donna Julia and Aphonso."

[Here our correspondent, in a passage perfectly justifiable, but which might be misconstrued, is led into a transition on the subject of "gaming-houses."]

* * a lapsus penna, these West-end dens, for such they are. The company that frequent them are a medley of all ranks and classes, men of fashion and men of no fashion, beaux and lovers, withered veterans and beardless striplings, peers and bankrupts, blacklegs and greenhorns, swindlers and 'prentice boys. The object that each of these has intently in view is, the universal employment of mankind, in different manners, and, in every shade of varying method, to enrich himself, at the expence of his neighbour; in this case it is carried on by the treacherous card and the deceitful dice. Rouge et noir—the red and the black—the red flush of success, and the black depth of despair, is the character of the game, whatever be the method of play. Yet there are some master spirits, if I may so say, ever to be seen at these temples of the blind goddess, who, whether they win or lose, preserve the coolness of men sitting at ease among their families. To arrive at this state of mind, is the perfection of their art. To stifle the voice of nature, to dissipate her sympathies, to trample on her affections, to make a God and a religion of the spirit of plunder, to have read the prime article of which forbids us to feel for others, and to give up even the privilege of feeling for ourselves. This is the perfection of the gamester's art. Neither satisfied with success, nor contented with ruin, the perfect gambler must put away his heart, or submit it to that operation, by which flesh is made as hard as iron. In a professed gambler we behold talent without admiration, age without reverence, youth without feeling, and rank without respect.

Respect and reverence for rank and high birth are fast failing from the face of our social system. Nature thought that the aristocracy of birth had had its day, and now times are turning to an aristocracy of talent. All whom it may concern, must e'en put up with this state of things, and console themselves as best they can.

Well, well, the world will turn upon its axis,
And all mankind turn with it, heads and tails,
And live and starve, and pay their taxes;
And as the veering wind shifts up its sails, some stubborn spirits will place themselves in defiance of the innovating waves of time and manners, and, like the rock, will remain steadfast till undermined with the fluctuations of the sea. Then will they fall and be lost, buried, merged into the depths of the past, and the place thereof shall know them no more. What will they leave behind? "Perhaps a name."

And saith Juliet, "What's in a name?" Ay, but then it was the impassioned desire of love that dictated the question, which is intended to comprise its own answer. She was an interested party, as a lawyer would have it, and therefore not a competent witness. She was anxious to annihilate the barriers which the name and lineage of Romeo had cast between her and her lover. But, says Pro, it was put into the mouth of the passionate Juliet, by the sober reflective Shakespeare, as his own opinion, after due consideration, and weighing of the subject in all its bearings. To this Con replies, that we must not always take for granted, that an author gives his own opinion in his works; besides, Shakespeare had a character to clothe and adorn. The dry bone of a name was before him, and he had to breathe with poetic inspiration upon it, and create the ideal flesh and blood; the mind and faculties of the beautiful love-lorn Juliet. "Oh that I were a glove upon that hand, that I might touch that cheek," exclaimed Romeo, and the most lovely creature in nature, nay, in imagination, rises in our mind. To a fruitful fancy, the pleasure of reading such passages as this is far superior to that of seeing it performed, even by the most exquisite woman, both in talent and in person; because every one has his own opinion of the beau-ideal of beauty, and to each would Juliet be the most beautiful according to his own fancy. Detached passages of Shakespeare, or of any other book, as well as the bible, may be quoted and perverted, to support theories or opinions diametrically opposite their meaning, when taken with the context. "Stolen waters," saith Satan to the thief, "are sweet; and bread eaten in secret is pleasant." He leaves out the prefatory words, "the foolish woman saith;" and if we trace the tragedy of the ill-fated lovers to its conclusion, it will be found that it is altogether calculated to demonstrate the truth, that "a name" is of vital importance, for it is because of this "name" that Romeo and Juliet, and her brother, are killed, and out of which all the tragic incidents of the play arise.

Only imagine if Napoleon had been born to parents of the name of Snooks,—Shakespeare Higgins, or Milton Higginbottom,—would they ever have married such names to immortal verse? Had the parties been ever so well agreed, the public would have forbidden the banns.

Depend on't, the smooth euphonic designations by which all our celebrated men are known, have been a negative, if not a positive cause of their success. The wittings of the "folio of four pages" were in hysterics, because Captain Ross has chosen to call the newly discovered continent "Boothia," and say, that if his patron's name had been Snooks, the appellation Snookia would have been the consequence. I do not like things to be taken for granted in this manner; the brave Captain has, no doubt, more common sense than to have committed such a blunder. As it is, "Boothia" has a very pleasant, smooth, Grecian sound, and is of the same family with the classic names Boetia and Bithynia, and kept in countenance by Bohemia and Batavia. It has been a custom from time immemorial, for conquerors and discoverers to continue the names of their native country to the new possession. So did the Romans with Britain, and from Britain they have been transported to America, which, as to its names, is but a second edition of Great Britain, following the good old custom of naming a son after his father.

It indeed shows a great barrenness of invention thus to "filch from a country its good name," and transfer it to another. I had rather the new continent had been called even Snookia than New Somers Town, Nova Pimlico, or some other of the same stamp. The narrowest lane in our crowded city has been commemorated by Captain Parry in Cape Turn-again, and the frost-bitten cit is reminded of the warm smoke and comfortable fog of Turn-again lane. We leave it to antiquarians to decide, but we imagine that this designation must have arisen from some such romantic incident as the Highland legend of "Hell Bridge." There are many more Turn-again lanes than that which is so designated, par excellence, in the first city in the world; and many a time and oft are the inhabitants of these strait streets entertained with the oaths and curses of draymen and jarvies, carters and cabmen, disputing like lawyers as to who entered the street first to a moment, who should turn back, or back out, and who should not. Often as stiff-necked as the before-referred-to Highlanders, neither will yield, and when jarvie meets drayman, "then comes the tug of war"—the war of words, of oaths and curses, imprecations and appellations obscene, as if hell had for the time been let loose upon earth; and it is only because they are walled by houses hundreds of feet high, instead of being on a rock that height, that they do not dash each other to atoms, after the same fashion.

While the public streets are of these dimensions, while the citizens are as niggardly of a few feet of earth, as if the city had been built in honour of King John, surnamed Lack-land—while streets, I say, are of their present narrow dimensions, the only preventative for such scenes would be to place a "proper authority" at each end, who, with chronometer in hand, timed from the Greenwich Observatory, should watch the precise moment that the tip of a horse's nose enters the lane, and so decide in case of dispute, and compel the parties to abide by his decision. Government would, I think, pay attention to a petition to this effect, as it would give rise to an immense quantity of very useful patronage in the offices of Judges of the Court of Coachmen, Cabmen, and Carters. All the watchmakers in the town would certainly sign the petition, as everyone would have the "chance" of getting the contract to supply the chronometers which would be required.

Talking of watchmakers, it was a sad blunder on the astronomers at Greenwich to be a minute too late in letting the ball fall, which was to regulate all the ship chronometers in the port of London. How many shipwrecks may this not occasion to those who have gone on their voyage without having the mistake rectified? This minute too late makes the mariner a mile out of his reckoning; and what dangers may not lurk within the space of a mile—shoals, sand-banks, sunken rocks, breakers, and all the perils of the ocean! It would be no harm to be a mile farther from danger, but it is as likely that it should be a mile nearer, or that mile may bring them into the very jaws of danger. The sailor may now be whistling at the maintop, enjoying his can of grog, or singing "All in the Downs," in supposed safety. The landsman, confiding in the skill of the seaman, and sympathising in his apparent security, sits at ease, and, perhaps, passes the tedious hours in reading the shipwreck in 'Don Juan,' little thinking that he is about to partake of the same horrors. The females are chattering and sewing, talking of past pleasures and imagining future. The officer, confiding in the accuracy of his calculations, little supposing the treachery of his data, retires to his cabin and repose. The "faithful watch patrols the deck" and keeps a look out, as he imagines, for mere form's sake. The silence of safety and confidence pervades the "thing of life." "Breakers a-head!" is shouted by the watch in a voice of terror and astonishment.

Reader, my steel-pen gets scratchy and restive. I must pretend to have been in a dream, and that the shout of the ship-watch was that of the watch in the street.

HISTORY OF SUGAR.

(From Mr Gall's Literary Autobiography.)

I was led to investigate the History of Sugar by a casual remark of the late Sir Joseph Banks, one day at breakfast. I forgot now how the conversation arose, but he inquired whether I had met with any of the remains of the sugar cane in Sicily, mentioning that it had been previously produced in the island of Crete, but the sugar manufactured in that island was more crystallized than ours, and was called, from the place where it was boiled, sugar of Candi, otherwise sugar Candy, and it seems never to have been prepared better there than in that form.

It is certain, however, that in the year 1148 considerable quantities of the article were produced in the island of Sicily, and the Venetians traded in it; but I have met with no evidence to support the Essai de l'Histoire du Commerce, in which the author says that the Saracens brought the sugar cane from India to Sicily.

"The ancient Greeks and Romans," says Dr William Douglas, "used honey only for sweetening." And Paulus Aegineta, who calls it cane-honey, says it came originally from China, by the East Indies and Arabia, into Europe. Salmasius says, however, that it had been used in Arabia nine hundred years before. But it is certain that sugar was only used in syrups, conserves, and such like Arabian medicinal compositions, when it was first introduced into the west of Europe; but Mr Wotton, in his 'Reflexions upon Ancient and Modern Learning,' says that the sugar cane was not anciently unknown, since it grows naturally in Arabia and Indostan; but so little was the old world acquainted with its delicious juice, that "some of the ablest men," says he, "doubted whether it were a dew like manna, or the juice of the plant itself." It is, however, certain that raw sugar was used in Europe before the discovery of America. Herrera, the ancient historian, observes that sugar grew formerly in Valencia, brought thither by the Moors; from thence it was transmitted to Grenada, afterwards to the Canary Islands, and lastly, to the Spanish West Indies.

About the year 1419, the Portuguese planted the island of Madeira with sugar canes from Sicily; and Giovanni Baterno, in an English translation of his book in 1606, on the 'Causes of the Magnificence and Grandeur of Cities,' mentions the excellence of the sugar cane of Madeira, for which it was transported to the West Indies; and there can be no doubt that Madeira was one of the first islands of the Atlantic Ocean in which this important article was earliest manufactured.

In 1503, two ships arrived at Camperre, laden with sugar from the Canary Islands. As yet, it is said, no sugar canes were produced in America, but soon they were transplanted from those islands to the Brazils.

It was about this time (1503) that the art of refining sugar was discovered by a Venetian, who is said to have realized a hundred thousand crowns by the invention. Our ancestors made use of it as it came in juice from the canes, but most commonly used honey in preference.

From the Brazils and the Canaries sugar canes were brought and planted in the island of Hispaniola, and in the same year sugar was brought from the Brazils into Europe. The commodity was then very dear, and used only on rare occasions, honey being till then the general ingredient for sweetening of meats and drinks.

When sugar was introduced into this country first is doubtful; but in 1526 it was imported from St Lucar, in Spain, by certain merchants of Bristol, who brought the article which had been imported there from the Canary Islands.

In the year 1641 the sugar cane was imported from the Brazils into Barbadoes, and being found to thrive, sugar mills were established. A Colonel James Drax, who began the cultivation with about three hundred pounds, declared that he would never return to England till he had made ten thousand a year; and Colonel Thomas Modyford was still higher in his expectations.

It was from the island of Barbadoes that the slave trade began. The first planters finding such immense profit, induced the merchants at home to send ships with assorted cargoes for the product of the island, but they found it impossible to manage the cultivation of sugar by white people in so hot a climate. The example of the Portuguese gave birth to the negro slave trade, and it flourished till abolished by Act of Parliament; but in that age it was a most flourishing business, and the ports of London and Bristol had the main supply. Barbadoes, in the year 1569, attained its utmost pitch of prosperity. In a pamphlet, entitled 'Trade Revived,' it is spoken of as "having given to many men of low degree vast fortunes, equal to noblemen; that upwards of a hundred sail of ships there yearly find employment, by carrying goods and passengers thither, and bringing thence other commodities, whereby seamen are bred and custom increased, our commodities vended, and manie thousands employed therein, and in refining our sugar at home, which we formerly had from other countries."

In 1670 our sugar colonies drew the means of support from what were then our North American colonies, particularly New York, Pennsylvania, and the Jerseys; and the first time that sugar was made subject to taxation at home, was in 1685. Like other merchandise, it was previously subject to a five per cent poundage.

In 1799, the importation of sugar from the West India Islands was so great, that there was a relaxation of our colonial policy towards them; and they were permitted to carry their sugar to any part south of Cape Finisterre, without being obliged to land them first in Great Britain. From this time sugar has continued to increase, and it is needless to pursue its history further; it was then a great article of trade, and, as an ingredient, the consumption has been continually increasing. Whether the cultivation has exceeded the wants of the commercial world, or that the new colonies have been found more fertile than the old, I cannot pretend to say; but at this moment, the proprietors of the sugar estates are suffering at all hands, and their greatest calamity is not the emancipation of their slaves.

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 14th, to Tuesday the 21st October.

BEAUTY OF THE FALLING LEAVES.—MERITS OF ELDER WINE.

[From the Mirror of the Month, one of the numerous elegant publications which have appeared of late years on the successive beauties of the seasons.]

The year has reached its grand climacteric, and is "fast falling into the sere, the yellow leaf." Every day a flower drops from out the wreath that binds its brow—not to be renewed. Every hour the sun looks more and more askance upon it, and the winds, those summer flatterers, come to it less fawningly. Every breath shakes down showers of its leafy attire, leaving it gradually barer and barer, for the blasts of winter to blow through it. Every morning and evening takes away from it a portion of that light which gives beauty to its life, and chills it more and more into that torpor which at length constitutes its temporary death. And yet October is beautiful still, no less "for what it gives than what it takes away;" and even what it gives during the act of taking away.

Let us begin our observations with an example of the latter. The whole year cannot produce a sight fraught with more rich and harmonious beauty than that which the woods and groves present during this month, notwithstanding, or rather in consequence of, the daily decay of their summer attire; and at no other season can any given spot of landscape be seen to such advantage as a mere picture. This, therefore, is, above all others, the month for the artist to ply his delightful task, of fixing the fugitive beauties of the scene; which, however, he must do quickly, for they fade away, day by day, as he looks upon them.

And yet, if it were represented faithfully, an extensive plantation of forest trees now presents a variety of colours and of tints that would scarcely be considered as natural in a picture, any more than many of the sunsets of September would. Among those trees which retain their green hues, the fir tribe are the principal; and these, spiring up among the deciduous ones, now differ from them no less in colour than they do in form. The alders, too, and the poplars, limes, and horse-chestnuts, are still green,—the hues of their leaves not undergoing much change as long as they remain on the branches. Most of the other forest trees have put on each its peculiar livery; the planes and sycamores presenting every variety of tinge, from bright yellow to brilliant red; the elms being, for the most part, of a rich sunny amber, varying according to the age of the tree and the circumstances of its soil, &c.; the beeches having deepened into a warm glowing brown, which the young ones will retain all the winter, and till the new spring leaves push the present ones off; the oaks varying from a dull dusky green to a deep russet, according to their ages; and the Spanish chestnuts, with their noble embowering heads, glowing like clouds of gold.

As for the hedge-rows this month, they still retain all their effect as a part of a general and distant view; and when looked at more closely, though they have lost nearly all their flowers, the various fruits that are spread out upon them for the winter food of the birds, make them little less gay than they were in spring and summer. The most conspicuous of these are the red hips of the wild rose; the dark purple bunches of the luxuriant blackberry; the brilliant scarlet and green berries of the nightshade; the bluish-looking fruit of the hawthorn; the blue sloes, covered with their soft tempting-looking bloom; the dull bunches of the woodbine; and the sparkling holly-berries.

Drawing towards the home scene, we find the orchard by no means devoid of interest this month. The apples are amongst the last to shed their leaves; so that they retain them yet; and in some cases of late fruit, they retain that too,—looking as bright and tempting as ever it did. The cherry trees, too, are more beautiful at this time than ever they have been since their brief period of blossoming, on account of the brilliant scarlet which their leaves assume,—varying, however, from that colour all the way through the warm ones, up to the bright yellow. There are also two species of the plum, the purple and the white damson, which have only now reached their maturity.

The elders, that frequently skirt the orchard, or form part of its bounding hedge, are also now loaded with their broad outspread bunches of purple and white berries, and instantly call up (to those who are lucky enough to possess such an association at all) that ideal of old English snugness and comfort, the farm-house chimney-corner, on a cold winter's Saturday night; with the jug of hot elder-wine on the red brick hearth; the embers crackling and blazing; the toasted bread, and the long-stemmed glasses on the two-flapped oak table; and the happy ruddy faces of the young ones around, looking expectantly towards the comely and portly dame for their weekly treat.

The gentle (query gentle) reader will be good enough to remember that I am now speaking of old times; that is to say, twenty years ago; and will not suppose me ignorant enough to imagine that they can possibly know what I mean either by "elder-wine," or a "chimney-corner." But though the merits of mulled claret, an ottoman, and a hearth rug, shall never be called in question by me, I must be excused for remembering that there was a time when I knew no better than the above; and that I have not grown wise enough to cease sighing for the return of that time ever since it has passed away. Accordingly, though I would on no account be supposed to permit elder-wine to pass my actual palate, I could not resist the above occasion of tasting it once more in imagination; and I must say, that the flavour of it is quite as agreeable as it was, before claret became a common-place.

THE BROOM GIRL.

BAVARIA'S daughter comes to seek
Some pence in London streets and lanes;
Few English words her tongue can speak,
Save those her little song contains.

From home's endearments forced to part,
For one last kiss her face she lifted;
And bracing up her infant heart,
With little went, save blessings, gifted.

The village gathered in a ring,
Sadly the exile swarm beholding,
And mothers, touched with sorrow's sting,
Press'd close the babes their arms were folding.

The work stood still—the meal was left,
That day was offered up to pain,
And each of some fond tie bereft,
Retired to dream farewell again.

But, 'neath the curtain of the sky—
And, 'neath the morning gale that blew them,
The pilgrim train forgot to sigh,
And felt youth's soul of hope renew them.

Their voices burst—the hills resound them,
Some paused to eat, and some went straying;
And as the landscape widened round them,
It found the little things a-playing.

They talked of arts that nourish ease—
Of Alps to heaven their summits raising—
Of customs—costumes—ships and seas,
Till all the traveller's zeal was blazing.

Till they, like fields from winter's wreck,
Grew gay again, sweet fancies spinning;
And when they stepp'd the vessel's deck,
The world seem'd spread to wait their winning.

To the Great Babylon they beat
The untiring march, their broom-load bearing,
By day the turfy bank their seat,
By night the cow-shed cover sharing.

And in great London's heart the band
A second time love's bonds undoing,
Exchanged adieus with waving hand,
And went, with songs, subsistence wooing.

How, hour by hour, the shifting scene
Lay life's worst features bare to view;
And how the rush of truths so keen
Moulded God's precious work anew,—

How lines on many a brow were writ
Of wringing care that pity craves—
How many a once-mild eye is lit
With fire it brought not o'er the waves,—

We pause not on:—but oft have yearn'd
O'er some lone straggler in the ways,
Whose sadly smiling face upturn'd
Bore, all unharmed, its mountain traits.

So young, so learn'd in human dealing—
So lone—so poor—so torn, and tried—
Whom God, with innocency sealing,
Still manifestly walked beside.

HINDOO SUPERSTITION.

[From the Oriental Annual for 1835, (just published,) containing the usual information on Eastern subjects, from the pen of Mr. Caunter, illustrated by the clear pencil of Daniell.]

One morning, as I was about to quit my tent, which was pitched a short distance without the walls of Delhi, in a fine tope of tamarind trees, I perceived a gossein standing with his back against a broken pillar, and at a short distance from me. He had assumed that attitude which betokened an expectation of receiving something more tangible than mere courtesy from the benevolence of myself, or any other person whom he might thus silently condescend to supplicate; for with these devotees the social order of things is frequently inverted: they consider the recipient the benefactor when of their own community, or the giver the beneficiary when of any other. As I came near him, I perceived that he had a thick iron rod passed through his cheeks, riveted at each end, from which a circular piece of iron depended, inclosing the chin. Though the rod passed quite through the tongue, it did not materially affect the articulation; he spoke with some difficulty, but was nevertheless perfectly intelligible. He was an elderly man, of gentle manners and mild aspect, without being offensively filthy, as the members of this strange tribe so frequently are. I invited him to enter the tent, which he immediately did, and to my surprise was very communicative. The iron through his tongue and cheeks had been a penitential infliction to which he had submitted in consequence of the breach of a vow. He declined my invitation to seat himself, but stood erect with his back against the pole of the tent, and entered freely into conversation upon the strange events of his life, answering all my questions with the most perfect readiness; and he appeared gratified at giving me any information, either respecting himself, or the singular customs of the religious fraternity to which he belonged. He stated that he was then under a vow to remain erect for the space of fifteen years. During thirteen of this time he had either stood or walked; yet he suffered little or no inconvenience, sleeping every night in the jungles with his back against a tree, as soundly as the most voluptuous man could upon a bed of down. He confessed, however, that sometime after he had commenced the performance of this strange vow he was obliged to be supported with cords when inclined to sleep, and his feet swelled to such a painful degree that he could scarcely stand or walk. After a time, however, this inconvenience ceased, when the performance of his penance became no longer either a pain or a grief to him.

This was not the only infliction to which he had voluntarily subjected himself; the fingers of his left hand were so completely bent upwards from the palm, as to form a right angle with the back of the hand, and were thus rendered entirely useless. He further told me that he had been suspended from the branch of a tree during three hundred and sixty-five revolutions of the earth, as he expressed it, or a whole year. He was suspended by a cord with a strong bamboo crossing the end, upon which he sate, while a strap confined him to the rope, and thus prevented his falling; this he described as the severest infliction to which he had ever submitted. I gave him a trifling gratuity, with which he departed perfectly satisfied.

The self-tortures inflicted by these fanatics are entirely voluntary; they are, like many of the Roman Catholic penances, merely acts of supererogation, and are not necessarily enjoined in the Hindoo ritual, as will appear from the Mahabharat, a work esteemed almost of divine authority among the Hindoos. "Those men who perform severe maceration of the flesh, not authorised by the Sastra, are possessed of hypocrisy and pride; they are overwhelmed with lust, passion, and tyrannic strength. Those fools torment the spirit that is in the body, and myself who am in them."

After we quitted Ivanpoor, nothing occurred worth recording until we came in sight of Benares,—that celebrated city, called the splendid, containing the most renowned specimens of Hindoo learning to be found in Hindostan, a more detailed account of which will be found in the first volume of this work. As we approached the city, we were induced to moor our budgerow and land, in order that we might witness the Churrack Pooja—one of those revolting inflictions which some particular order of devotees undergo, together with such unhappy Hindoos as have had the misfortune to lose their caste; the former to enhance their claims to a blessed immortality, the latter to recover that temporal superiority over a large portion of their fellow beings which the well-known distinction of caste confers. A man frequently loses his caste by circumstances over which he can have no control: such as the casual contact of a pariah whom he might not have known to have been within his vicinity, or eating out of a polluted vessel, though not at the time aware of its pollution.

I once happened to be present when a sepooy of high caste, falling down in a fit, the military surgeons ordered one of the pariah attendants of the regimental hospital to throw some water over him, in consequence of which none of his class would associate with him, and he was considered to have forfeited the privileges of clanship. The result was, that as soon as the afternoon's parade was over, he put the muzzle of his musket to his head, and blew out his brains. Although, however, the distinction upon which the Hindoo so highly prides himself is often thus easily forfeited, it is not to be regained but by undergoing either severe mortification, or some terrible infliction, which happened to be the case in the instance I am about to record.

On landing, we found a large concourse of people assembled, and forming a circle of about twenty yards in diameter, in the centre of which was a strong pole fixed upright in the ground. On the top of this pole a transverse bamboo, sufficiently strong to sustain the weight of a man, was attached to a movable pivot, so that it could be swung either vertically or circularly, as occasion might require. The insertion of the transverse bamboo was about one-third part from the end, leaving two-thirds on the other side, to which was attached a cord that reached the ground. At the extremity of the shorter division was a pulley from which a longer cord depended about the size of a man's middle finger, having two ends, to which were affixed a pair of bright steel hooks. Both the vertical and cross poles were of bamboo, which is extremely tough and difficult to break. When the apparatus was prepared, a Brahmin, who is usually the functionary on these occasions, advanced to the centre of the area, and having anointed the points of the hooks with a small portion of ghee, from a sacred vessel especially set apart for this holy purpose, he beckoned to the person about to undergo this trying ordeal. The penitentiary was a handsome man, in the full vigour of manhood, and had lost his caste by eating interdicted food during a voyage from Calcutta to China, whither he had gone as servant to the captain of the ship.

On perceiving the Brahmin's signal, he advanced without the slightest indication of alarm, but rather with an expression of joy on his countenance, at the idea of being restored to that position among the members of his own peculiar caste, which he had unhappily forfeited. He was stripped to the loins, and had nothing on but the cummerband and a pair of white linen trousers, which reached about half way down his thighs. He was a muscular man, and rather tall;—he came forward with a firm step. Upon reaching the place of expiation, he knelt down under the cord to which the two bright hooks were attached. Gently raising his hands, and clasping them together in a posture of devotion, he continued for a few moments silent, then suddenly elevating his head, declared himself ready to undergo the penance that should release him from the pains of his recent pollution. The moment his assent was pronounced, a burst of acclamation was heard from the surrounding multitude. The officiating Brahmin then took the hooks, and with a dexterity that showed he was no novice in his sacred vocation, slipped them under the dorsal muscles just beneath the shoulders. The operation was so instantaneously and so adroitly managed, that scarcely a drop of blood followed. Not a muscle of the man's countenance stirred; all his features seemed stiffened into an expression of resolute endurance, which imparted a sort of sublime sternness to every lineament. Not even the slightest quiver of his lip was perceptible, and his eye glistened with thrilling lustre as he raised his head after the hooks had been fixed. His resolution was as painful as it was astonishing. At a certain signal from the presiding functionary, he started from his recumbent posture and stood with his head erect, calmly awaiting the consummation of his dreadful penalty. After a short interval he was suddenly raised into the air and swung round with the most frightful velocity by a number of half frantic Hindoos, who had stationed themselves for this purpose at the other extremity of the transverse pole. They ran round the area at their utmost speed, yelling and screaming, while their cries were rendered still more discordant by a deafening accompaniment of tom-toms, tobries, kurtauls, and other instruments so familiar to Indian devotees, and which are indispensable on these and similar occasions, producing anything rather than "a concord of sweet sounds."

The velocity with which the poor man was swung round, prevented any one from accurately observing his countenance, though, during one or two pauses made by his tormentors, who became shortly fatigued with the violence of their exertions, there was no visible expression of suffering. Had he uttered a cry, it would have at once neutralized the effect of the penance, though I do not think it could have been heard through the din by which this terrible ceremonial was accompanied. The ministering Brahmins, however, are said to have a perception of sound so acute on these occasions, that the slightest cry of the victim never escapes their ear.

After this barbarous ceremony had continued for about twenty minutes, the man was let down, the hooks extracted from his back, and he really seemed little or nothing the worse for the torture he must have undergone. He walked steadily forward amid the acclamations of the surrounding multitude, and followed by his friends, who earnestly offered him their congratulations on the recovery of his caste.

Accidents of a very serious nature have been occasionally known to happen during the infliction of these fearful penances, though such occurrences are, I believe, rare. Should the cord chance to break, the suspended person is propelled forward under the influence of such a powerful impulse, that he is invariably killed on the spot. When this occurs, it is imputed to the magnitude of his sins, and he is immediately cast upon the funeral pile, neither pitied nor lamented. I have heard a circumstance related by a person once present at the ceremony of the Churrack Pooja when the muscles of the back gave way, the penitent being of considerable bulk, and on his being immediately lowered, the mischief was so extensive, that the wretched man died soon after he was released from the hooks. These things are really too dreadful to be permitted in a civilized country; but in India custom is a positive and even a paramount law, and is therefore implicitly followed. "Immemorial custom," says their imaginary law-giver, "is transcendent, approved in the sacred scripture and in the codes of divine legislators; let every man, therefore, of the three principal classes, who has a due reverence for the supreme spirit which dwells in him, diligently and constantly observe immemorial custom."

"IT IS BUT."

For the London Journal.

FROM the days of Shakspeare to the present time, it has constantly been written and repeated that "Because is a woman's reason;" but, hitherto, we have heard of no word or words that have been particularly denominated "A man's reason," nor do we ourselves pretend to have discovered any phrase that will serve the purpose but such as is of epicene or doubtful gender, and applicable to both sexes. "It is But" forms a reason which is seized upon, and applied with equal avidity, by male and female, of all ranks and stations. It is wonderful the power these three little words have, in soothing conscience and lulling it to rest.

The man of rank and fortune, when he is about to give hundreds for "an Arabian," or thousands for some work of art, which he must mortgage part of his estate to procure, says "It is But" seven thousand, and the present owner gave much more for it. Excellent reason!—yet, for no better, many a younger son has been deprived of a comfortable independence. The merchant, when he is inclined to speculate beyond what prudence suggests to be right, says, if the speculation fail, "It is But" three thousand pounds lost, and to make it up I can dismiss two or three of the servants: the children can go to a less expensive school, or be kept altogether at home." This is promptly decided upon; but he allows himself no time to scan the consequences which will inevitably follow his measures. Such a disarrangement of a family will undoubtedly produce years of discomfort and misery. His object is to get back his money;—he gains it; but, in the meantime (to state one result only, by way of sample), his wife has lost her temper for life, and when that is gone where is his happiness? By the poor man these words are used (oh! melancholy sight) as he staggers back into the beer-shop to spend his remaining pittance, declaring "It is But" sixpence—not worth keeping. And forthwith he proceeds to pour into his burning throat what will only make it burn more. The sixpence thus destroyed, to worse than no purpose, would have bought as much bread, perhaps, as his family could eat in a day. Simple as the argument appears, its general application makes it of great importance to mankind. If my readers, particularly the female part, would look over their purchases for the last three months, and mark such as have been bought for no other reason than "It is But" a trifle, in many instances, I am certain, they would amount to one fourth of their expenditure, and, in some cases, to one third.

There is one class, who, compared with the rest of the world, make but little use of this sophistry; I mean professional people, with certain limited incomes. They contrive to live amongst those who are three or four times as rich as themselves, and to a common observer there is little or no difference between them in all exteriors, and it is possible that one may have as much real comfort as the other. The secret is this,—the man of small fortune has long since learnt to dispense with the "It is But." There were two families, and in each three daughters. Mrs Jackson often wondered how the Miss Wilsons managed to be so neat and fashionable in their appearance, for it was well-known their father was not rich. She declared she spent a great deal of money on her girls, but the effect produced certainly did not equal the Wilsons. Mrs Jackson took the earliest opportunity to endeavour to learn the cause of the difference: Mrs Jackson candidly told her the amount of the yearly sum she allowed her daughters for dress. "Bless me!" exclaimed Mrs J., "is it possible that so little as that will buy them more than shoes and bonnets? Mine have three times that sum; and their father always gives them several pounds each as a Christmas-box; and after all, that they should appear worse dressed than their neighbours is really provoking." "There is one rule," said Mrs Wilson, "I have insisted on my children adhering to, which is never to buy anything they do not want, because 'It is But' so and so."

Money is not the only valuable possession these words are employed to get rid of. How much does time, which is "every man's estate," suffer from them! Many months, yet, years, of some lives have been trifled away; true it is, the evil has been effected by half hours, and quarters, but the loss is scarcely less on that account. If a man is compelled to give away a thousand pounds, it makes but little difference whether it is taken from him by sixpences, or by five shillings at a time. How few people of fortune attend to any useful or necessary employment before eleven o'clock in the day. Walter Scott is a bright example of a contrary practice: from six to eleven in the morning was the time he devoted to writing and study; a whole world has felt and acknowledged the pleasure and instruction it has derived from his economy of time. The tradesman who has risen later than usual, exclaims "It is But" half an hour till breakfast, which is too short a period to finish anything in; and, therefore, according to his reasoning, nothing ought to be begun. He afterwards discovers that many little arrangements may have been begun and ended in the half hour.

The young lady who idles away small portions of time, because "It is But" a few minutes till the arrival of something or other which she is expecting, would do well to turn her attention to the proper application of these odd minutes: a short trial would convince her of the many useful things that may be effected by it.

I have a young acquaintance who can play, for hours together, a succession of waltzes and quadrilles, and she has assured me, that they were most of them acquired during odd-quarters of hours before breakfast, or whilst waiting for dinner. She has advanced considerably in my estimation since I have known this proof of her wisdom in "taking care of the minutes." An officer who served in the Peninsular war, made very considerable progress in the Spanish and German languages, by devoting to them only those moments which would have been spent by others in "waiting," as it is generally termed.

It would be an easy task to multiply examples of the use and misuse of small portions of time and money; but these hints, it is believed, will suggest to the mind of every reader, capable of self-improvement, with the help of the congenial variation of the old proverb, "Take care of the minutes, and the hours will take care of themselves."

V. V. V.

[There is a great deal of good sense in our correspondent's "It is But." It may be as well, however, to add, that any principle driven to a formal excess, may become dangerous and a "snare," tying up the human conscience too painfully, and hazarding a "bursting out" in the other extreme. It is a good thing to take care of the "It is But" in nineteen cases out of twenty; say, if you will, twenty-nine out of thirty; but let us have an "It is But" once and away, to refresh one's self-denial, and keep us in heart with ourselves and charity with others. We are bound to confess (like honest teachers) that we are not without an eye to our own impulses in this particular. We cannot afford, for instance, to lay out money in books (our great temptation); and yet if we did not occasionally treat ourselves to a shilling or eighteen-penny enormity on a book-stall, we should inevitably grow carking and sad, and we flatter ourselves that our readers would suffer also.

Nevertheless, the principle should be taken far more care of, than the indulgence. What our correspondent says of time, and of hours before breakfast, and half hours, is excellent. A wit of our acquaintance (who likes a truth highly coloured) says, that he read the whole of 'Rapun's History of England' through, merely by devoting to the perusal of it those moments which elapsed after his sisters had told him they were ready to walk out!!]

GHOST-READING OF OUR ANCESTORS.

[From the Latin of Camerarius, previously noticed. The old spelling has been retained, for the greater venerableness of perusal. The story ensuing, is the one which Mr Keats has told so beautifully in his poem entitled 'Lamia.']

The learned Budeus reporteth a storie, or poetical fiction, taken out of Philostratus in the life of Apollonius, as followeth. A yong man of Lycia, called Menippus, of some five and twenty years of age, having a reasonable good wit, a faire stature, a pleasaunt and youthful face, was thought of all to have won the favour of a woman stranger, who seemed faire and verie gallante; besides she made herself verie rich: but all this was nothing, though all men thought it a great matter. As Menippus was walking one day all alone in the way to Cenchree, a spirit, (it was the wicked spirit), comes to him in the habit of a woman, and taking him by the hand, sayd unto him, That she had of a long time bene in love with him: that she was a Phoenician, dwelling in one of the suburbs of Corinth, and named it. If thou wilt come thither, Menippus (quoth she), thou wilt take singular delight to heare me sing; thou shalt have wine the best that ever was tasted, thou shalt live there in all securitie without feare of any fellow rivale, I will passe all my time with thee, and we will live faire and faire together. This young man, allured with the bait of such language (though he was otherwise a good resolute philosopher, but loose and given to follow women), conveyed himself in the evening to this womann's house, and had the companie of her (as commonie such people used to do), not mistrusting but that she was indeed what she seemed to be. Apollonius being come to Corinth, and measuring Menippus by the eie, as an image-worker would an image, after he had looked upon him a long time, he sayd unto him, Alas! faire lad, so much desired of faire ladies, know this, that thou nourishest a snake in thy bosome, and a snake nourishest thee. Menippus amazed at this word, Apollonius went on saying, But in truth, Menippus, this woman is none of thine, and dost thou think she loves thee? Yea, marrie, answered Menippus, and with great affectione. By this reckoning (replies Apollonius), thou shouldest marrie her, and it shall be most honestly done, in my opinion, to take her for thy wife, seeing she loves none but thee; but tell me, I pray thee, when shall the wedding be? Verie shortly, answers Menippus, and peradventure to-morrow. Well, the day being set downe, Apollonius remembered it most carefullie. So the guests being all come, and set at the table, Apollonius failed not to be there in time, and then turning about to the companie, Where is the faire bride (quoth he), for whom you make all this good cheer? There she is, answered Menippus, who, blushing, begins to stand up. Apollonius going on, But I pray thee Menippus (quoth he), this vessel of gold and of silver, and all the stuffe this chamber is furnisht with, is it thine or not? It is the bride's, said Menippus; for I have nothing in the world that I can call mine but this, shewing his philosopher's gown which he had on. You will find in the end, replied Apollonius, that all these goodlie shews come from Tantalus garden, that is to say, are mere illusions. All the companie began to crie out, saying, We know that the Poet Homer speaks of those gardens, but we never went down to Hell to be able to tell more particular news of them. Yet for all that, answers Apollonius, you should account the spouse and all her provision a Tantalian garden, for there is not anything here that is firm, all is but smoke and dreams. And that you may know my words to be true, this fair bride is an Empuse, or Hag, one of those that glut themselves with the blood and flesh of those men they converse with. Whereat the Empuse began to say thus, Soft and faire friend, be not so cholericke; and therewith set a good face on the matter, as if she defied him and all that he had said; flouting all philosophers, and calling them poor dotting fellows. In the meanwhile the golden cups and all the vessels of silver (or that were taken for such) began to melt away at Apollonius' protestation. The servitors, the cooks, the pages, the carvers and other such officers were gone upon a sudden; and the Empuse herself began to pray Apollonius that he would not force her to tell what she was. But Apollonius would not so leave, but began to urge her so sore, that at last she confesseth herself a spirit and no bride: and that her purpose was to make Menippus fat, that afterwards she might eat him up. This is Philostratus tale.

Enagrus writeth, that the mother to the Emperour Mauritius would oftentimes tell how a certaine empuse or hag had taken Mauritius, being a suckling child, and carried him from one place to another with full purpose to have eaten him, but that she had not the power to do him any hurt. And Lylus Gyraldus saith, that some, to whom such women spirits have appeared in our time, have told him (and besides affirmeth he hath read it in authors), that of such spirits as these the Prophet speaketh in the 91st Psalm, where he maketh mention of the evil spirit that killeth men at noonday. We read in the historical collections of Suidas, that the empuse is a devilish hag sent from Proserpina, and appearing to poore distressed persons; and is called so, because it goeth but of one foot, the other being of brass, or made like an ass's foot. Manie thought, saies he, that these hags used to appear about noon, at such time as the funeral obsequies for the dead were performed, and that they used to bring them bread, wine, light, and silver. And at this day the Russians feare and reverence the noon-deville, who useth to walk like a widow that weareth mourning, at such time as they are cutting downe of their hay, and their harvest, breaking the mowers and reapers arms and legs, if they fall not downe to the ground upon their faces so soone as ever they see him. Philostratus, and after him Caelius Rodiginus write, That the ancients called these Empuses Lamia and Mormolyce, as who would say, witches and wolfe-snows. If we say that these Menippian loves are but fictions, tending to withdraw men from infamous thoughts and actions, let us adde thereto a true narration of that which hapned to Alexander of Alexandria, a wittnesse worthe of credite, as himself setteth down thus:—Being once sick at Rome, (saith he), as I lay in my bed broad waking, a verie faire womann (mee thought) appeared unto mee; looking upon her with mine eies wide open, I lay still a long time, much troubled, and not speaking a word, casting and discoursing with myself, whether I wakt or was in a dream, and whether it was a phantasie or a true sight that I saw. Feeling all my senses whole and perfit, and seeing the shape continue in the same being, I began to ask her who shee was; shee smiling and repeating the same words that I had spoken, as if shee had mockt mee, after shee had looked upon me a long while, vanish way. Thomas Erastus, a learned physician, witnesseth that in the time of the Emperour Maximilian the first, in the year 1503, such a like apparition was seene at a place near Ausbourg, resembling the abbess of Ettesteten, called Marguerite de Roth, which suffered itself to be seene and handled, yea and spake in plaine and significant terms to those that came neare unto it. I. Wier reporteth a memorabile storie of Magdalene de la Croix, an abbess in Spaine, whose place a phantasme held in church and elsewhere while she was with a wicked spirit that had married her.

For the rest, it cannot be denied, but that wicked spirits take upon them divers bodies, and may present certaine shapes to men's eyes, although they have not a perfect organical bodie as a man hath. Therefore it is no new or strange thing, if it fall out sometimes that profane persons, or such as be sick or troubled in their brain, have their senses deceived with divers and sundrie illusions, as it hath oftentimes happened in our age, and not long agoe.

There was within the memorie of our fathers as famous an enchanter and conjuror as anie could be, called John Faustus of Cundligen, a German. There is none in all Germanie, little or great, but can tell some tale or other of this wretch's illusions and magical tricks, who had learned the black art at Cracow in Polonia, where in those days it was taught in open schools.

Wier saith, that this Faustus was found dead by a bed-side, in a certain village within the duchie of Wirtemberg, having his neck broken, and the house, wherein he was, being beaten down at midnight. These are the rewards due to such wicked and most intolerable curiositie.

To speak more of Faustus, I have heard manie things reported by those that knew him, which do anew that he was an arch coziner and skilful negro-mancer, if the venerable trade of a most vaine and wretched man may be termed skill. Among other cozening tricks of his I will speak of one, ridiculous in shew, but most devilish in deed; for it discovereth how cunninglie and seriouslie (and that in such things as to us seem pleasant) the willie ensnare of mankind goeth about to destroy and overthrow us. And therefore the vanitie (or rather impietie) of those men is not to be suffered, who deriving some sport and pastime that may offend nobody (as they termed it) consider not in the meanwhile how they leave the alliance of God to enter acquaintance with an unreasonieable enemie, who walketh about like a roaring lion that he may devour them, lying in wait incessantly for his prey, like the cat when with close pawes and without any noise she watcheth for the mouse to saap at it, and crush it in peeces; for which cause Chrysostome said, "If wicked men say nothing to thee, yet thou hast the prince of wicked men who persecuteth man without any intermission. For what do they else but insinuate themselves into the devill's company, seeing they use exercises as it were with the furious enemie of their salvation, and leaving the standard of Jesus Christ, march under the banner of Sathan, as if there were truce proclaimed between them. But God, who hath created men to this end, that they should be soldiers in this war, will that they should appear in their ranks with the arms about them, and that they should carrie always a readie eye upon the secret ambushes, or open assaults of their sworne enemie, who (after the manner of expert and pollicke captaines) useth divers and sundrie slights, displaying his rage, as he knoweth the nature and inclination of those to be whom he setteth upon. Now Faustus juggling part which he plaid was this. Meeting one day at a table with some who had heard much of his craftie conveyances and tricks of liagedermaine, he was earnestly entreated to shew them some sport; and being overcome in the end by the importunitie of his pot companions that were well warned in the head, he promised to shew them whatever they would have. They with one general consent require him to bring into the place a vine loaded with ripe grapes, and readie to be gathered; for they thought because it was in the month of December, Faustus could not shew them that which was not. He condescended to them, promising that forthwith, before ever they stirred from the table, they should see the vine they desired: but upon this condition that they should not speak a word, nor offer to rise from their places, but should all tarry till he had them cut the grapes; and that whosoever should do otherwise was in danger to lose his life. They having all promised to obey him, Faustus by his enchantments and magical spells forthwith so charmed the eyes and phantasies of these drunken revellers, that they saw, as it seemed to them, a merveilous goodlie vine, and upon the same so manie bunches of grapes (extraordinary great and long) as there were men setting then at the table. Enflamed with the dainties of such a rare thing, and being verie drie with much drink, everie man takes his knife in hand, looking when Faustus would give the word, and bid them cut the clusters. But hee having held them awhile in suspense about this vaine peece of witcherie, behold, all the vine and the bunches of grapes were, in the turn of a hand vanished quite away, and everie one of these drunken companions thinking he had had a cluster of grapes in his hand readie to cut off, was seene to hold his owne nose with one hand, and the sharpe knife with the other to cut that off: so that if any of them had forgotten the enchanter's lesson, and been too forward never so little, instead of cutting a bunch of grapes, he had whipt off his own nose. And such a marke had such profane fellows been worthe of, (or rather of a worse maim), who being carried away with an intolerable curiositie, would needs make their pastimes of such devilish illusions, which a Christian cannot be present at without extreme peril, and should not come there (indeed) at any hand; for it is called a blaspheming and a spiting of God.

Admirable maxim respecting doing others a service.—When your endeavours are directed towards doing good to an individual, in other words, to do him service, if there be any option as to the mode or way, consider and observe what mode is most to his taste. If you serve him as you think or say, in a way which is yours, and not his, the value of any service may, by an indefinite amount, be thus reduced. If the action of serving a man, not in the way in which he wishes to be served, be carried to a certain length, it becomes tyranny, not beneficence; an exercise of power for the satisfaction of the self-regarding affections, not an act of beneficence for the gratification of the sympathetic or social affections.—Bentham.

Reasonable study of others in conversation.—If you have two topics to talk to a man about, one of which interests him the most, while the other interests you the most, begin with that which interests him the most. It will put him in good humour; it will confer pleasure.—Bentham.

FAIRIES.

[Third and concluding Article.]

NEXT comes Drayton, a proper fairy poet, with an infinite luxury of little fancies. Nor was he incapable of the greater; but he would not blot; and so took wisely to the little and capricious. His Nymphidia, a story of fairy intrigue, is too long and too unequal to be given entire; but it cuts out into little pictures like a penny sheet. You might border a paper with his stanzas, and read them instead of grotesque. His fairy palace is roofed with the skins of bats, gilded with moonshine;—a fancy of exquisite fitness and gusto. There ought to be type by itself, pin-points, or hieroglyphical dots, in which to set forth the following

NAMES OF FAIRIES.

Hop, and Mop, and Drop so clear,
Pip, and Trip, and Skip, that were
To Mab, the sovereign lady dear,
Her special maids of honour;
Fib, and Tib, and Pinch, and Pin,
Tick, and Quiek, and Fill and Fin,
Tit, and Wit, and Wap, and Win,
The train that wait upon her.

Oberon's queen (who is here called Mab) has made an amigation with Pigwiggan, a great fairy knight. The king, furious with jealousy, pursues her, and is as mad as Orlando. He grapples with a wasp whom he mistakes for the enemy; next plunges upon a glow-worm, and thumps her for carrying fire; then runs into a hive of bees who daub him all over with their honey; then leaps upon an ant, and gallops her; then scours over a mole-hill, and plumps into a puddle up to his neck. The queen hears of his pursuit, and she and all her maids of honour secrete themselves in a nut shell. Pigwiggan goes out to meet the king, riding upon a fiery earwig!

A FAIRY'S ARMS AND WAR-HORSE.

His helmet was a beetle's head
Most horrible and full of dread,
That able was to strike one dead,
Yet it did well become him.
And for his plume a horse's hair,
Which being tossed by the air,
Had force to strike his foe with fear,
And turn his weapon from him.

Himself he on an earwig set,
Yet scarce he on his back could get,
So oft and high he did curvet
Ere he himself could settle;
He made him turn, and stop, and bound,
To gallop and to trot the round,
He scarce could stand on any ground,*
He was so full of mettle.

The queen, scandalized and alarmed at the height to which matters are now openly proceeding, applies to Proserpina for help. The goddess takes pity on her, and during a dreadful combat between the champions, comes up with a bag full of Stygian fog and a bottle of Lethe water. The contents of the bag being suddenly discharged, the knights lose one another in the mist; and on the latter's clearing off, the goddess steps in as herald on behalf of Pluto to forbid further hostilities, adding that the ground of complaint shall be duly investigated, but first recommending to the parties to take a draught of the liquor she has brought with her, in order to enlighten their understandings. They drink, and forget everything; and the queen and her maids of honour, "closely smiling" at the jest, return with them to court, and have a grand dinner. Now this is "worshipful society," and a good plot. The "machines," as the French school used to call them, are in good keeping; and the divine interference worthy.

In the Muses' Elysium of the same poet is a description of a fairy wedding. The bride wears buskins made of the shells of the lady-bird, with a head-dress of rose-yellows and peacock-moons, &c.; but her bed is a thing to make one wish one's self only a span long, in order to lay one's cheek in it. The coverlid is of white and red rose-leaves; the curtains and tester of the flower-imperial, with a border of hare-bells; and the pillows are of lily, stuffed with butterfly-down.

We think, with the author of the Mythology, that Herrick's fairy poetry is inferior to that of Drayton.

* Stare loco nascit, &c.—Virgil.

Herrick is indeed very inferior to the reputation which a few happy little poems have obtained for him; and the late reprint of his works has done him no good. For one delicacy there are twenty pages of coarseness and insipidity. His epigrams, for the most part, are ludicrous only for the total absence of wit; and inasmuch as he wanted sentiment, he was incapable of his own voluptuousness. His passion is cold, and his decencies impertinent. In his offerings at Pagan altars, the Greek's simplicity becomes a literal nothing; though there is an innocence in the pedantry that is by no means the worst thing about him. His verses on his maid Prue are edifying. Herrick was a jovial country priest, a scholar, and a friend of Ben Jonson's, and we dare say had been a capital university-man. Scholarship and a certain quickness were his real inspirers, and he had a good sense, which in one instance has exhibited itself very remarkably; for it led him to speak of his being "too coarse to love." To be sure, he has put the observation in the mouth of a lady, and probably he found it there. He well deserved it for the foolish things he has said. He made a good hit now and then, when fresh from reading his favorite authors; and among them, we must rank a Fairy poem mentioned by the author of the 'Legends of the South of Ireland.' His office helped to inspire him in it, for it is a satire, and a bitter one, on the ceremonies of Catholic worship. We must own we have a regard for a Catholic chapel; but it is not to be denied that some of the duties performed in it are strange things, and open to quaint parodies. The names of the saints in Herrick are worthy of Drayton.

There is one thing in the Fairies of Drayton which deserves mention. He does not shirk the miscellaneous, and, in some respects, anti-human nature of their tastes. The delicacies at their table are not always such as we should think pleasant, or even bearable. This is good; perhaps more so than he was aware, for he overdoes it.

Milton's "pert Fairies and dapper elves" are a little too sophistical. They are too much like Fairies acting themselves; which is overdoing the quaint nicety of their consciousness. But in addition to the well-known passages we have quoted from him already, there is a very fine one in his First Book. He is speaking of the transformation of the devils into a crowd in miniature.

As bees

In spring-time, when the sun with Taurus rides,
Pour forth their populous youth about the hive
In clusters: they among fresh dews and flowers
Fly to and fro, or on the smoothened plank,
The suburbs of their straw-built citadel,
New rubb'd with balm, expatiate and confer
Their state affairs. So thick the aery crowd
Swarm'd and were straiten'd; till the signal given,
Behold a wonder! They but now who seem'd
In bigness to surpass Earth's giant sons,
Now less than smallest dwarfs, in narrow room
Throng numberless, like that Pygmean race,
Beyond the Indian mount; or faery elves,
Whose midnight revels, by a forest side,
Or fountain, some belated peasant sees,
Or dreams he sees, while overhead the mooh
Sits arbitress, and nearer to the earth Wheels her pale course; they on their mirth and dance

Intent, with jocund music charm his ear;
At once with joy and fears his heart rebounds.

There is a pretty fairy tale in Parnell, where a young man by dint of moral beauty loses his hump. Perhaps it was this poem that suggested a large prose piece to the same effect, written, we believe, by a descendant of the poet's family, and well worthy the perusal of all who are not acquainted with it. It is entitled Julietta, or the Triumph of Mental Acquirements over Bodily Defects; and is found in most circulating libraries. But the most beautiful of all stories on the subject, and indeed one of the most beautiful stories in the world, is the celebrated Fairy tale of Beauty and the Beast. Of this, however, we may speak another time; for the Fairies of the French books (however minute may be their dealings, occasionally) are not the little elves of the north, but, the Fates, or enchantresses of Romance, paying visits to the Nursery.

We shall conclude with a few goblin anecdotes illustrative of the present state of Fairy belief in its true northern region, that is to say, in the British and other islands, Scandinavia, and Germany; and, as the creed is, in fact, the same throughout the whole of that part of the world, though modified by the customs of the different people, we shall not stop to make literal or national distinctions, when the spirit of the thing is the same. Our authorities are the 'Fairy Mythology' and the 'Fairy Legends of the South of Ireland;' but it is proper to state, as the authors of these works make a point of doing, that the great masters of Fairy lore now living are Messrs Grimm, the German writers, with whose language (the language of Goethe) we are, to our regret, unacquainted. But we are zealous students at second hand.

A man who had a Nis, or goblin, in his house, could think of no other way of getting rid of him than by moving. He accordingly packed up his goods, and was preparing to set off with the cart, when the Nis put up his head from it, and cried out—"Eh! Well, we're moving to-day, you see."

A German, for a similar reason, set fire to his barn, hoping to burn the goblin with it. Turning round to look at the blaze, as he was driving away, the goblin said, "It was time to move, wasn't it?"

There was a Nis that was plagued by a mischievous boy. He went one night to the boy as he was sleeping in bed by the side of a tall man, and kept pulling him up and down under the pretence of not being able to make him fit the other's stature. When he was down, he was too short; and when up, not long enough. "Short and long don't match," said he; and kept pulling him up and down all night. Being tired by daylight, he went and sat on a wall, and as the dog barked, but could not get at him, the Nis kept plaguing him by thrusting down first one leg and then the other, saying "Look at my little leg! Look at my little leg!" By this time the boy got up dreadfully tired with his dream, and while the Nis was wrapt up in his amusement, the boy went behind him, and tumbled him into the yard, saying, "Look at him altogether."

Two Scotch lassies were eating a bowl of broth. They had but one spoon, and yet they scarcely seemed to have tasted their mess, but they had come to the bottom of it. "I hae got but three sups," cried the one, "and it's a' dune!" "It's a' dune indeed," cried the other. "Ha! ha! ha!" cried a third voice, "Brownie has got the raist o't."

A husband going a journey, gave a Kobold the charge of his wife during his absence. The good man departed, and Kobold had nothing to do from that day forward but assume frightful shapes, fling people down, and crack ribs. At length the husband came back, and a figure at the door welcomed him with a face, pale, but delighted. "Who are you?" cried the husband; for he did not know Kobold, he had grown so thin. "I am the keeper of our fair friend," said the elf, "but it is for the last time. Whew!" continued he, blowing, "what a time I've had of it!"

A Neck or water-spirit was playing upon his harp, when two boys said to him, "What is the use, Neck, of your sitting and playing there? You will never be saved." Upon this the poor spirit began to weep bitterly. The boys ran home, and told their father, who rebuked them; so they came back again, and said, "Be of good cheer, Neck; father says you will be saved as well as us." The Neck then took his harp again, and played sweetly, long after it was too dark to see him. [This is very beautiful.]

The most ghastly, to our taste, of all the equivocal fairies, are the Elle-women or Female Elves, of Denmark. The male is a little old man with a low-crowned hat; the female is young and fair, very womanly to all appearance, and with an attractive countenance, "but behind she is hollow like a dough-tough." She has so many lures that people find it difficult to resist her; and they must always follow her about, if they once fondle her; otherwise they lose their senses. But she is apt to bring herself into suspicion by trying never to let her back be seen. If you make the sign of the cross, she is obliged to turn round. We know not whether the charm remains in spite of the dough-trough, provided you are once beguiled. A more unsatisfactory charm could not be found. Think of clasping her to your heart, and finding your hands come together within an ace of your breast-bone!

When lonely German clasps an Elle-maid,
And finds too late a butcher's tray—

We may laugh at such horrors at this time of day, especially in England; but these darker parts of superstition are still mischievous sometimes to those who believe in them; and we have no doubt there are still believers, upon grounds which it would be found difficult to shake. To say the truth, we are among the number of those who, with all allowance for the lies that have been plentifully told on such matters, do yet believe that fairies have actually been seen; but then it was by people whose perceptions were disturbed. It is observable that the ordinary seers have been the old, the diseased, or the intoxicated; young people's aunts, or grandfathers, or peasants going home from the ale-house. When the young see them, their minds are prepared by a firm belief in what their elders have told them; so that terrors which should pass off for nothing, on closer inspection, become a real perception with these weaker heads; the ideas impressed upon the brain taking the usual morbid stand outside of it. We have no doubt that the case is precisely the same, in its degree, with the spectral illusion of faces, and more horrid sights, experienced by opium-eaters and others, in a delicate state of health. We learn from a work of the late Mr Bingley's, that the metal known by the name of Cobalt, is so called from the German word Kobold, or Goblin, so often mentioned in this article, the miners who dig for it appearing to be particularly subject to the vexations of the elf, in consequence of the poison which his name-sake exhales.* If it should be asked how we can tell that anything which is really seen does not really exist, we answer, that such a state of existence is, at all events, not a healthy one, and therefore its perceptions are not to be taken as proper to humanity. Not to mention that spectral illusions are of no use but to terrify, and are quite as likely, and more so, to happen to the conscientious and the delicately organized and considerate, as to those whose vices might be supposed to require them.

The consequence of these darker parts of the belief in fairies, is that deliriums have frequently been occasioned by them; fancied announcements and forebodings have preyed on the spirits in domestic life, and the popular mind kept in a state, which bigotry and wordliness have been enabled to turn to the worst account. But a counter-charm was nevertheless growing up in secret against the witchcrafts of imagination, by dint of imagination itself, and the readiness with which it was prepared to enter into the thoughts of others, and sympathize with the great cause of knowledge and humanity. The cure for these and a hundred evils, is not the rooting out of imagination, which would be a proceeding, in fact, as impossible as undesirable, but the cultivation of its health and its cheerfulness. Good sense and fancy need never be separated. Imagination is no enemy to experience, nor can experience draw her from her last and best holds. She stands by, willing to know everything he can discover, and able to recommend it, by charms infinite, to the good will and sentiment of all men. What has been in the world is, perhaps, the best for what is to be, none of its worst evils excepted; but found out, and known to be evils, the latter have lost even their doubtful advantages; imagination, in the finer excitements of sympathy and the beautiful creations of the poets, casts off these shades of uneasy slumber; and all that she says to knowledge is, "Discard me not, for your own sake as well as mine; lest with want of me, want of sympathy itself return, and utility be again mistaken for what it is not, as superstition has already mistaken it."

The sum of our creed in these matters is this:—Spectral illusion, or the actual sight of spiritual appearances takes place only with the unhealthy, and therefore is not desirable as a general condition: but spiritual or imaginative sight is consistent with the healthiest brain, and enriches our sources of enjoyment and reflection. The three things we have to take care of, on these and all other occasions, are health, knowledge, and imagination.

TABLE TALK.

Admirable remark respecting the habit of expressing antipathy.—When it is settled in a man's mind that such or such another is a bad man, an effect apt to be produced by such judgment is a settled affection of antipathy; of antipathy more or less strong, according to the temper of the individual. Thereupon, without troubling himself to measure out the proper quantity of antipathy which it would be proper for him to administer, upon every opportunity that presents the means of expressing towards the offending party the affection of hatred and contempt, he accordingly employs it; and, in so doing, he piques himself upon the evidence he affords to others of his hatred of vice and love of virtue, while, in truth, he is only affording a gratification to his own dissocial and self-regarding affections, to his own antipathy and his own pride.—Bentham's Deontology.

How to help the judgment of others.—In intercourse with others, it may sometimes be demanded by benevolence that their opinions should be corrected on points affecting their own happiness. In general, however, it becomes us rather to seek points of agreement than points of difference; but where points of difference are to be discussed, give the discussion the character of a joint search after truth—an inquiry by which both are to be benefitted, rather than of contention for victory, or an exhibition of dogmatism. Knowledge communicated by benevolence has the united charm of intellect and virtue,—intellect engaged in clearing the ground of evil, and virtue engaged in covering it with good.—Bentham's Deontology.

TO IANTHE, WHO DIED YOUNG.

From thy home in the far skies,
From fields of light,
Beyond the ken of mortal eyes,
Spirit, pure and bright,
Look down on me.

From seats immortal, where thou sittest
On starry flowers,
If our love thou not forgettest
In those sweet bowers,
Look down on me.

Smil'st thou, dear, at these dim eyes,
Dim with full tears,
Turned wishful, upward, to thy skies?
Fancy-drawn thy form appears
In yon blue sea.

And joy'st thou at the life unliv'd,
The thoughts unthought,
The joys unjoyed, the griefs ungriev'd,
And thy young spirit caught
Soon, and set free?

Love, smiling with broken heart,
Fair falsehood's eye,
Death-beds, where torn affections part,
House-gloom's poverty,
Unknown to thee.

Ah! unknown the pilgrimage,
Toilsome and weary,
From bounding childhood to tottering age,
Cold, grey, and dreary,
Unknown to thee.

Lov'd and loving did'st thou live,
'Mid the joy thou madest;
Gently reclined'st thy head at eve,
Into death faded'st,
Unknown to me.

An angel with thy God thou art,
Gone a space before;
Few years we met, for few we part,
To part no more:
Soon may it be!

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

DEEPEST thanks to the Freeman's Journal and the Caledonian Mercury. We cannot express the gratitude we feel at seeing the light which we endeavour to shed on human hope and endeavour, thus caught into the hands of the best spirits of the press, and reflected with loving colours upon multitudes of new readers.—The advice given by the Caledonian Mercury is as sound as it is kindly put. We need not add, it will be taken.

The point inquired about by our friend CARRAS was discussed a few weeks ago in the London Journal, in a number containing more than one article upon Goethe. We cannot at this moment refer to it more particularly, as we do not happen to have the Journal near us.

E. D. will see, we trust, that to enter further into the matters he speaks of, would lead us into something very foreign to the objects of this paper,—controversy. It is difficult in a zealous writer to know always the exact point at which to stop, during the fervour of composition; but when he really writes in no spirit of controversy, it may be allowed him to waive the letter of it.

We announced some weeks ago an intention, which would of necessity include the notice recommended by E. The very disputable rhyme at the end of his verses, expressly doubted even by himself in a note, is a greater injury to them, we think, than he takes it for. But the harmonising of the "peacock's scream" with the dying hour of day, is well felt; and we like the following stanzas about a clump of "Fir-trees," especially as they concern a favourite old spot of ours:—

Beneath these lofty boughs of Fir
I love to lie and gaze,
To see them in the light winds move
A thousand different ways:

To hear their deep, rough, roaring voice,
When mirthfully they meet,
As though the rooted trees rejoice
A visitant to greet:

And now, when dies the evening gale,
To see them droop and bend,
And hoarsely murmuring seem to wail,
As if they lost a friend.

So have we felt, in the same spot, in the company of friends when living, and at the recollection of them when dead,—of friends who were fine poets and admirable men, (those he speaks of,) and who have enjoyed the place with us a hundred times, and talked in it of the pine-trees of Theocritus.

We agree with A. H. C. in the question he has proposed to us respecting Poetry and Painting, &c. but Painting has its points of superiority also, though not so numerous or subtle. Its chief inferiority (divine art as it is) consists in its not being able to express idealism like Poetry, nor to make the beholder so surely partake of the artist's feeling as the reader does.

We are again compelled to postpone to another week the verses of Philos, and of J. D. (of Dover) with some remarks on them.

Further notice to G. H. L. in our next.

If E. W. R. (as we presume by a passage in his communication) is young, he promises to be an elegant writer and sound thinker; but at present he hardly knows what to omit.

E. B. P. will find a right-cordial account of Christ's Hospital and its worthies, when we come to that quarter in our Supplement. Any memorandum which it might please him to furnish us, would be very acceptable.

C. C. C.'s communication next week.

Mr J. W. is very kind and considerate. We had received his communication, and intended to notice it sooner; but it accidentally escaped us. If he (and Mr J. W. M.) will have the goodness to look at the answers to G. B. and J. M. C. in our last week's Notice to Correspondents, they will understand what is implied in them.

GENII AND FAIRIES OF THE EAST, THE ARABIAN NIGHTS, &c.

HAIL, gorgeous East! Hail, regions of the coloured morning! Hail, Araby and Persia!—not the Araby and Persia of the geographer, dull to the dull, and governed by the foolish,—but the Araby and Persia of books, of the other and more real East, which thousands visit every day—the Orient of poets, the magic land of the child, the uneffaceable recollection of the man.

To us, the Arabian Nights are one of the most beautiful books in the world: not because there is nothing but pleasure in it, but because the pain has infinite chances of vicissitude, and because the pleasure is within the reach of all who have body and soul, and imagination. The poor man there sleeps in a door-way with his love, and is richer than a king. The Sultan is dethroned to-morrow, and has a finer throne the next day. The pauper touches a ring, and spirits wait upon him. You ride in the air; you are rich in solitudes; you long for somebody to return your love, and an Eden encloses you in its arms. You have this world, and you have another. Fairies are in your moon-light. Hope and imagination have their fair play, as well as the rest of us. There is action heretical, and passion too: people can suffer, as well as enjoy, for love; you have bravery, luxury, fortitude, self-devotion, comedy as good as Moliere's, tragedy, Eastern manners, the wonderful that is in a common-place, and the verisimilitude that is in the wonderful calendars, cadis, robbers, enchanted palaces, paintings full of colour and drapery, warmth for the senses, desert in arms and exercises to keep it manly, cautions to the rich, humanity for the more happy, and hope for the miserable. Whenever we see the Arabian Nights they strike a light upon our thoughts, as though they were a talisman encrusted with gems; and we fancy we have only to open the book for the magic casket to expand, and enclose us with solitude and a garden.

This wonderful work is still better for the West than for the East; because it is a thing remoter, with none of our common-places; and because, our real opinions not being concerned in it, we have all the benefit of its genius without being endangered by its prejudices. The utility of a work of imagination indeed must outweigh the drawbacks upon it in any country. It makes people go out of themselves, even in pursuit of their own good; and is thus opposed to the worst kind of selfishness. These stories of vicissitude and natural justice must do good even to Sultans, and help to keep them in order, though it is doubtful how far they may not also serve to keep them in possession. With us, the good is unequivocal. The cultivation of hope comes in aid of the progress of society; and he may safely retreat into the luxuries and rewards of the perusal of an Eastern tale, whom its passion for the beautiful helps to keep in heart with his species, and by whom the behaviour of its arbitrary kings is seen in all its regal absurdity, as well as its human excuses.

Like all matters on which the poets have exercised their fancy, the opinions respecting the nature of the supernatural beings of the East have been rendered inconsistent, even among the best authorities. Sir John Malcolm says that Deev means a Magician, whereas, in the Persian Dictionary of Richardson, it is rendered Spirit and Giant; by custom, a Devil: and Sir John uses it, in the same sense in general. D'Herbelot uses it in the sense of Dæmon, and yet in his article on Solomon it is opposed to it, or simply means Giant. Richardson tells us, that Peri means a beautiful creature of no sex; whereas, according to Sir William Ouseley, it is always female; and Richardson himself gives us to understand as much another time. Upon the whole, we think the following may be taken as the ordinary opinion, especially among authors of the greatest taste and genius.

The Persians (for all these supernatural tales originated with the Persians, Indians, and Chaldeans, and not with the Arabs, except in as far as the latter became united with the Persians) are of opinion, that many kings reigned, and many races of creatures existed, before the time of Adam.* The geologists ought to have a regard for this notion, which has an air of old knowledge beyond ours, and falls in with what has been conjectured respecting the diluvial strata. According to the Persians, a time may have existed, when mammoths, not men, were lords of the creation; when a gigantic half-human phenomenon of a beast put his crown on with what was only a hand by courtesy; and elephants and leviathans conversed under a sky in which it was always twilight. Very grand fictions might be founded on imaginations of this sort;—a Præ-adamite epic: and knowledge and sensibility might be represented as gradually displacing successive states of beings, till man and woman rose with the full orb of the morning,—themselves to be displaced by a finer stock, if the efforts of cultivation cannot persuade them to be the stock themselves.

The race immediately preceding that of human kind resembled them partly in appearance, but were of gigantic stature, various-headed, and were composed of the element of fire. These were the Genii, Deeas, or race of Gigantic Spirits, (the Jann or Jinn of the Arabs,—Pers. Jannian or Jinnian†) They lived three thousand years each, and had many contests with other spirits, of whose nature we are left in the dark; but the heavens appear to have warred with them, among other enemies. A dynasty of forty, or according to others of seventy-two Solomons, reigned over them in succession, the last of whom was the renowned Soliman Jan-ben-Jan. His buckler, says D'Herbelot, is as famous among the Orientals, as that of Achilles among the Greeks. He

* Giafar the Just, sixth Imam, or Pontiff of the Mussulmans, was of opinion, that there had been three Adams before the one mentioned in Scripture, and that there were to be seventeen more.—D'Herbelot, in the article 'Giafar'

† Pronounced Jaun and Jinniaun. So Isphahân, Goolistan, &c. It is a pleasure, we think, to know how to pronounce these Eastern words, and therefore we give the reader the benefit of our A B C learning. There is a couplet in Sir William Ouseley's Travels which assuited us for a month, purely because we had found out how to pronounce it, and liked the spirit of it. We repeat it from memory—

Haun sheer khân!
Bêkeh sheer dendân!
(Written—Han shir khan Belkeh shir dendan.)

The real spelling ought to be kept, for many reasons; but it is agreeable to find out the sound. The above couplet was an extempore of a Persian boy at an inn, who was struck with the dandy assumptions and enormous appetite of a native gentleman of the party. This person had been commissioned to show Sir William the country, and upon the strength of his having the name of Khan (as if one of us were a Mr Lord) gave himself the air of the title. The jest of the little mimic (who gives us an advantageous idea of the Persian vivacity) would run something in this way in English, a Non being a common term of exaltation:—
A lion-lord, indeed!
You may know him by his feed.

possessed, also, in common with other Solimans, the cuirass called the Gebeh, and the Tig-atesch, or Smouldering Sword, which rendered them invisible in their wars with the demons.* In his time the race had become so proud and so incorrigible to the various lessons given to them and their ancestors from above, that heaven sent down the angel Hareth to reduce them to obedience. Hareth did his work, and took the government of the world into his hands, but became so proud in his turn, that the deity in order to punish him created a new species of beings to possess the earth, and bade the angels fall down and worship it. Hareth refused, as being of a nobler nature, and was thrust, together with the chiefs of those who adhered to him, into hell, the whole race of the Genii being dismissed at the same time into the mountains of Kaf, and man left in possession of his inheritance. The Genii however did not leave him alone. They made war upon him occasionally till the time of the greatest of all the Solimans, Soliman ben Daoud (Solomon the son of David) who having finally conquered and driven them back, was allowed to retain power over them, to give peace of mind to such as had yielded in good time, and to compel the rest to succumb to him whenever he thought fit, as angels overcame the devils. These last are the rebellious Genii of the Arabian Nights. They are the Deeas, in the diabolical and now the only sense of the word,—Deev signifying a Gigantic Evil Spirit; and are all monsters, more or less, and generally black; though the most famous of them is the Deev-Sifed, or Great White Devil, whose conquest was the crowning glory of Rustam, the Eastern Hercules. They appear to be of different classes, and to have different names, except the latter be provincial. Some are called Ishreels, others Afreets, and another is our old acquaintance the Goule (pronounced Ghool). They are permitted to wander from Kaf, and roam about the world, "as a security," says Richardson, "for the future obedience of man." They tempt and do mischief in the style of the Western Devil, the lowest of them infesting old buildings, haunting church-yards, and feeding on dead bodies. The reader will recollect the lady who supped with one of them, and who used to pick rice with a bodkin. These are the Ghools above mentioned (Ghul is the spelling). They sometimes inhabit waste places, moaning in the wind, and way-laying the traveller. A Deev is generally painted with horns, tails, and saucer eyes, like our devil; but an author now and then lavishes on a description of him all the fondness of his antipathy. The following is a powerful portrait of one of them, called an A'reet, in the Bahar Danush,—or Garden of Knowledge (translated from the Persian by Mr Glenwin):—

On his entrance, he beheld a black demon, heaped on the ground like a mountain, with two large horns on his head, and a long phosels, fast asleep. In his head the Divine Crown had joined the likenesses of the elephant and the bull. His teeth grew out like the tusks of the sea-monster, and all over his monstrous carcase hung long hairs, like those of the bear. The eye of the ghoul-horn was dimmed at his appearance, and the ghoul at his horrible form and frightful figure was confounded.

He was an Afreet created from the wrath of God.

His hair like a bear's, his teeth like a bear's. No one ever beheld such a monster.

* D'Herbelot, in the article 'Soliman'.

Crooked-backed and crab-faced, he might be scented at the distance of a thousand furlongs.

His nostrils were like the ovens of brick-burners, and his mouth resembled the vat of a dyer.

When his breath came forth, from its vehemence the dust rose up as in a whirlwind, so as to leave a chasm in the earth; and when he threw it in, shall sand, and pebbles, from the distance of many yards were attracted to his nostrils.

Some of these wanderers about the world appear nevertheless to be of a milder nature than others, and undertake to be amiable on the subject of love and beauty: though this indeed is a mansuetude of which most devils are rendered capable. In the story of Prince Camaralzaman and the Princess of China, a "cursed Genie" makes common cause with a good Fairy in behalf of the two lovers. The Fairy makes no scruple of chatting and comparing notes with him on their beauty, at the same time addressing him by his title of "cursed," and wondering how he can have the face to differ with her. The devil, on the other hand, is very polite, calling her his "dear lady" and "agreeable Maimoune," and tremblingly exacting from her a promise to do him no harm, in return for his telling her no lies. The question demands an umpire; and, at a stamp of Maimoune's foot, out comes from the earth "a hideous, hump-backed, squinting and lame Genie, with six horns on his head, and claws on his hands and feet." Caschesch (this new monster) behaves like a well-bred arbiter; and the Fairy thanks him for his trouble. In the Arabian Tales, or Sequel to the Arabian Nights,* is an evil Genius resembling the Asmodeus of the Devil on Two Sticks. Asmodeus is evidently Eastern, the Asmadai of the Paradise Lost.

There is a world of literature in the East, of which we possess but a little corner; though, indeed, that corner is exquisite, and probably the finest of all.†

So much for the rebellious or evil Jinn.

The Jinns obedient seldom make their appearance in a male shape, the Orientals, with singular gallantry of imagination, almost always making them females, as we shall see presently. The best of the males are of equivocal character, and retain much of the fiery and capricious natures of the Genii of old. They may be good and kind enough, if they have their way: but do not willingly come in contact with men, except to carry off their wives or daughters; still resenting, it would seem, the ascendancy of human kind, and choosing to serve their own princes and Genii, rather than be compelled to appear before masters of an inferior species,—for magicians have power over them, as our astrologers had over the spirits of Plato and the Cabala. They

* The Arabian Tales are unquestionably of genuine Eastern ground-work, and amidst a great deal of fantastic extravagance, far inferior to the Nights, have some capital stories. Il Boudocani, for instance, and Maugraby. But till we have the express authority of a scholar to the contrary, it is difficult to say, that a French hand has not interfered in it, beyond what is stated by the translator of the reformed edition. There are fine things in the story of Maugraby.

† Doubts have been gratuitously and not very modestly expressed of the value of the celebrated Eastern poets; but surely a few names could not have risen eminently above myriads of others, and become the delight and reverence of nations, without possessing something in common with the great attractions of humanity in all countries. Sir John Malcolm pronounces Ferdousi, the epic poet of Persia, to be a great and pathetic genius; and he gives some evidence of what he says, even in a prose sketch of one of his stories, which, says the original, is a story "full of the waters of the eye." There is a couplet, translated by Sir William Jones, from the same author, which shows he had reflected upon a point of humanity that appears obvious enough, and yet which was never openly noticed by an Englishman till the time of Shakespeare. Sir William's couplet is in the modern fashion, and probably not in the original simplicity, but it is well done, and fit to remember. It is upon crushing an insect.

Ah! spare you emmet, rich in hoarded grain:
He lives with pleasure, and he dies with pain.

Do the gratuitous critics recollect, that the stories of Ruth and Joseph, and the sublime book of Job, are from the East? or that the religion of simplicity itself comes from that quarter? the religion that set children on its knee, and bade the orthodox Pharisee retire? It appears to us, highly probable, that even our Eastern scholars are liable to be mistaken respecting the pompous language of the Orientals. We talk of their high-flown metaphors, and eternal substitution of images for words; but how far would not our own language be liable to similar misconception, if translated in the same literal spirit? What should we think of Persians, who instead of overlooking the every day nature of our colloquial imagery should arrest it at every turn, and wonder how we can talk of standing in other people's shoes, taking false steps, throwing light on a subject, stepping the mouths of our enemies, &c.? There are bad and florid writers in all countries, perhaps more in Persia, because the people there are more fervent; but we should judge of a literature by its best specimens, not its worst.

come frequently, as well as against the grain,—in days of thunder and with severe fates. Rumph more, they have a taste for deformity, if we are to judge from the description of Pari Banou's brother. He was not above a foot and a half high, had a beard thirty feet long, and carried upon his shoulders a bar of iron of five hundred weight, which he used as a quarter-staff. But we will indulge ourselves (and we hope the reader) with an extract about him. Prince Ahmed, who has had the good luck to marry the gentle Pari, which has excited a great deal of jealousy and a wish to destroy him, is requested by his father (into whose dull head the thought has been put) to bring him a little monster of a man of the above description.

It is my brother, Schaibar, said the Fairy; he is of so violent a nature, though we had both the same father, that nothing prevents his giving bloody marks of his resentment for a slight offence; yet, on the other hand, so good as to oblige any one in what they desire. He is made exactly as the sultan your father described him, and has no other arms than a bar of iron of five hundred pounds weight, without which he never stirs, and which makes him respected. I will send for him, and you shall judge of the truth of what I tell you; but be sure you prepare yourself not to be frightened at his extraordinary figure, when you see him. What! my Queen, replied Prince Ahmed, do you say Schaibar is your brother? Let him be ever so ugly or deformed, I shall be so far from being frightened at the sight of him, that I shall love and honour him, and consider him as my nearest relation.

The Fairy ordered a gold chafing-dish, with fire in it, to be set under the porch of her palace, with a box of the same metal, which was a present to her, out of which taking some incense, and throwing it into the fire, there arose a thick smoke.

Some moments after, the Fairy said to Prince Ahmed, Prince, there comes my brother, do you see him? do you see him? The Prince immediately perceived Schaibar, who was but a foot and a half high, coming gravely with his bar on his shoulder; his beard, thirty feet long, which supported itself before him, and a pair of thick mustachios in proportion, tucked up to his ears, and almost covering his face. His eyes were very small, like a pig's, and deep sunk in his head, which was of enormous size, and on which he wore a pointed cap; besides all this, he had a hump behind and before.

If Prince Ahmed had not known that Schaibar was Pari Banou's brother, he would not have been able to look at him without fear; but knowing who he was, he waited for him with the Fairy, and received him without the least concern.

Schaibar, as he came forwards, looked at the Prince with an eye that would have chilled his soul in his body, and asked Pari Banou, when he first accosted her, who that man was? To which she replied, he is my husband, brother; his name is Ahmed; he is son to the sultan of the Indies. The reason why I did not invite you to my wedding was, I was unwilling to divert you from the expedition you were engaged in, and from which I heard, with pleasure, you returned victorious; on his account I have taken the liberty now to call for you.

At these words, Schaibar, looking on Prince Ahmed with a favourable eye, which, however, diminished neither his fierceness nor savage look, said, Is there anything, sister, wherein I can serve him?

We must have one more extract on this part of our subject from the same delightful work. The King of the Genii, in the beautiful story of Zeyn Alasnam (which ends with a piece of dramatic surprise equally unexpected and satisfactory), is a good Genius, and yet but a grim sort of personage. Our extract includes a boatman very awkward to sit with, an enchanted island, and a very princely Jinn.

Zeyn, Prince of Balsora, is in search of a ninth statue, which is necessary to complete a number bequeathed to him by his father. [Agreeably to a direction found by him among the statues, he seeks an old servant of his father's, at Cairo, of the name of Morabec; and the latter undertakes to forward his wishes, but advertises him there is great peril in the adventure. The Prince determines to proceed, and Morabec directs his servants to make ready for a journey.

Then the Prince and he performed the ablution of washing, and the prayer enjoined, which is called farz; and that done they set out. By the way they took notice of abundance of strange and wonderful things, and travelled many days; at the end whereof, being come to a delightful spot, they alighted from their horses. Then Morabec said to all the servants that attended upon them, do you all stay in this place, and take care of our equipage till we return. Then he said to Zeyn, Now, sir, let us go on by ourselves. We are near the dreadful place where the ninth statue is kept; you will stand in need of all your courage.

They soon came to a lake: Morabec sat down on the brink of it, saying to the Prince, You must cross the sea. How can we cross it, said Zeyn, when we have no boat? But will see you in a moment, replied Morabec, the enchanted boat of the King of the Genii will come for us. But do not forget what I am going to say to you; you must observe a profound silence; do not speak to the boatman, though his figure seem never so strange to you; whatsoever extraordinary circumstance you may observe, say nothing; for I tell you before hand, that if you utter the least word when we are embarked, the boat will sink down. I shall take care to hold my peace, said the Prince, you need only tell me what to do, and I will strictly observe it.

While they were talking, he espied on a sudden a boat in the lake and it was made of red sandal wood. It had a mast of fine amber, and a blue satin flag: there was only one boatman in it, whose head was like an elephant's, and his body like a tiger's. When the boat was come up to the Prince and Morabec, the monstrous boatman took them up one after the other with his trunk, and put them into his boat, and carried them over the lake in a moment. He then again took them up with his trunk, set them on shore and immediately vanished with his boat.

Now we may talk, said Morabec: the island we are on belongs to the King of the Genii; there are no more such in the world. Look round you, Prince; can these be a more delightful place? It is certainly a lovely representation of the charming place God has appointed for the faithful observers of our law. Behold the fields, adorned with all sorts of flowers and odoriferous plants; admire these beautiful trees, whose delicious fruit makes the branches bend down to the ground; enjoy the pleasures of these harmonious songs formed in the air, by a thousand birds of as many various sorts, unknown in other countries. Zeyn could not sufficiently admire those with which he was surrounded, and still found something new as he advanced farther into the island.

At length they came to a palace made of fine emeralds, encompassed with a ditch, on the banks whereof, at certain distances, were planted such tall trees, that they shaded the whole palace. Before the gate, which was of massy gold, was a bridge, made of one single shell of a fish, though it was at least six fathoms long, and three in breadth. At the head of the bridge stood a company of Genii, of a prodigious height, who guarded the entrance into the castle with great clubs of China steel.

Let us go no farther, said Morabec; these Genii will knock us down: and in order to prevent their coming to us, we must perform a magical ceremony. He then drew out of a purse he had under his garment four long slips of yellow taffety; one he put about his middle, and laid the other on his back, giving the other two to the Prince, who did the like. Then Morabec laid on the ground two large table cloths, on the edges whereof he scattered some precious stones, musk, and amber. Then he sat down on one of these cloths, and Zeyn on the other; and Morabec said to the Prince, I shall now, sir, conjure the King of the Genii, who lives in the palace that is before us: may he come in a peaceable mood to us! I confess I am not without apprehension about the reception he may give us. If our coming into the island is displeasing to him, he will appear in the shape of a dreadful monster; but if he approve of your design, he will show himself in the shape of a handsome man. As soon as he appears before us, you must rise and salute him, without going off your cloth; for you would certainly perish, should you stir off it. You must say to him, Sovereign Lord of the Genii, my father who was your servant has been taken away by the angel of death; I wish your Majesty may protect me as you always did my father. If the King of the Genii, added Morabec, ask you what favour you desire of him, you must answer, Sir, I most humbly beg of you to give me the ninth statue.

Morabec having thus instructed Zeyn, began his conjurations. Immediately their eyes were dazzled with a long flash of lightning, which was followed by a clap of thunder. The whole island was covered with a thick darkness; a furious storm of wind blew, a dreadful cry was heard, the island felt a shock, and there was such an earthquake as that which Aarazel is to cause on the day of judgment.

Zeyn was startled, and began to look upon that noise as a very ill omen; when Morabec, who knew better than he what to think of it, began to smile, and said, take courage, my Prince, all goes well. In short, that very moment the King of the Genii appeared in the shape of a handsome man, yet there was something of a stranger in his air.

The King promises to comply with the Prince's request, but upon one condition—that he shall bring him a damsel of fifteen, a virgin, beautiful and perfastly shew, and that her conductor shall behave himself on the road with perfect propriety towards her, both in deed and thought. "Zeyn," says the story, "took the rash oath that was required of him;" but naturally asks how he is to be sure of the lady? The Genius gives him a looking-glass, on which she is to breathe, and which will be sullied or unsullied accordingly. The consequences among the ladies are such as Western romancers have told in a similar way; but at length success crowns the Prince's endeavours, and he conducts the Genius's damsel to the enchanted island, not without falling in love, and being tempted to break his word and carry her away to Balaena. The King is pleased with his self-denial, and tells him that on his return home he will find the statue. He goes, and on the pedestal where it was to have stood, finds the lady!

The behaviour of the lady is in very good taste, and completes the charm of the discovery.

Prince, said the young maid, you are surprised to see me here: you expected to have found something more precious than me, and I question not but that you now repent having taken so much trouble; you expected a better reward. Madam, answered Zeyn, heaven is my witness that I more than once was like to have broken my word with the King of the Genii, to keep you to myself. Whatsoever be the value of a diamond statue, is it worthy the satisfaction of enjoying you? I love you above all the diamonds and wealth in the world.

All this to us is extremely delightful. We can say with the greatest truth, that at the age of fifty we repeat these passages with a pleasure little short of what we experienced at fifteen. We even doubt whether it is less. We come round to the same delight by another read. The Genius is as grand to us, if not so frightful as of old; the hostess as peculiar; and the lady as charming. Such ladies may really be found on pedestals, for aught we know, in another life (one life out of a million). In short, we refuse to be a bit older than we were, having, in fact, lived such a little while, and the youth of eternity being before us.

So now, in youth and good faith, to come to our last and best Genius, the Peri! We call her so from custom, but Peri is the proper word; and in the story above-mentioned, it is so spelt. We shall here observe, that the French have often misled us by their mode of spelling Eastern words. The translation of the Arabian Nights (which came to us through the French) has palmed upon our childhood the Genie, or French word, for the Genius of the Latins, instead of the proper word Jinn. The French pronunciation of Peri is Pari; and in Richardson's Dictionary the latter is the spelling. It would have looked affected, some years ago, to write Pari for Peri; though, in the story just alluded to, an exception is made in favour of it: but in these times, when the growth of general learning has rendered such knowledge common, and when Boccaccio has got rid among us of his old French misnomer of Boccace (which a friend of ours very properly called Book-case), we might as well write Pari and Jinn, instead of Peri and Genie, both, as we confess we are, to give up the latter barbarism—the belief of our childhood. But, somehow, we love any truth when we can get it, fond as we are of fiction.

Pari then, in future, we will venture to write it, and Jinn shall be said instead of Genie or even Genius; with which it is said to have nothing to do. This may be true; and yet it is curious to see the coincidence between the words, and for our part we are not sure, if the etymology could be well traced, that something in common might not be found between the words, as well as the things. There might have been no collusion between the countries, and yet a similarity of sound might have risen out of the same ideas. This circumstance in the philosophy of the human history is, we think, not sufficiently attended to on many occasions. Fictions, for example, of all sorts have been traced to this and that country, as if what gave rise to them with one people might not have produced them out of the same chances and faculties with another; obvious mixtures and modifications may be allowed, and yet every national mind throw up its own fancies, as well as the soil its own flowers. The Persians may have a par-tiular sort of fancy as they have of lilac or roses; but Fairies, or Spirits in general, are of necessity as common to all nations as the grass or the earth, or the shadows among the trees.

Thus out of similar grounds of feeling may issue the roots of the same words. It is curious that Jinn, Jinnin, and Genie, should so resemble one another; for as is only the nominative termination of the Latin word, and has nothing to do with the root of it. The Eastern word Pari, and our Fairy, are still more nearly allied, especially by the Arabic pronunciation, which changes P into F. It has been justly argued, that Fairy is but a modern word, and meant formerly the region in which the Fay lived, and not the inhabitant. This is true; but the root may still be the same, and the Italian word Fata, from which it has been reasonably derived, says nothing to the contrary, but the reverse; for fa or fam is but a variety of inflection. Fata is the Latin Fatum, or Fate, whence come the words Fatus, Fama, and Fatum; words implying something spoken or said,—

Aery tongues that syllable men's names.

Pari is the Latin to speak. All these words come from the Greek Phaten, Phatis, Phao, to say, which signifies also to express, to bring to light, and to appear; and Phaos signifies light. Here is the union of speech and appearance, and thus from the single root Pha or Fay may have originated the words Peri or Pari, the English Fairy, the old English Fay, which is the Fée of our neighbours, the Latin Fatum or Fate, even the Pures (another Latin word for the Fates), the Greek Phatis, the old Persian Feroor (a soul, a blessed spirit, which is the etymology of the author of the 'Fairy Mythology'), and the word Fable itself, together with Faney, Fair, Famous, and what not. We do not wish to lay more stress on this matter than it is worth. There is no end to probabilities, and anything may be deduced from anything else. Horne Tooke derived King Pepin from the Greek pronoun Opser, and King Jeremiah from pickled cucumber,*—a sort of sport which we recommend as an addition to the stock at Christmas. But the extremes of probability have their use as well as abuse. The spirit of words, truly studied, involves a deep philosophy and important consequences; and anything is good which tends to make out a common case for mankind.

Pari is the female Genius, beautiful and benevolent. D'Herbelot says there are male Paries, and he gives the names of two of them, Dal Peri and Milan Schah Peri, who were brothers of Merjan Peri, supposed to be the same as the Western Fairy, Morgana. The truth seems to be, that originally the Paries were of no sex: the poets first distinguished them into male and female; and their exceeding beauty at last confined them to the female kind. We doubt, after all that we see in the writings of Sir William Ouseley and others, whether any poet, Western or Eastern, would now talk of a male Pari. At any rate, it would appear as absurd to us of the West, as if any body were to discover that the three Graces were not all female. The Pari is the female Fairy, the lady of the solitudes, the fair enchantress who enamours all who behold her, and is mightily inclined to be enamoured herself, but also to be constant as well as kind. She is the being "that youthful poets dream of when they love." She includes the magic of the enchantress, the supernaturalness of the fairy, the beauty of the angel, and the loveliness of the woman; in short, is the perfection of female sweetness.†

Pari has been derived from a word meaning winged, and from another signifying beauty. But enough has been said on this point. We are not aware of any story in which Paries are represented with wings: but they have the power of flight. In an Eastern poem mentioned by D'Herbelot, the evil Jinns in their war with the good take some Paries captive, and hang them up in cages, in the highest trees they can find. Here they are from time to time visited by their companions, who bring them precious odours, which serve a double purpose; for the Paries not only feed upon odours, but are preserved by them from the approach of the Devs, to whom a sweet scent is intolerable. Perfume gives an evil spirit a melancholy more than he is in the habit of enduring; he suffers, because there is a taste of heaven in it. It is beautiful to fancy the Paries among the tops of the trees, bearing their imprisonment with a sweet patience, and watching for their companions. Now and then comes a flight of these human doves, gleaming out of the foliage; or some good Genius of the other sex dares a peril in behalf of his Pari love, and turns her patience into joy.

* As thus, "Opser, opser, opser,—diaper, napkin, pipkin, pipkin-king, King Pepin." And going the reverse way, "King Jeremiah, Jeremiah King, jerkin, girkin, pickled cucumber." Fohi and Noeh, says Goldsmith, are evidently the same; for change Fo into No, and Hi into Ah, and there you have it.

† Where we say angel-faced, the Persians say Pari-faced. Pari-pager, Pari-cher, Pari-cher, Pari-cher, are all terms to that effect. The Parysatis of the Greeks is justly supposed to be the Pari-sade, or Pari-born, of the Persians.

Paries feeds upon odours; but if we are to judge from our sweet acquaintance, Pari Benou, they are not incapable of sitting down to dinner with an earthly lover. The gods lived upon odours, but they had wine in heaven, nectar and ambrosia, and furthermore could eat beef and pudding, when they looked in upon their friends on earth,—see the story of Baucis and Philemon, of Lycan, Tantalus, &c. It is true, Prince Ahmed was helped by his fair hostess to delicious meats, which he had never before heard of, odours perhaps taking the shape of venison or pilau; but he found the same excellence in the wines, and the Fairy partook both of those and the dessert, which consisted of the choicest sweetmeats and fruits. The reader will allow us to read over with him the part of the story thereabouts. Such quarters of an hour are not to be had always, especially in good company; and we presume all the readers of this Journal are well met, and of good faith. If any one of a different sort trespasses on our premises, and does not see the beauties we deal with, all we can say is, that he is in the usual condition of those profane persons who are punished when they venture into Fairy-land, by that very inability of sight, which he, poor fellow, would vainly consider a mark of his discernment.—So now to our dinner with a Fairy.

The reader will recollect, that Prince Ahmed shot an arrow a great way among some rocks, and, upon finding it, was astonished to see how far it had gone. The arrow was also lying flat, which looked as if it had rebounded from one of the rocks. This increased his surprise, and made him think there was some mystery in the circumstance. On looking about, he discovered an iron door. He pushed it open, and went down a passage in the earth. On a sudden, "a different light succeeded to that which he came out of;" he entered a square, and perceived a magnificent palace, out of which a lady of exceeding beauty made her appearance at the door, attended by a troop of others.

As soon as Prince Ahmed perceived the lady, he hastened to pay his respects; and the lady on her part, seeing him coming, prevented him. Addressing her discourse to him first, and raising her voice, she said to him, Come near, Prince Ahmed; you are welcome.

It was no small surprise to the Prince to hear himself named in a palace he never heard of, though so nigh his father's capital; and he could not comprehend how he should be known to a lady who was a stranger to him.

By the way, who knows what our geologists may come to, provided they dig far enough, and are worthy? Strange things are surmised of the interior of the earth; and Burnet now-a-days would have rubbed his hands to think what phenomenon may turn up.*

After the proper interchanging of amenities on either side, the Prince is led into a hall, over which is a dome of gold and onyx. He is seated on a sofa; the lady seats herself by him, and addresses

* The author of the 'Sacred Theory of the Earth,'—a book as good as a romance, and containing passages of great beauty. We speak of the Latin original. Burnet somewhere has expressed a desire to know more about Satan,—what he is doing at present, and how he lives. There is a subterranean Fairy-land, to which King Arthur is supposed to have been withdrawn, and whence he is expected to come again and re-establish his throne. Milton has a fine allusion to this circumstance in his Latin poem 'Mansus,' v. 81. A poetical traveller in Wales might look at the mouth of a cavern, and expect to see the great King with his chivalry coming up, blowing their trumpets into the day-light.

him in the following words: You are surprised, you say, that I should know you and not be known by you; but you will be no longer surprised when I inform you who I am. You cannot be ignorant that your religion teaches you to believe that the world is inhabited by Genii as well as men; I am the daughter of one of the most powerful and distinguished of these Genii, and my name is Pari Banou; therefore you ought not to wonder that I know you, the sultan your father, and the Princess Nouronihar. I am no stranger to your loves or your travels, of which I could tell you all the circumstances, since it was I myself who exposed to sale the artificial apple which you bought at Samarende, the carpet which Prince Houssain met with at Bisnagar, and the tube which Prince Ali brought from Schiraz. This is sufficient to let you know that I am not unacquainted with anything that relates to you. The only thing I have to add is, that you seemed to me worthy of a more happy fate than that of possessing the Princess Nouronihar; and, that you might attain to it, I was present when you drew your arrow, and foresaw it would not go beyond Prince Houssain's. I took it in the air, and gave it the necessary motion, to strike against the rocks near which you found it. It is in your power to avail yourself of the favourable opportunity which it presents to make you happy. As the Fairy, Pari Banou, pronounced these last words with a different tone, and looked at the same time tenderly on Prince Ahmed, with downcast eyes and a modest blush on her cheeks, it was not difficult for the Prince to comprehend what happiness she meant. He presently considered that the Princess Nouronihar could never be his, and that the Fairy, Pari Banou, excelled her infinitely in beauty, attractions, agreeableness, transcendent wit, and, as far as he could conjecture by the magnificence of the palace where she resided, in immense riches. He blessed the moment that he thought of seeking after his arrow a second time, and yielding to his inclination, which drew him towards the new object which had fired his heart, Madam, replied he, should I, all my life, have had the happiness of being your slave, and the admirer of the many charms which ravish my soul, I should think myself the happiest of men. Pardon me the boldness which inspires me to ask you this favour, and do not refuse to admit into your court a Prince who is entirely devoted to you.

Prince, answered the Fairy, as I have been a long time my own mistress, and have no dependence on my parents' consent, it is not as a slave I would admit you into my court, but as master of my person, and all that belongs to me, by pledging your faith to me, and taking me to be your wife. I hope you will not take it amiss that I anticipate you in making this proposal. I am as I said, mistress of my will; and must add, that the same customs are not observed among Fairies as among other ladies, in whom it would not have been decent to have made such advances: but it is what we do; we suppose we confer obligation by it.

Prince Ahmed made no answer to this discourse, but was so penetrated with gratitude, that he thought he could not express it better than by coming to kiss the hem of her garment, which she would not give him time to do, but presented her hand, which he kissed a thousand times, and kept fast locked in his. Well, Prince Ahmed, said she, will you not pledge your faith to me, as I do mine to you?—Yes, madam, replied the Prince, in an ecstacy of joy, what can I do better, and with greater pleasure? Yes, my sultaness, my queen, I will give it you with my heart, without the least reserve.—Then, answered the Fairy, you are my husband, and I am your wife. Our marriages are contracted with no other ceremonies, and yet are more firm and indissoluble than those among men, with all their formalities. But as I suppose, pursued she, that you have eaten nothing to-day, a slight repast shall be served up for you while preparations are making for our nuptial-feast this evening, and then I will show you the apartments of my palace, and you shall judge if this hall is the smallest part of it.

Some of the Fairy's women who came into the hall with them, and guessed her intention, went immediately out, and returned presently with some excellent meats and wines.

When the Prince had eaten and drank as much as he cared for, the Fairy, Pari Banou, carried him through all the apartments, where he saw diamonds, rubies, emeralds, and all sorts of fine jewels, intermixed with pearls, agate, jasper, porphyry, and all kinds of the most precious marbles; not to mention the richness of the furniture, which was inestimable; the whole disposed with such profusion, that the Prince, instead of ever having seen anything like it, acknowledged that there could not be anything in the world that could come up to it. Prince, said the Fairy, if you admire my palace so much, which is indeed very beautiful, what would you say to the palaces of the chief of our Genii, which are much more beautiful, spacious, and magnificent? I could also charm you with my garden; but we will leave that till another time. Night draws near, and it will be time to go to supper.

The next hall which the Fairy led the Prince into, and where the cloth was laid for the feast, was the only apartment the Prince had not seen, and it was not in the least inferior to the others. At his entrance into it he admired the infinite number of wax candles, perfumed with amber, the multitude of which, instead of being confused, were placed with so just a symmetry, as formed an agreeable and pleasant sight. A large beaufet was set out with all sorts of gold plate, so finely wrought, that the workmanship was much more valuable than the weight of the gold. Several chorusses of beautiful women richly dressed, and whose voices were ravishing, began a concert, accompanied with all kinds of the most harmonious instruments he had ever heard. When they were set down to table, the Fairy, Pari Banou, took care to help Prince Ahmed to the most delicious meats, which she named as she invited him to eat of them, and which the Prince had never heard of, but found so exquisite and nice, that he commended them in the highest terms, crying, that the entertainment which she gave him far surpassed those among men. He found also the same excellence in the wines, which neither he nor the Fairy tasted till the desert was served up, which consisted of the choicest sweetmeats and fruits.

After the desert, the Fairy, Pari Banou, and Prince Ahmed, rose from the table, which was immediately carried away, and sat on a sofa, at their ease, with cushions of fine silk, curiously embroidered with all sorts of large flowers, laid at their backs. Presently after, a great number of Genii and Fairies danced before them to the door of the chamber where the nuptial bed was made, and when they came there, they divided themselves into two rows, to let them pass, and after that retired, leaving them to go to bed.

The nuptial feast was continued the next day; or rather the days following the celebration were a continual feast, which the Fairy, Pari Banou, who could do it with the utmost ease, knew how to diversify, by new dishes, new meats, new concerts, new dances, new shows, and new diversions; which were all so extraordinary, that Prince Ahmed, if he had lived a thousand years among men, could not have imagined.

The Fairy's intention was not only to give the Prince essential proofs of the sincerity of her love, and the violence of her passion, by so many ways; but to let him see, that as he had no pretensions at his father's court, he could meet with nothing comparable to the happiness he enjoyed with her, independent of her beauty and her charms, and to attach him entirely to herself, that he might never leave her. In this scheme she succeeded so well, that Prince Ahmed's passion was not in the least diminished by possession; but increased so much, that, if he had been so inclined, it was not in his power to forbear loving her.

This is a pretty satisfaction to the imagination. And good only can come of it. They are under a great mistake who think that romances and pictures of perfection do harm. They may produce mounting impatience and partial neglect of duties here and there; but in the sum total they give a distaste to the sordid, elevate our anger above trifles, incline us to assist intellectual advancement of all sorts, and keep a region of solitude and sweetness for us in which the mind may retreat and recreate itself, so as to return with hope and gracefulness to its labours. Imagination is the breathing room of the heart. The whole world of possibility is thrown open to it, and the air mixes with that of heaven. Ulysses did not the less yearn to go back to the wife of his bosom, because a goddess had lain there. Affectionate habit is a luxury long drawn out; and constancy, made sweet by desert, is a sort of essence of immortality distilled.

To conclude the remarks on our story;—Prince Ahmed, to be sure, had every reason to be faithful; but we feel it was because a sweet, sincere, and intelligent woman loved him, rather than a wonder-working Fairy. She is a Cleopatra in what is pleasing, but she is also as unlike her as possible in what is the reverse; being very different, as she says, from her brother Schaibar, who was resentful and violent. Such is the Fairy of the East, the sweetest of all Fairies, and fit kinswoman by humanity to the only creature we like better, which is the Flying Woman of our friend Peter Wilkins. With the former we could live for ever, if disengaged and immortal; but with the latter, somehow, like Ulysses, we would rather die.

There remains one more supernatural being, the Arabian Fairy, who lives in a well; for so she has been distinguished from her more elegant sister of the palace. The Arabs, leading a hard and unsettled life, seem not to have had time, even in imagination, for the more luxurious pictures of Persia. They had all the imagination of home feeling, were devoted patriots and intense lovers, and have poured forth some of the most heart-felt poetry in the world. A volume of poems might be collected out of the romance of Antar, unsurpassed as effusions of passion. But the total absence of airy and preternatural fiction in their works is remarkable. When the two nations became united, and the successors of Mahomet shifted their throne from their old barren sands to the luxurious halls of Bagdad, the mythologies of their poets gradually became confounded; and it is difficult to pronounce, after all, how far the supposed Arabian Fairy differs with the Pari, her sister; how many wonders she might have drawn out of her well, or how far the Pari could not inhabit a hole in the well on occasion, as the Fairies of Italy do in the old stones of Fiesole. She was, no doubt, distinct originally, a coarser breed, like the gnome of the desert compared with the ladies of the court of Darius; but the distinction seems hardly to have survived. If Maimoune lives in a well, we have seen that Denhasch pronounced her charming; and though we might regard this as the flattery of a devil, the Fairy herself gives us to understand that she was a good spirit, one of those who submitted to Solomon; therefore charming by implication, and at all events mixed up with the spirits of Persia. The Jinns, male and female, are all capital architects, who can make a palace in a twinkling for others. We can hardly doubt they can do as much for themselves; and that Maimoune, if she had wished to please a lover, could have raised as splendid a house of reception for him as Banou.

The spiritual beings of the East then may, perhaps, safely be classed as follows, according to the most received ideas:—

The Deev, or Evil Genius.

The Jinn, or Good Genius, if not otherwise qualified.

The Pari, or Good Female Genius, always beneficent and beautiful.

Individuals of all these classes are permitted to roam about the world, and reside in particular places; but their chief residence, or Fairy-land, is understood to be in Jinnistan, or the place of the Genii, which is situated on the Greek mountain of Kaf, and divided into what may be called Good Land and Bad Land, or the domains of the good, and the domains of the rebellious Genii. In the former is the province of the good Genii, the land of Shadukam, or pleasure and desire;—and the Cities Juharbad, or the City of Jewels;—and Amberabad, the City of Ambergris. In the latter stands Ahermanhabad, the City of Aherman, or the Evil Principle, over which reigns the bad King Arzhenk, a personage with a half-human body and the head of a bull. He is a connoisseur, and has a gallery of pictures containing portraits of all the different sorts of creatures before Adam.

All Genii, bad and good, being subjected in some sort to the human race, whom they all in the first instance agreed not to worship, are compellable by the invocations of magic, and forced to appear in the service of particular rings and talismans. In this they resemble the Genii of the Alexandrian Platonists and the Cabala. Sometimes a man possessed a ring without knowing its value, and happening to give it a rub, is shocked by the apparition of a giant, who in a tone of thunder tells him he is his humble servant, and wants to know his pleasure. Invocations must be practiced after their particular form and letter, or the Genius becomes riotous instead of obedient, and is perhaps the death of you; and at least gives you a cuff of the ear, enough to fell a dromedary. They transport people whithersoever they please; make nothing of building a house, full of pictures and furniture, in the course of a night; and will put a sultan in their pockets for you, if you desire it. But if not your servants, they are dangerous acquaintances, and it is difficult to be on one's guard against them. You must take care, for instance, how you throw the shells about when you are eating nuts;

otherwise an unfortunate hawk to put out the eye of one of their invisible children, and for this you will suffer death unless you can repeat poems or fine stories. Numbers of Genii have remained imprisoned in brazen vessels ever since the time of Solomon, and it is not always safe to deliver them. It is a moot point whether they will make a king of you for-it, or kick you into the sea. The Genius whom the fisherman sets free in the 'Arabian Nights,' gives an account of his feelings on this matter, highly characteristic of the nature of these Fairy personages:—

During the first hundred years' imprisonment, says he, I swore, that if any one should deliver me before the hundred years expired, I would make him rich, even after his death, but the century run out, and nobody did me that good office. During the second, I made an oath that I would open all the treasures of the earth to any one that should set me at liberty, but with no better success. In the third, I promised to make my deliverer a potent monarch, to grant him every day three requests, of whatever nature they might be; but this century ran out as the two former, and I continued in prison; at last, being angry, or rather mad, to find myself a prisoner so long, I swore that, if afterwards any one should deliver me, I would kill him without mercy, and grant him no other favour but to choose what kind of death he would have; and, therefore, since you have delivered me to day, I give you that choice.

The mode in which the Genii emerge from these brazen vessels is very striking. The spirit into which they have been condensed expands as it issues forth, and makes an enormous smoke, which again compresses into a body, black and gigantic; and the Genius is before you. He is in general a smoke of a weaker turn than our friend just alluded to. If we are to believe the story of the Brasen City in the 'New Arabian Nights,' whole beds of vessels, containing genuine condensed spirits of Jun, were to be found in a certain bay on the coast of Africa. Deews were as plenty as oysters. A sultan had a few brought him, and opening one after the other, the giant vapour issued forth, crying out "Pardon, pardon, great Solomon; I will never rebel more."

Kaf is Caucasus, the "great stony girdle." The Persians supposed it, and do so still, to run round the earth, enclosing it like a ring. The earth itself stands on a great sapphire, the reflection of which causes the blue of the sky; and when the sapphire moves there is an earthquake, or some other convulsion of nature. On this mountain the Jinns reign and revel after their respective fashions; and there is eternal war between the good and the bad. Formerly the good Genii, when hard pressed, used to apply to an earthly hero to assist them. The exploits of Rustam, before mentioned, and of the ancient Tahmuras, surnamed Deew-Bend or the Deew-Binder, form the most popular subjects of Persian heroic poetry.

Kaf will gradually be undone, and the place of sapphire be not found; but the blue of the sky will remain; and till the Persian can expound the mystery of the cheek he loves, and know the first cause of the roses which make a bower for it, he will still, if he is wise, retain his Pari and his enchanted palace, and encourage his mistress to resemble the kind faces that may be looking at her.

Beautiful Truth.—The bard in whose soul, from that soul's infirmity, the genius of poetry is not strong or lofty enough to sustain him in the sphere of perpetual peace and brightness, may perish by the insolence of pride, and the poison of calumny, and the blows of unscrupulous hostility, and the lashings of interest, and the neglect of indifference, and the collision of his own susceptibility with the coldness of cold natures, and with the hardness of hard natures; but, even in perishing, he will see more and better things in the powers that destroy him, than they themselves are conscious of; and in the waters that engulf his dying limbs will feel the embraces of the beautiful and immortal Ondines.—Monthly Repository.

Real Triumph in Argument.—But let the Deontological law be present to his mind, and the triumph he will desire will be only the triumph of the greatest happiness principle. Contending for that, and for that alone, the victory of any sentiments more friendly to the principle than his own sentiments, will be, in fact, his victory.—Bentham. [The same may be said of all arguments for truth's sake, by real lovers of truth.]

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 22nd to Tuesday the 28th, October. We give, this week (by way of variety, and in order to furnish the reader with as many specimens as possible of the treatment of such subjects), a brief account of the season, from the 'Calendar of Nature,' or 'The Months,'—a little book, the subject of which was suggested to the Editor, some years ago, by Dr Aikin's 'Calendar of the Year,' and which has since been enlarged upon, and adorned, by various writers, with greater rural knowledge, and a right exuberance of fancy.

OCTOBER.

Then came October, full of merrie glee,
For yet his knowle was totty of the must
Which he was treading in the wine-fat's sea,
And of the joyous oyle, whose gentle gust
Made him so frolic, and so full of lust.
Upon a dreadful scorpion he did ride,
The same which, by Diana's doom unjust,
Slew great Orion; and eke by his side
He had his ploughing-share and coulter ready tyde.

Spenser's Faerie Queene.

Spenser, in marching his months before Great Nature ('Faerie Queene,' book vii.) drew his descriptions of them from the world and its customs in general; but turn his October wine-vats into cyder-presses and brewing-tubs, and it will do as well. This month, on account of its steady temperature, is chosen for the brewing of such malt liquor as is designed for keeping. The farmer continues to sow his corn, and the gardener plants forest and fruit-trees. Many of our readers, though fond of gardens, will learn, for the first time, perhaps, that trees are cheaper things than flowers; and that, at the expense of not many shillings, they may plant a little shrubbery, or make a rural screen for their parlour or study windows, of woodbine, guelder-roses, bays, arbutus, ivy, virgin's bower, or even the poplar, horse-chestnut, birch, sycamore, and plane-tree, of which the Greeks were so fond. A few roses, also, planted in the earth, to flower about his walls or windows in monthly succession, are nothing, in point of dearness, to roses or other flowers purchased in pots. Some of the latter are, nevertheless, cheap and long-lived, and may be returned to the nursery-man, at a small expense, to keep till they flower again. But if the lover of nature has to choose between flowers, and flowering shrubs and trees, the latter, in our opinion, are much preferable, in as much as, while they include the former, they can give a more retired and verdant feeling to a place, and call to mind, even in their very nestling and closeness, something of the whispering and quiet amplitude of nature.

Fruits continue in abundance during this month, as everybody knows from the shopkeeper; for our grosser senses are well informed if our others are not. We have yet to discover that imaginative pleasures are as real and as touching as they, and give them their deepest relish. The additional flowers in October are almost confined to the anemone and scabious; and the flowering trees and shrubs to the evergreen cytissus.

But the hedges (and here let us observe that the fields and other walks, that are free to every one, are sure to supply us with pleasure when every other place fails) are now sparkling with their abundant berries,—the wild-rose with the hip, the hawthorn with the haw, the blackthorn with the sloe, the bramble with the blackberry; and the briony, privet, honeysuckle, elder, holly, and woody night-shade, with the other winter feasts for the birds. The wine obtained from the elderberry makes a very pleasant and wholesome drink, when heated over a fire; but the humbler sloe, which the peasants eat, gets the start of him in reputation, by changing its name to port, of which wine it certainly makes a very considerable ingredient.

A gentleman, who lately figured in the beaux monde, and carried coxcombry to a pitch of the ingenious, was not aware how much truth he was uttering in his pleasant and disavowing definition of port:—"A strong intoxicating liquor, much drank by the lower orders."

Swallows are generally seen for the last time this month; the house-martin the latest. The red-wing, field-fare, snipe, royston crow, and wood pigeon, return from more northern parts. The rooks return to their roost trees, and the tortoise begins to bury himself for the winter. The mornings and afternoons increase in mistiness, though the middle of the day is often very fine; and no weather, when it is unclouded, is apt to give a clearer and manlier sensation than that of October. One of the most curious natural appearances is the gossamer, which is an infinite multitude of little threads shot out by minute spiders, who are thus wafted by the wind from place to place.

The chief business of October, in the great economy of nature, is dissemination, which is performed, among other means, by the high winds, which now return. Art imitates her as usual, and sows and plants also.

We have already mentioned the gardener. This is the time for the domestic cultivator of flowers to finish planting as well, especially the bulbs that are intended to flower early in spring.

And as the chief business of nature this month is dissemination, or vegetable birth, so its chief beauty arises from vegetable death itself. We need not tell our readers we allude to the changing leaves, with all their lights and shades of green, amber, red, light red, light and dark green, white, brown, russet, and yellow of all sorts.

As our ruralities are somewhat barren this week, we piece them out with the following poem, by Mr Keats. It is not one of his finest; but everything which he wrote was fine, and was sure to include some beautiful poetry. The closing stanza is full of the purest description. What a delicious line, in particular, is the third—

"While barred clouds bloom the soft-dying day!"

TO AUTUMN.

Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness,
Close bosom friend of the maturing sun,
Conspiring with him how to load and bless
With fruit the vines that round the thatch-eaves run;
To bend with apples the moss'd cottage trees,
And fill all fruit with ripeness to the core;
To swell the gourd, and plump the hazel shells
With a sweet kernel: to set budding more,
And still more, later flowers for the bees,
Until they think warm days will never cease,
For summer has o'er-brimmed their clammy cells.

Who hath not seen thee oft beneath thy store?
Sometimes whoever seeks abroad may find
Thee sitting careless on a granary floor,
Thy hair soft-lifted by the winnowing wind,
As on a half-reap'd furrow sound asleep,
Drows'd with the fume of poppies, while thy book
Spares the next swath and all its twined flowers;
And sometimes like a gleaner thou dost keep Steady thy laden head across a brook;
Or by a cyder-press with patient look,
Thou watchest the last oozings, hours by hours.

Where are the songs of Spring? Ay, where are they?

Think not of them, thou hast thy music too,—
While barred clouds bloom the soft-dying day,
And touch the stubble-plains with rosy hue;
Then in a wailful choir the small gnats mourn
Among the river sallows, borne aloft,
Or smiling as the light wind lives or dies;
And full grown lambs bleat loud from hilly bourns.
Hedge crickets sing: and now, with treble soft,
The red-breast whistles from a garden croft,
And gathering swallows twitter in the skies.

Happy Inscription.—A marble tablet, placed over the fountain of this noble reservoir, contains a short inscription more expressive and beautiful in the Persian language than can be given in an English translation:—"The bounties of Lullaby are ever flowing."—The Hindoos.

Hannah More.—The following reflexions on the death of Lord Orford are characteristic of the writer. Thus writes Hannah More to her sister Martha, from London, 1787:—"Poor Lord Orford! I could not help mourning for him as if I had not expected it. But twenty years unclouded kindness and pleasant correspondence cannot be given up without emotion. I am not sorry that I never flinched from any of his ridicule or attacks, or suffered them to pass without rebuke. At our last meeting, I made him promise to buy 'Law's Serious Call.' His playful wit, his various knowledge, his polished manner, alas! what avail they now. The most serious thoughts are awakened. Oh! that he had known and believed the things that belonged to his peace. My heart is much oppressed with the reflection."—It is strange that people of Hannah More's turn of mind should always entertain such serious thoughts of their acquaintance in the article of death. Amiable they may be; but because they take not up with a certain form of speech and demeanor, their after-state is always presumed in the most unfavourable manner. There is in this a temper and feeling which religious people should avoid. Take our word for it, it is an infirmity, and was in Hannah More.—Fraser's Magazine.

REMARKS ON REAL LIFE.

THE LONDON JOURNAL, ON THE OUT OF PERSON TAKEN FOUR TIMES.

THE account of this affecting tragedy, which appears to have occurred no long time since, is taken from one of the comprehensive and entertaining summaries just published by the "Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge," entitled 'The Hindoos.' A daughter thus sacrificed, by an otherwise affectionate parent, a sort of Eastern Virginius, would make a striking drama; only the homely circumstance which constitutes one of the most affecting points in the anecdote—the refusal of the stomach to second the poison,—would have to be modified. The doses given must be changed into small ones—too small to produce any effect, except perhaps an excited and eloquent whisper. When actual and dreadful suffering is before us, such homely manifestations of it become nothing. The patient is absorbed in the greater idea. But human beings, unless given to sarcasm and degradation, do not like to have physical weaknesses deliberately presented to their imaginations; and even then they are apt to take refuge (such as it is!) from the humiliation, in attempting to make a jest of it. A thorough delicacy, or philosophy, in reducing everything to its elements, moral or material, becomes superior to such pollution. And yet there is danger even in that! So nice and perplexing are the balances of things in this world; and so surely must all partake the common burdens of liability, till all can be improved. But we hasten from these mysteries to our story.

Kishna Komari Bae, "the virgin princess Kishna," was in her sixteenth year; her mother was of the Chawura race, the ancient kings of Anhalwara. Sprung from the noblest blood of Hind, she added beauty of face and person to an engaging demeanour, and was justly proclaimed the flower of Rajasthan. The rapacious and blood-thirsty Pat'han, Nawab Ameer Khan, covered with infamy, repaired to Oodipoor, where he was joined by the pliant and subtle Ajit. He was meek in his demeanour, unostentatious in his habits; despising honours, yet covetous of power; religious, which he followed with the zeal of an ascetic, if it did not serve as a cloak, was at least no hindrance to an immeasurable ambition, in the attainment of which he would have sacrificed all but himself. When the Pat'han revealed his design, that either the princess should wed Raja Msum, or by her death seal the peace of Rajwara, whatever arguments were used to point the alternative, the Raja was made to see no choice between consigning his beloved child to the Rahtore prince, or witnessing the effects of a more extended dishonour from the vengeance of the Pat'han; and the storm of his palace by his licentious adherents—the fiat passed that Kishna Komari should die.

But the deed was left for a woman to accomplish—the hand of man refused it. The harem of an eastern prince is a world within itself; it is the labyrinth containing the strings that move the puppets which alarm mankind. Here intrigue sits enthroned, and hence its influence radiates to the world, always at a loss to trace effects to their causes. Maharaja Dowlat Sing, descended four generations ago from one common ancestor with the Raja, was first sounded to save the honour of Oodipoor; but, horror-struck, he exclaimed, "Accursed the tongue that commands it! Dost on my allegiance if this to be preserved?" The Maharaja Jowandas, a natural brother, was then called upon; the dire necessity was explained, and it was urged that no common hand could be armed for the purpose. He accepted the poison, but when in youthful loveliness Kishna appeared before him, the dagger fell from his hand, and he returned more wretched than the victim. The fatal purpose thus revealed, the shrieks of the frantic mother reverberated through the palace, as she implored mercy or executed the murders of her child, who alone was resigned to her fate. But death was arrested, not averted. To use the phrase of the narrator, "she was excused the steel, the cup was prepared," and prepared by female hands! As the messenger presented it in the name of her father, she bowed and drank it, sending up a prayer for his life and prosperity. The raving mother poured imprecations on his head, while the lovely victim, who shed not a tear, thus endeavoured to console her. "Why afflict yourself, my mother, at this shortening of the sorrows of life; I fear not to die! Am I not your daughter? Why should I fear death? We are marked out for sacrifice from our birth; we scarcely enter the world but to be sent out again; let me thank my father that I have lived so long." Thus she conversed, till the nauseating draught refused to assimilate with her blood. Again the bitter potion was prepared, she drained it off; and again it was rejected; but, as if to try the extreme of human fortitude, a third was administered, and for a third time nature refused to aid the horrible purpose. It seemed as if the fabled charm which guarded the life of the founder of her race, was inherited by the virgin Kishna. But the bloodhounds, the Pat'han and Ajit, were impatient till their victim was at rest; and cruelty, as if gathering strength from defeat, made another and a fatal attempt. A powerful opiate was presented, the fountains draught. She received it with a smile, wished the same over, and drank it. The desires of barbarity were accomplished. "She slept!" a sleep from which she never awoke.

DRUMWHINN BRIDGE

OVER THE RIVER ORR.—BUILT, 1832.

MEET autumn midnight glancing,
The stars above hold away,
I bend, in muse advancing,
To lonesome Orr my way.

Its rush in drowsy even
Can make the waste less dead;
Short pause beneath void Heaven,
Then back again to bed!

Hoho! 'mong deserts moory,
See here the craftsman's hand;
Vain now, bleak Orr, thy fury,
On whinstone arch I stand.

Dull Orr, thou moorland river
By man's eye rarely seen,
Thou gushest on for ever,
And wert while earth has been.

There o'er thy crags and gravel,
Thou sing'st an unknown song,
In tongue no clerk unravel!
Thou'st sung it long and long.

From Being's Source it bounded,
The morn when time began;
Since then 'tis moor has sounded,
Unheard or heard of man.

That day they crossed the Jordan,
When Hebrew trumpets rang,
Thy wave no foot was fording,
Yet here in moor it sang.

And I, while thou'st meandered,
Was not, have come to be,
Apart so long have wandered,
This moment meet with thee.

Old Orr, thou mystic water!
No Ganges holier is;
That was Creation's daughter;
What was it fashioned this?

The whinstone Bridge is builded,
Will hang a hundred year;
When bridge to time has yielded,
The brook will still be here.

Farewell, poor moorland river:
We parted and we met;
Thy journeyings are for ever,
Mine art not ended yet.

November, 1832.

A Zoological Mystery.—On one of these expeditions Linnæus was, or imagined himself to have been, stung by a venomous worm, said to be not uncommon in some parts of Sweden. However this may be, he was seized with a violent disorder which threatened the extinction of life, more especially as he had removed far into the country, where medical assistance could not be readily procured. This accident, instead of diminishing his zeal, tended to increase his desire of becoming more acquainted with the lower orders of animals. In a work which he subsequently published, this singular worm, the existence of which, however, is still doubtful, is thus described by him:—"It occurs in the extensive turf marishes of Bothnia, in the northern parts of Sweden. Falling from the atmosphere, frequently upon the bodies of men and animals, it instantly penetrates them with the most intense pain, so as to produce death from agony within a quarter of an hour. I myself was smitten by it, at Lund, in 1728. I have not seen the animal unless in a dried state. It seems in its properties to be allied to the chaotic animal. By what means it rises into the air, whence it falls during the interval between the summer and winter solstice, no one has explained."—Lives of Zoologists.

BALLS.

"LE BAL ENLOUISSANT! LE BAL DELICIEUX!"

For the London Journal.

Is it but a few journals back that the Editor gave a paper on Dancing; but, as is not his wont, left something still to be said on the subject—or, rather, it should be said, on a collateral and most important point—that of balls, or midnight dancing. The Editor touched on the subject, as the padrona of a manipulating house sometimes yields the tips of her fingers, and gives into the dance for a few moments, and is then off and away again to look after more substantial amusement for her readers—I beg pardon—gosses. This is a pardonable confusion of ideas: how do we not search the smiling face of the hostess for the cheer of the feast, and read tidings of the table in her eyes? And again—which of the readers of the Journal (alas! why not a Journal de fante) is not sometimes mentally a guest of the Editor, either in his library, or at his breakfast table? Did he not even indulgently introduce us to the assembly rooms of Mr Wilson?

It is a bold undertaking, it must be admitted, to attack a favourite amusement of the fair sex, but having had my attention rather painfully directed of late to the subject, I cannot refrain (in the trust of their utility) from offering a few hints on this same art—pastime—or sober-madness—of dancing: name it as you either use it or abuse it. But before I proceed, may I ask why have not medical men rendered any other interference unnecessary, by seriously setting their learned faces against such an unwise misapplication of two great blessings—the hour of rest, and the animal spirits—which are both untimely wasted in our modern Dances? Some have, I am aware, done so in books (and what is still more virtuous, in expensive books, too), but all should do so, viva voce, in the families they attend. It will be said, that the business of the physician is to cure, and a cure supposes an illness, and illnesses must have causes: alas! they manage these matters better in China. We have discovered the utility of a preventive police; why not borrow from the Celestial Empire the idea of a preventive faculty?

Not to incur the suspicion of Vandalism, I must acknowledge a great admiration for the dance, as brought to perfection by the artist—for there we are enjoying, as it were, a visible music—an embodied harmony. I must also "confess the soft impeachment," and own a love for dancing, when, like a laughing, rosy, yet ethereal, nymph, she surprises us with her presence in the winter's evening, as she is suddenly found at high jinks among the youngsters, leading them on to her tuneful, graceful sports. And, in fact, I must proclaim a respect for dancing in every shape, when confined to reasonable hours—to young limbs, (or young hearts)—and brows not furrowed—but for Balls! ah—"take any shape but that."

The ball-room is very tempting—very splendid—I admit: the interchange of congratulations, compliments, and civilities, all very agreeable; and, perhaps, if the enjoyment took place earlier in the evening, one might not complain: but what a time of night to begin to be happy—ten! Certainly this is one mode of killing time and one's self, too, at the same moment. Talk of the merck of intellect! let me hear of the dance of intellect. People say the "schoolmaster is abroad"—but not after ten, ye revellers—not after ten! He knows not of your doings, or ye would have heard of it.

But before I come to my subject, let me clear away all the off-shoots. One more, then, ye lovers of dancing, and of me, its eloquent advocate!

Commiseration principally attaches itself to the female (the habits of men and boys bear them up against the ill effects of temporary confinement; but, with the poor girl, the heated ball-room is only the climax of the unnatural course of her ordinary mode of life); but is it not a shame to bring the poor boys into the ball-room to stand there, miserably out of their element, wondering when the fun will begin? I am sure this is a full retribution for all boyish peccadilloes. I never witness the piteous sight without thinking of the martyr of the innocents, and look on the lord of the feast as a refined and exquisite modern Herod, while, in fact, he is labouring to "make everybody happy."

It is all very well for those who are arrived at years of indiscrimination, to dance away the hours of repose. No doubt they could give good and sufficient reasons why a night spent in restraint and in an heated atmosphere is a recompense for the head-ache, the restlessness, the lassitude, the fever, of the ensuing day. With me, imagination is not so indulgent as to transform the broad-cloth of an elderly gentleman's coat-tail into the rainbow wings of some gay creature of the element; but if the gentleman can fancy himself something sympathetic, well and good. But I beg pardon—the amusement of another should be held sacred from all carping, though one may be allowed a little license, considering that, while these things are persisted in, everybody condemns them as wearisome in their own hearts—I would say everybody who has outlived the creaming animal spirits of youth. Who has not noticed good folks gawwating their limbs with all the gravity of an Indian pirouetting his last before the fire that is to consume him, or of a mathematician solving a problem, and setting the diagram at the same time? Who has not laughed at the desperate steps taken by the unfortunate Cavalier Seul, or, in English, Cavalier Seul? Mais, revenons à nous moutons: my business is with those without whose presence the dance would be at an end—I mean young ladies. Let the "tough seniors" enjoy this peculiar gratification to their hearts' content; but oh, let them not lead their children into the same error! The "tender juvenal" is but too content to snatch with delight at the joys of the passing hour—experience cannot have taught her to dread the recoil: the young girl will drink to the dregs the cup of pleasure presented to her lips; what shall we say to that parental hand which tempts those lips with a poison?

It would be a different case were there no "dancing hours" but those of midnight and the early morning. Rather than that ladies should not mix in society, large assemblies might be tolerated. But how many sensible people there are, who prove to their own satisfaction, and to the delight of those whom they gather together, that it is very possible to assemble all their loving and lovely friends around them, and yet exceed not a moderate number, proving, also, that there is time enough for enjoyment and merriment long before "the hour when churchyards yawn" for nightly revellers.

Need I repeat here the delightful truth, that woman nowhere shines to such effect as before her own hearth; and that, in proportion as the sphere is contracted in which her faculties are called upon to act, so will her powers of pleasing be enlarged?

There is a youth in the day, as there is a youth in man. They should dwell hand in hand together, interchanging gladness and beauty. Compare her, who, like Aurora's hand-maid, greets you at the cheerful breakfast-table, with rosy smiles and cheeks (I vote them not vulgar)—with flowery trophies of her morning's ramble in her hand—herself as fresh and gay, with the wearied fair you saw the preceding night, her eyes paling as the stars pale at day's approach, and her beauty blighted, as is that of the flowers brought, like her, into the withering atmosphere of riot. Compare the two, and account to me for the motives which can lead the latter lady to make such a sacrifice of health and beauty, and style it pleasure! I maintain that she has no motives at all satisfactory to her own mind; but that the bad taste of the matter must be laid, with other mighty charges, either at the door of fashion, or to the ostentation—to the false indulgence, or to the ambition of parents.

There are many who, proud of their daughters' superior strength in this particular, set danger at defiance. But while they admire, let them respect this excellency of constitution, and beware how they reduce its strength to a level with the weakness of the less fortunate. Woman has full need of all the powers with which nature has gifted her, if she would not prove rather a curse than a blessing in the sphere to which she is called. Why, then, are these powers to be wasted in frivolity, or, rather say, in untimely amusements? If our daughters, I repeat, are blessed with health, as great as the fondest parent could desire, we may depend on it the time will come soon enough, when that gift will be largely drawn upon by the cares and illnesses incident to their future stations. If they must keep the night alive, now, for the fun of the thing, they will have enough of the "watches of the night" in after times, and leisure to regret the strength of body they then wasted.

An English party always strikes me as an assembly got together by people who dread such meetings from some cause or other; and, accordingly, seek to rid themselves of the painful tax by one mighty and overpowering effort, going forth almost into the highways, and obliging all to come to see what a number of people they can gather together, and what an expense they can afford to put themselves to. The grand affair over—their friends are no more thought of, till another year gone tells that it is again time for them to be hospitable. And it is to patched up meetings like these that we are to send our daughters. No one will dispute that the physical effects of these parties are far from wholesome: I have always found that their moral effects were as little enticing to a judicious parent. When will people do in England as is done on the Continent, that is, throw open their doors, at an early hour, on a certain night in every week, or fortnight, to all their acquaintance with whom they are on terms of amity, and pass with them a cheerful, serious, or a joyous hour, just as suits the individual tastes, or time of life, of their guests, and let conversation, dancing, and play, go on, each in its snug corner, without the restraints of ostentation and fancy?

One word on the most melancholy part of our subject—the immediate and often irremediable mischief which follows on "grand balls." In the severest part of our winter, at an hour, whose breath strikes to the bones even of the strongest—under a sky, rude and inclement, or distilling dews and fogs, poisonous as the malaria of the Pontine Marshes—the weak girl is led, flushed and joyous—and, in her joy, careless and unguarded—from the heated scene, into the raw air. There are some, who, smothered in cashmere, are hurried at a step into a close carriage, and thus escape at little risk; but in a circle where fortune is not so favourable, what danger is not incurred in waiting for the hired conveyance, and in its cold, rickety fabric, when arrived?

There are few readers whose recollection will not serve them with some unhappy instance, in which months of illness, succeeded too often by death itself, has followed upon this exposure.

For then comes the cough and the pale cheek, and life burning itself out fast in fever. The laughing eye becomes extinct and sunken, only to be lit again by the fearful blaze of consumption, as if death held his watch-tower there. The stream of life is polluted, weakened where it looks for strengthening. Peevishness and discontent seize on the once unruffled temper. Then have we hours of hope and months of despair, the self-accusations of the wretched parent, the flickering hopes of the victim, and the deserted hearth.

Ye natural guardians, whose breasts are not open to other emotions, think how you would suffer if wife or daughter were ordered to the south. Think on the travelling expenses to Devon, Montpellier, Madeira! think and tremble!

I have refrained from touching on the moral effects of my subject, partly as I could not do them justice, and partly because too many severe truths must be told, and partly—if I may close this lecture with a joke—because there is no hard hitting allowed in this peaceful arena: we all fight here, as we dance—in gloves.

[We add a note merely to say that we agree in every syllable with our correspondent, and recommend his advice to earnest attention. We would not say that sensible and social people should never go to a midnight ball,—not once in their lives. Let them do so once and away,—twice, if they please; or oftener, provided it be a very rare event in their lives, as epochs from which to date perseverance, rather than cold or cough. People must not be too immoderately and everlastingly superior to every doubtful degree of social habit, lest they grow proud and carking, or timid, or uncharitable, and miss the beauty even of their virtue. Yet even their every care should be taken by parents and friends to guard against the lamentable evils so well deprecated by our correspondent; and the merry indulgence should not be taken at all, if security cannot be had against melancholy results. But again we ask, why are not domestic dances oftener resorted to, without any fuss and preparation, and purely for the sense and good humour of the thing? We have a vast deal of sound thinking to arrive at, in this very thoughtful country of ours! We are always waiting, and scheming, and laying in prodigious stocks of means, to be happy. Why do we not enjoy ourselves more with our stock as we go? Why not see that all rooms are ball-rooms, and that every passing moment is as good and precious as every other, if we did but know how to make it so? We have not enough extempore happiness in this country. In waiting for large results, we lose those thousands of small ones that make up, after all, the largest results of general comfort.]

A DOUBT AND AN ANSWER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LONDON JOURNAL, ON THE SPIRIT OF HIS RECENT WRITINGS.

Oh, H—, thou first refiner
Of the wordy strife,
Making daily life
And the human heart diviner!

Yet, think! a smile for ever
On all things thrown,
Defeats its own
Benevolent endeavour.

Love is enhanced by sparing;—
For praise and blame
Are both the same
When the bad and good are sharing.

Too much does such approving
Seem a studied task,
Or a ready mask,
And not a genuine loving.

Such wholesale satisfaction
With ill and good,
To the full pursued
Would stop all virtuous action.

Such doctrine, kind Professor,
Keeping all bent
In meek content,
Well suits the strong oppressor.

New blandishments are on thee:—
Let it not be said,
When the storm is fled,
That the sunny beam has won thee.

Philos.

Canterbury, September 1834.

We thank our correspondent for his kind expressions, and for the interest he takes in the consequences of people's writings; but he misconceives us extremely if he supposes that we are bent upon "smiling for ever," and "on all things." Did we do so when we wrote the article entitled 'A Human Being and a Crowd'? Do we really do so at any time? Is there no mixture of gravity, of serious thoughts, of thoughts elevated to pleasures above smiling? Do we not speak of death, of the stars, of tears, of the perplexities and struggles of existing systems? And do we not attempt to persuade people out of artificial troubles and uncharitable mistakes, —things which imply a ground of seriousness, and a very grave one too, even when visited by the sunshine of loving endeavour, instead of the doubtful light of fire and sword?

Pleasure, and that of a mere pleasurable kind, than usual, is, undoubtedly, the object of this journal; but pleasure of a noble sort, the pleasure of realising

"The goods the gods provide us,"—

the pleasure recommended alike by the most doubting experiment and the most trusting faith,—that of making the utmost of this green and golden world, the smallest particles of whose surface we have not yet learned to turn to account,—that of profiting alike from the toil that is incumbent on us, and from "the lilies of the valley that toil not, neither do they spin,"—that of omitting no real manly or womanly duty, (how often do we not talk of both); but at the same time of omitting to take no fitting repose or reward for it, seeing that nothing is complete in this world but where the strong (which is health of workmanship) and the beautiful (which is fitness of result) combine to render it so, and that the same sense of a want which is given us in small things, to incite us to supply it (and therefore we do supply it) is given us, by parity of reasoning, to incite us to supply it in the greatest (and why should we not?) Mankind are small and short-lived creatures, viewed only in their present mode of being; but they are great and full of years, considered as a hopeful, a retrospective, and a future species; and when we think of a few hundreds of ages compared with the lapse of time, the happy settlement of this earth may be no greater an action in the eye of eternity than theighting of a shoe.*

Above all, as respects ourselves, pray let our correspondent be assured that we are in earnest every jot, and that we affect nothing. We have no "studied task" (apart from the necessity of a task of some sort), and no "mask" whatever. We say nothing which we do not think, and manifest no feeling which is not that of our daily life and our most habitual enjoyments,—our talisman against trouble, and our best reward for exertion. A leaf, a flower, a fine passage of music, or poetry, or painting, a belief in a thousand capabilities of earth and man, give us literally as much delight as we say they do. We should not otherwise have been able to get through "a sea of troubles," nor to recommend as we do the loving light that has saved us.

We believe that if all men thought better of one another, that is to say, the best they could, doing justice to what is good, and making allowance for the causes and circumstances over which the first formation of character has no control, all "virtuous action" would be so far from "stopped," that it would proceed a thousand times more smoothly and successfully, and a stop be put to a thousand pernicious re-actions of hopelessness and resentment. Neither would the "oppressor" profit by it, except as a man bettered and instructed; for, in partaking of the charitable construction, he would learn to give it; and in the general progress of beneficent knowledge, he could, neither from feeling nor good sense, remain what he is. He would know his oppression to be good for nobody, not even himself.

As to "blandishments," and "sunny beams," and the "storm that is fled," we think the storm is indeed fled,—not surely over our own individual head, which has yet to struggle with the consequences of resisting it, but from the fair face of the world and its hopes; and so thinking, we hold that we have a right to look after the welfare of that head, and to indulge the inclination, which, we will venture to say, was always natural to us,—that of grappling in peace and good will with the hands of all men, and interchanging as many good offices as we can with all our fellow-beings, especially with those whom we conceive qualified by nature to advance the development of the world's best faculties, however obscured their sympathies may have been (like our own) during the melancholy irritabilities of warfare.

* Not that we think heaven meanwhile insensible to individual suffering, whatever may be the necessity for its appearing to be so. Among the infinite mysteries of other modes of being, and its renewals, it is easy to conceive that there is some mode understood for reconciling all. But far from easy is it to conceive that the maker of sensibility can be insensible to it.

THE TWO OAKS IN HYDE-PARK.

DEAR MR EDITOR,—Be so good as inform your correspondent who inquires about the Two Oaks, that they are lifeless, and that during the alterations, or, I believe, improvements, as they were called, which a few years ago took place in Hyde-park, when the solitude of that sequestered spot where the trees stand was invaded by a carriage drive, the idea was in charity conceived of clothing the naked members of these fakeers with a subsidiary verdure, for that of which time and nature had deprived them, thus offering to the wondering eyes of the metropolis, real old trees with real ivy round them. Shoots were planted round their bases, and a railing added to preserve the infant parasites from beasts and depredating hands.

The ivy has grown very slowly, and it has been said, though I doubt if correctly, that the dead and barren tree does not afford it sufficient encouragement. This I altogether suspect: there is not so much affinity between human and vegetable flatterers; on the contrary, I cannot but think it hard to call this beautiful climber a parasitic plant. Does it not better deserve to be called the emblem of Charity, covering with its rich and verdant mantle the most desolate and deserted objects? In the meantime, however, the trees stand like pugilists clothed upwards only to the waist, and their arms are thrown towards the sky with an air of wild and angry contention not a little singular and picturesque, and which, when they shall be crested over with the evergreen, can scarcely be excelled.—I remain dear Sir, also,

A CONSTANT READER.

THE SPECULATOR IN SPITE OF HIMSELF.

[From the New French Periodical, published in London, entitled 'Le Camélion.']

THE Count de Flamarens, having honourably terminated his military career, had retired to his estate, where an easy independence enabled him, with the help of economy, to sustain the dignity of his name. A law suit, which he had already carried with success through many courts, being taken by appeal before a higher tribunal, obliged him to make a journey to Paris. He travelled on horseback, proceeding by easy stages.

Passing through the forest of Fontainebleau, he saw a party of horsemen, who, taking a cross-road, appeared to be all travelling together. Curiosity induced him to follow them, although at the expense of going out of his way. Having proceeded some distance, they arrived at an open place in the wood, which was called the Fort de la Biche, where they all alighted, and each man tied his horse to the branch of a tree. M. de Flamarens by this time perceived that the objects of his curiosity were dressed with very little attention to appearances. It at once struck him that he was in the midst of a band of robbers; flight seemed impossible, for he saw many more approaching by the only path which would have served for his retreat. He presently bethought him that the best way to get himself through the scrape would be to do as he saw others do, and pass among the crowd for one of themselves. He therefore also dismounted, and tied his horse to a tree. His uneasiness was however much increased, when he observed all eyes fixed upon him, and the strangers, gathering in little knots, begin to whisper together, but without for an instant removing their eyes. At last one of them left the circle, and, coming straight up to him, asked him, with some embarrassment, what motive had brought him to the place? The Count, keeping to his first idea, without losing his self-possession, answered firmly, "Probably the same, sir, that has brought others." The deputed mediator retires, rejoins his companions, and the whispering is renewed with greater activity than ever. The negotiator presently returns, to offer the Count two hundred louis if he will withdraw! Astonished by so unexpected a proposal, he began to find his adventure highly diverting; without understanding anything of the business he was thus involuntarily engaged in, he answered at random, that it was not enough. The ambassador again retires, and again returns, to urge his proposal. The Count persists; and, after many trials of his firmness, is offered five hundred louis! He agrees, the gold is placed in his hands, and, mounting his horse, he departs amidst all possible civilities, as glad to get clear of his suspicious company, as they appeared to be to get rid of him.

Arrived at Milan, M. de Flamarens sought for some information that might elucidate the mysterious appearances he had witnessed, and, from what he learned, he gathered, that chance had brought him to Fort de la Biche, at the precise time that had been appointed for a sale which was to be made of a great part of the wood. Thence it was not difficult to conclude that he had fallen in with a party who had combined to bid for it; and that, taking him for an interloper, who will bid against them, they had thought his absence cheaply purchased at the rate of five hundred louis.

Good News for Settlers-up of London Journals.—If the desire to maximize good were present to the minds of public writers—if it were ever less their purpose to give pain to some object of individual hostility, than to further the great ends of popular felicity, the atmosphere of opinion would soon become bright and clear.—Bentham.

Hannah More.—In her thoughts on her own way of life, at Cowlip Green, the amount of false sentiment is prodigious. She separates her religious duties from the active engagements of her life,—a fatal error, which has led to the abstraction and mysticism of nunneries and monasteries, and their consequent vices. In tending of flowers, and even in paying visits, devotion may mingle; and if admiration of the works of God and charity to our neighbours be the concomitants of either act, more religion will belong to it than to all the leisure in the world. [From an excellent article in 'Fraser's Magazine,' on the "Life and Writings of Mrs Hannah More."]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

WE are very sensible of the continued kindness of The Scotsman, and of the cordial approbation bestowed upon us by the Glasgow Liberator.

The Editor will attend to the wishes of Z. Z., which came too late for his last communication. He does not see, however, that the hero of the verses in question could be offended with them, even if he recognized himself as the subject; which, perhaps, among the numerous worthies of his calling, is not very likely. The portrait, though genuine, is painted in a spirit which no honest traveller through the rounds of this life could be offended with.

The author of the verses on "Betty Bolaine" fears he may have hurt the feelings of an individual who is in the enjoyment of the property she left to an intermediate party. Assuredly he had no such intention, nor did we know of the existence of that individual.

A Constant Reader says, in reference to a contingency apprehended from the late eruption of Mount Vesuvius, that it was impossible for any direction of the lava to have affected the city of Naples, as there are hills between that place and the mountain.

R. R. of Leicester, "a youthful subscriber," who will learn to blot and to concentrate as he grows older, sends us some verses on a dying soldier, of which the two following stanzas are worth extracting for the contrast they present between a domestic death-bed, and that on a field of battle:—

Trampling hoofs—the gentle hands—
To smooth his pillow down;
Savage shouts the soothing sounds
To lull his dying moan!

Frantic shrieks and curses dark,
The prayers around him said;
Ruthless drums and cannons roar
The toll when he is dead!

The Christianity of the London Journal is not of the gloomy and contradictory sort inquired into by "One of the Million."

The 'Spirit of Business' has points in it; but altogether it appears to us not worthy of the talents of its author.

'Timothy Timbrous' will be good enough to find the answer to his query in the one given to E. D. in our last week's Journal.

'George Hawthorne's' idea of stories founded on the Police cases might be turned, we think, to good account; but we are unable to entertain the project in our publication.

We thought we had noticed the effusion to the 'Buttercup.' There are pleasant things in it; but it is too long. May we extract from it?

There was no offence whatsoever in the proposal of J. M. C. We shall look at his verses again.

The 'Sonnet to the Grave' shall be inserted.

AMIABLENESS SUPERIOR TO INTELLECT.

In our article, the other day, upon the gossiping old gentleman who appeared to sympathise so excessively with the lady's tooth-ach, we omitted to caution some of our readers against supposing that we were contradicting our usual sympathetic theories, and laughing at any innocent exemplification of them, however trivial. But though the gentleman was harmless, except in his tediousness, and not an ill-natured man, and did far better than if he had set himself to waste an equal portion of time in the manifestation of antipathy, yet sympathy was not the ground of his proceeding: it was pure want of ideas and a sensation,—the necessity of killing time. We should not object even to any innocent mode of doing that, where a human being lives under a necessity so unfortunate, and has not the luck to be a hedger or ditcher: but it is desirable not to let sympathy be mistaken for something different from what it is, especially where it takes a shape that is ridiculous.

On the other hand, with regard to the common-place of the matter, apart from an absolute extravagance of insipidity, far are we from wishing to treat common-places with derision, purely as such. They are the common clay of which human intercourse is made, and therefore as respectable in our eyes as any other of the ordinary materials of our planet, however desirous we may be of warming them into flowers. Nay, flowers they have, provided the clay be pure and kindly. The air of health and cheerfulness is over them. They are like the common grass, and the daisies and buttercups. Children have them; and what children have, the most uncommon grown people may envy, unless they have health and cheerfulness too.

It is Sir Walter Scott, we believe, who has observed somewhere, that men of superior endowments, or other advantages, are accustomed to pay too little regard to the intercourse of their less gifted fellow-creatures, and to regret all the time that is passed in their company. He says, they accustom themselves so much to the living upon sweets and spices, that they lose a proper relish for ordinary food, and grow contemptuous of those who live upon it, to the injury of their own enjoyment. They keep their palate in a constant state of thirst and irritation, rather than of healthy satisfaction. And we recollect Mr Hazlitt making a remark to a similar effect, namely, that the being accustomed to the society of men of genius renders the conversation of others tiresome, as consisting of a parcel of things that have been heard a thousand times, and from which no stimulus is to be obtained. He lamented this, as an effect unbecoming a reflecting man and a fellow-creature (for though irritable, and sometimes resentful, his heart was large and full of humanity); and the consequence was, that nobody paid greater attention than he to common conversation, or showed greater respect towards any endeavours to interest him, however trite. Youths of his acquaintance are fond of calling to mind the footing of equality on which he treated them, even when children, gravely interchanging remarks with them, as he sat side by side, like one grown person with another, and giving them now and then (though without the pomp) a Johnsonian "Sir." The serious earnestness of his

"Indeed, m'm!" with lifted eyebrows, and protruded lips, while listening to the surprising things told him by good housewives about their shopping or their preserves, is now sounding in our ears; and makes us long to see again the splenetic but kindly philosopher, who worried himself to death about the good of the nations.

There is but one thing necessary to put any reflecting person at his ease with the common-place; and that is, their own cheerfulness and good-humour. To be able to be displeased, in spite of this, is to be insensible to the best results of wisdom itself. When all the Miss Smiths meet all the Miss Joneses, and there is nothing but a world of smiles, and recognitions, and gay breath, and loud askings after this person and that, and comparisons of bonnets and cloaks, and "So glads!" and "So sorrys!" and rosy cheeks, or more lovely goodnatured lips, who that has any good humour of his own, or power to extract a pleasant thought from pleasant things, desires wit or genius in this full blown exhibition of comfortable humanity? He might as well be sullen at not finding wit or genius in a cart full of flowers going along the street, or in the spring cry of "Primroses."

A total want of ideas in a companion, or of the power to receive them, is indeed to be avoided by men who require intellectual excitement; but it is a great mistake to suppose that the most discerning men demand intellect above every thing else in their most habitual associates, much less in general intercourse. Happy would they be to see intellect more universally extended, but as a means, not as an end,—as a help to the knowledge of what is amiable, and not what is merely knowing. Clever men are sometimes said even to be jealous of clever companions, especially female ones. Men of genius, it is notorious, for a very different reason, and out of their own imagination of what is excellent, and their power to adorn what they love, will be enamoured, in their youth, of women neither intelligent, nor amiable, nor handsome. They make them all three, with their fancy; and are sometimes too apt, in after-life, to resent what is nobody's fault but their own. However, their faults have their excuses, as well as those of other men; only they who know most, should excuse most. But the reader may take our word for it, from the experience of long intercourse with such men, that what they value above every other consideration, in a companion, female or male, is amiableness; that is to say, evenness of temper, and the willingness (general as well as particular) to please and be pleased, without egotism and without exaction. This is what we have ever felt to be the highest thing in themselves, and what gave us a preference for them, infinite, above others of their own class of power. We know of nothing capable of standing by the side of it, or of supplying its place, but one; and that is, a deep interest in the welfare of mankind. The possession of this will sometimes render the very want of amiableness touching, because it seems to arise from the reverse of what is unamiable and selfish, and to be exasperated, not because itself is unhappy, but because others are so. It was this, far more than his intellectual endowments (great as they were), which made us like Mr Hazlitt. Many a contest has it saved us with him, many a sharp answer, and interval of alienation; and often, perhaps, did he attribute to an apprehension of his formidable powers (for which, in our animal spirits, we did not care twopence) what was owing intirely to our love of the sweet drop at the bottom of his heart. But only imagine a man, who should feel this interest too, and be deeply amiable, and have great sufferings, bodily and mental, and know his own errors, and waive the claims of his own virtues, and manifest an unceasing considerateness for the comfort of those about him, in the very least as well as greatest things, surviving, in the pure life of his heart, all mistake, all misconception, all exasperation, and ever having a soft word in his extremity, not only for those who consoled, but for those who distressed him; and imagine how we must have loved him? It was Mr Shelley. His genius, transcendent as it was, would not have bound us to him; his poetry, his tragedy, his philosophy, would not have bound us; no, not even his generosity, had it been less amiable. It was his unbounded heart, and his ever kind speech. Now observe, pray, dear reader, that what was most delightful in such a man as this, is most delightful, in its degree, in all others; and that people are loved, not in proportion to their intellect, but in proportion to their love-ability. Intellectual powers are the leaders of the world, but only for the purpose of guiding them into the promised land of peace and amiableness, or of showing them encouraging pictures of it by the way. They are no more the things to live with, or repose with, apart from qualities of the heart and temper, than the means are without the end; or than a guide to a pleasant spot is to be taken for the spot itself, with its trees, health, and quiet.

It has been truly said, that knowledge is of the head, but wisdom is of the heart; that is, you may know a great many things, but turn them to no good account of life and intercourse, without a certain harmony of nature often possessed by those whose knowledge is little or nothing. Many a man is to be found, who knows what amiableness is, without being amiable; and many an amiable man, who would be put to the blush if you expected of him a knowing definition of amiableness. But there are a great many people held to be very knowing, and entertaining the opinion themselves, who, in fact, are only led by that opinion to think they may dispense with being amiable, and who in so thinking confute their pretension to knowingness. The truth is, that knowledge is by no means so common a thing as people suppose it; while luckily, on the other hand, wisdom is much less uncommon; for it has been held a proof of one of the greatest instances of knowledge that ever existed, that it knew how little it did know! whereas every body is wise in proportion as he is happy or patient; that is to say, in proportion as he makes the best of good or bad fortune.

A Resource.—It is neither paradoxical, nor merely poetical, to say "That seeking other's good, we find our own."

This solid yet romantic maxim is found in no less a writer than Plato; who, sometimes in his moral lessons, as well as his theological, is almost, though not altogether, a Christian.—Sharp's Letters and Essays, (Third Edition, just published.)

THE "HANS SACHS" OF DOVER.

[THE following letter and verses, some of which we have extracted from much longer poems, all exhibiting a real power struggling with conventional forms of language, will speak for themselves. All we shall say to the author is, let him stick to his trade and his verses too, for thus he will reconcile duty and pleasure, and help the world to learn how noble and manly a thing is every useful employment, and capable of being associated with elegant recreation. We must own that we cannot patronize the keeping of birds in cages, any more than we would the keeping of a man in one, if birds were lords of the creation, and fond of catching Brahams and Catalans; but we publish the verses connected with it, partly because of their freshness, and partly to show how the kindest and most reflecting natures may be led to give into a custom without thinking of it—nay, even while pitying its victims. But our author will tell us, perhaps, that he did not imprison the bird; he only found it imprisoned, and retained it so. There is a perplexity in that point, we acknowledge; but the custom should be discountenanced, especially by the considerate. Imprisonment is a melancholy state for any creature; but, of all creatures, a winged one is surely the most unfit for it. Suppose Mr D. writes some verses on that view of the subject?]

Dover, August 31, 1834.

SIR,—The account you have given in one of your late Numbers, from 'Carlyle's German Literature,' of a "Guild of Poets!" in Nürnberg, and the circumstance of one of my own calling, the redoubted Hans Sachs, being the prime head of the fraternity, led me to think of my own attempts in the same way; and as I have no desire to be "left standing on my own basis as a singular product," as was the honest German, I have, through the opportunity of a friend going to London, resolved to try if I could base myself—though a shoemaker—on the favour of the 'London Journal,' and find some "seat-room" for the few pieces I have herewith forwarded for the purpose. Believe me, Sir, the hardihood of this attempt I know well; I know (and yet, alas! too poorly know) who is to scrutinize my pretensions; and have some conception of the manner in which an Editor is haunted by "Poets!" and must be haunted, notwithstanding a thousand letters of Goethe's were to be reprinted, to keep the "order" in some sort of abeyance. All this I know well, and as proof to you that I, like the rest, am not to be easily deterred, I do as I do, and await with fear and trembling the awful result of your answers to Correspondents, which, though couched with such art and delicacy, are yet, I surmise, in all cases, not without their bitter.

I am, Sir, your admirer, and as such your grateful
and most obedient servant,

J. D.

P.S. I hope, under the circumstances in which I write, you will excuse all that may be excusable, and set my errors down, not so much to an inability of knowing better, as to a want of an opportunity of ever being put in the way of knowing. Like the spider, I have been compelled to spin from my own in-gatherings, never having the aid of another as to the taste or solidity of my manufacture. I have weaved my own woof, like the witch in Gray, and must be content with its quality, indifferent or absolutely bad, as it may be; there is no choice—for myself there is not, but with you the matter is otherwise.

A BIRD'S KNOWLEDGE.

Could'st thou but tell to me, my pretty bird,
The now sole cheerer of my passing home,
What in the far-off fields to thee occur'd,
When there, the live-long day, thou us'd to roam,
'Twould make, I think, sweet verse!

Tell what thou'st witness'd in thy freedom's day,
And haply will thy bondage lighter seem;
As oft the soul, when pleasant fancies play,
Creates again fresh being in its dream:
Come tell the charming tale!

How thou did'st look upon the opening morn,
As starting from thy rest within some tree,
And saw the sun glint o'er its blushing boughs,
And forcing into life, all gallantly,
Making the dark clouds fall!

TO MY ROBIN ON HIS SINGING BY CANDLELIGHT.

Whence comes, sweet thing, this wondrous confidence,
Soft singing in a light thou ne'er could'st know,
When thou did'st nestle in the hedge-row's fence,
To slumber on till day again might grow?
Whence comes it, or who taught thee thus to vie
With the far famous sorcerer of the night?
Or seek'st thou with the poet but to try
How thou can'st, too, promote thy own delight,
Finding employment in the bosom strain
That comes in lonely hour to soothe one's pain?

SONNET.

[On seeing a Rainbow stretch across the Channel from Dover to the opposite Coast of France,—
Saturday Evening, August 30, 1834.]

Magnificent Phenomenon! with thee
Can aught of beauty in this world compare,
As now thy proud arch runneth o'er the sea
In all its mixture of rich colours rare?
Thrown superb 'gainst the concave Heavens,
there!
Thou send'st thy brilliance down on either side
On Britain and the Gaul-land o'er the wave,
As they in peace were ever to abide.
Oh! bow of Mercy! be thou then our guide
To keep this feeling worshipp'd, for 'twill save
The Nations from much wrong and hurtful pride,
And many a worthy one from timeless grave.
Let thou, or seen, or not, be understood
As the bright type of universal good!

Indian Hospitality.—The virtue of hospitality in India, as elsewhere, prevails most in the wilder and more unfrequented districts. "I sometimes frequented places," says Forbes, "where the natives had never seen an European, and were ignorant of every thing concerning us; there I beheld manners and customs simple as were those in the patriarchal age; there, in the very style of Rebecca, and the damsels of Mesopotamia, the Hindoo villagers treated me with that artless hospitality so delightful in the poems of Homer, and other ancient records. On a sultry day, near a Jinore village, having rode faster than my attendants, while waiting their arrival under a tamarind tree, a young woman came to the well; I asked for a little water, but neither of us having a drinking vessel, she hastily left me, as I imagined, to bring an earthen cup for the purpose, as I should have polluted a vessel of metal; but as Jael, when Sisera asked for water, gave him milk and 'brought forth butter in a lordly dish,' so did this village damsel, with more sincerity than Heber's wife, bring me a pot of milk, and a lump of butter, on the delicate leaf of the banana, the lordly dish of the Hindoos. The former I accepted; on my declining the latter, she immediately made it up into two balls, and gave one to each of the oxen that drew my hackery. Butter is a luxury to these animals, and enables them to bear additional fatigue.—Oriental Annual.

Sensible Apartment.—A very extraordinary practice, which might perhaps be advantageously imitated in more civilized communities, prevails among the superior classes of Hindoos. They have in their houses an apartment called Krodhagara, or "The Chamber of Anger," in which any member of the family who happens to be out of temper, shuts himself up, until solitude has medicined his rage. When sufficient time for reflection has been allowed, the master of the family goes and endeavours to bring back the seceder to the domestic circle. If by chance it should be a woman, he inquires what she wants. To this, perhaps, she replies, that she desires to have a large fish to eat every day—having probably seen one in the hands of some female member of the family,—or a palanquin and bearers to carry her daily to the river to bathe; or a large sum of money to perform the worship of some idol; or rich garments, and costly and beautiful ornaments. Having obtained her wishes, she consents (to borrow a vulgar English adage) "to come out of Coventry."—The Hindoos.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

SLID—TRIAL OF SPENCER COWPER, AFTERWARDS JUDGE COWPER, AND GRANDFATHER OF THE POET.

No comment need be made upon this singular case, except, perhaps, that the poor girl, after all, was less in love than she took herself to be; otherwise she never would have left such a step in the mind of an honest and well-meaning man. Wilfulness was predominant over loveliness.

Spencer Cowper, a barrister-at-law, of fair character and honourable family, in the reign of King William, and in the full career of a profitable practice, was accused of murdering the daughter of a wealthy quaker at Hertford; a charge for which he was tried at the assizes of that place, eleven years after the revolution. And it must be confessed that there were circumstances in the conduct and behaviour of Mr Cowper, and other persons associated with him in the indictment, which, though not sufficient absolutely to fix and bring home the crime upon them, certainly required explanation.

Repairing to Hertford, as was his custom, at the assizes, he had been prevailed on by pressing and repeated invitations from the fair quakeress, to dine, and pass a good part of the afternoon and evening at the house of her mother, a respectable widow, with whom she lived. He had been with her almost the whole of the time without a third person; was the last who had been seen in her company; and, at a late hour of the night, they had both gone out of doors, while the servant was warming a bed, as she supposed for Mr Cowper.

The unhappy female returned no more, and the first news her miserable mother heard, after a night of agitation, suspense, and anxiety, was, that the corpse of her daughter had been found floating in a river not far from their dwelling.

It is not necessary to describe the acute sufferings of a parent, or the silent mortification of a fraternity who, if they have more than one fault, it is, that, with considerable temptations to triumph, they somewhat overvalue themselves, in excelling most men in purity of manners. The coroner, after as fair and impartial an inquiry as he was able to make, pronounced it a case of lunacy; and the family followed their poor kinswoman to the grave, with the hopeless regret that such kind of deaths generally produce.

But reports unfavourable to the deceased, and to the visitor of her family, were industriously circulated by folly or by malice. Certain ignorant or prejudiced bye-standers asserted that they saw a dark, circular mark round her neck, as they drew the body from the water, and that the distention which generally takes place in drowned bodies was not observed. From these, and other circumstances hastily taken up, they rashly concluded, that the young lady had by no means destroyed herself, but that some unwarrantable method, probably strangling, had been made use of, to shorten her life, before she was thrown into the river.

It was also proved that a party of gentlemen, friends and acquaintances of Mr Cowper, and some of them attendants on the judges of the assize, had arrived at Hertford the night the deceased was missing; that they were heard to make her the subject of their conversation, and to use the following remarkable expression soon after their arrival: "Her courting days will soon be over; a friend of ours will quickly be even with her."

It ought further to be mentioned, that party politics had for many years run high at this place; that Mr Cowper's father, and, we believe, his brother, were at the period in question sitting members for the town, after a warm and strongly contested election; for these and other reasons, it was supposed that many circumstances were exaggerated, and that the opportunity was thought favourable, and eagerly seized on by an exasperated minority, to cast an odium on the family and connexions of a successful candidate; the quakers also were anxious to remove the stigma of suicide and intrigue from a member of their society.

Whatever were the motives of the different persons concerned, the public mind was highly agitated, and the populace inflamed. After much cavil and clamour, the body was disinterred, and accurately examined by professional men, who, after a long and elaborate discussion, determined that there were strong grounds for suspecting Mr Cowper and his associates of being guilty of murder. The gentlemen were immediately taken into custody, and arraigned at the ensuing assizes.

The position of a man of unblemished reputation, liberally educated, and by his connexion and profession generally known and respected, thus, at once accused of murder, attended with circumstances of peculiar foulness and aggravation, naturally excited general curiosity and attention, and produced a crowded court. To remove not only from himself, but his friends, the danger as well as disgrace attached to so shocking a charge, Mr Cowper brought a number of physicians, surgeons, and anatomists, eminent in their day,—Sir Hans Sloane, Sir Samuel Garth, and a namesake, but not relation, of the barrister's, a diligent and accurate dissector, who ought never to be named without praise; these, and many other gentlemen proved, to the satisfaction of the court, that the arguments adduced by the medical men, in support of the prosecution, were unfounded and inconclusive; that the circumstance of the corpse having little or no water in the stomach, did not originate from its being dead previous to falling in, but that it frequently occurred with suicides, who plunge in, determined resolutely to die. That the case was very different with those drowned by accidents, who, in their efforts to emerge, and often to call for assistance, generally struggle for some time, and swallow a considerable quantity of water.

This, and much more of scientific theory, abstruse reasoning, and anatomical explanation, in which judges, jurymen, and all unprofessional men, must be governed by the decisions of others, was long and fully urged on both sides, and concluded in favour of the opinion, that the young woman had thrown herself into the river.

In answer to what had been said of a mark round her neck, it was denied by several respectable witnesses that any such appeared: they agreed that there was a discoloured spot below the ear, and another near the collar bone, but neither of them circular, or such as a cord drawn tight on the neck would have left; they were accidental bruises, probably produced by the body falling against piles, near which it was found, or settlements of blood, not unfrequent, on such melancholy occasions.

After a long and impartial examination of a variety of witnesses, Mr Cowper was asked what he had to say in his defence. Struggling between the urgency of his case, and the laudable delicacy which has been generally observed in anything that collaterally or directly relates to such subjects, he was compelled to confess, that the unhappy young lady, on account of whose death he appeared that day at the bar of a court in which he had so often pleaded, had long secretly nourished, and at length expressed, a strong attachment to him, which, as a married man, and as the father of a family, he had dissuaded her from giving way to, by every means in his power.

The letters, in justice to himself and the gentlemen who, by some strange concurrence of circumstances, or some perverse misrepresentation, had been implicated with him in the charge, he would presently submit to the inspection of the court; but he wished first to give a plain unvarnished tale of the whole of his conduct with respect to the deceased.

Mr Cowper then proceeded to observe, that when she saw no probability of her passion meeting with approval, she became low-spirited, melancholy, negligent of her dress, and had been heard in different places and by various persons, to drop expressions of discontent and despair, purporting that her abode in this world would be of short duration; of which, in due time, he would bring sufficient evidence. The very evening they spent together, he observed, the last evening of her life, the conversation, which he little thought of ever repeating in public, was passed in soothing and, he had trusted, salutary advice on his part, and in tears and tender reproaches on hers; and he threw himself, he said, on the pity of every person present of either sex, to spare his entering into further details on the subject, when he solemnly declared that no alternative remained, but his quitting the house peremptorily and abruptly, with a female endeavouring to convince him that he should not do it, or forgetting the line of conduct which in every respect became him.

Mr Cowper then appealed to the general tenor of his life and conversation, to which he called many and respectable witnesses. He asked if any reasonable motive could be adduced for his atrociously murdering one who had long been his client, the object of his most friendly regard and commiseration, and who, without any encouragement from him, had yielded to a fatal infatuation, which deprived her of life; one who, but for this fatal weakness, might have been a credit and comfort to her family? He hoped that the situation in which he stood would not only excuse but justify his making public that which otherwise would never have passed his lips; and having entered into a long, circumstantial, and satisfactory account of many particulars, which it is not necessary to repeat, and after producing strong vouchers in confirmation of all that he had said, he concluded with taking two letters out of his portfolio, which the deceased had addressed to him. These strongly corroborated the defence in every particular.

Such letters, the more singular from having been written by a quaker, and one, too, whose general deportment had been consistent with the prudent manners of the society, raised the curiosity of the court and excited the attention of the judge, Mr Baron Hatsell, who desired to look at them. Having perused them as a literary novelty, and seeing a brother of the deceased, he demanded of him what he thought of the hand-writing? "It is like my sister's," replied the honest secretary, struggling between his love of truth and fraternal affection; "but the sentiments avowed are so contradictory and inconsistent with the whole tenor of her previous life and conversation, that I hesitate in believing them to be hers."

The same question being put to her mother, the poor lady answered with the asperity of a parent bereft of her darling daughter, under circumstances so appalling;—"Nothing will persuade me that these abominations proceeded from the heart or the pen of Sarah; I believe not a word of all that has been said." Many of the intimate friends, however, of the family, and several persons unbiased by the ties of nature, interest, or corporate feelings, were reluctantly compelled to confess, that the hand-writing resembled that of the deceased as nearly as possible; and that to the best of their knowledge and belief, they considered her as the writer of the letters in question.

The persons indicted with Mr Cowper being called upon to explain their singular conversation (before alluded to) on the night of their arrival at Hertford, replied that Mr Marshall, a common friend of themselves and Mr Cowper, had formerly paid his addresses to the deceased; that for a certain time she encouraged, but at length refused his offers; and that when they understood Mr Cowper was at her house, their chat over their cups was unguarded concerning her, having often joked Mr Marshall on the subject; that the words produced against them they remembered to have made use of, but they only meant, perhaps in a spirit which they did not pretend to justify, that the barrister ought not to be very scrupulous in his treatment of a woman, who had behaved like a jilt and a coquette to her former lover.

The accused parties were honourably acquitted.

A DOMESTIC ADMISSION INTO THE SPECULATIONS OF A GREAT AND LOVING MIND.

(From Mrs Austen's 'Characteristics of Goethe.')

IN the summer of 1809, one afternoon, I called (says a friend) on Goethe, and found him sitting in the garden enjoying the mild weather. Katz, the landscape painter, for whom he had a singular regard was also there. Goethe sat at a small garden table; before him stood a long-necked glass, in which a small live snake was moving about with great vivacity; he fed it with a quill; and made daily and minute observations upon it. He maintained that it knew him already, and raised its head to the edge of the glass, as soon as he came in sight.

What splendid, intelligent eyes! said he. A great deal was half finished in this head, but the awkward writhing body would not allow much to come of it. Nature, too, has cheated this long, ensheathed, organization of hands and feet; though this head and these eyes might well have deserved both. Indeed, she frequently leaves such debts unpaid, at least for the moment, though sometimes she afterwards pays them under more favourable circumstances. The skeletons of many marine animals clearly show, that, when she made them, she was full of the thought of some higher race of land animals. Very often, working in an ungenial and untractable element, she was obliged to content herself with a fish's tail where she would evidently have used to give a pair of hind feet into the bargain—nay, even where the rudiments of them are clearly discerned in the skeleton.

Near the glass which contained the snake lay some chrysalids of caterpillars, whose forthcoming Goethe was expecting. They showed a remarkable mobility, sensible to the touch. Goethe took them off the table, watched them eagerly and attentively, and then said to his boy—Carry them in doors, they will hardly come out to-day. It is too late now. It was four in the afternoon.

At this moment Frau von Goethe (Madame Goethe) came into the garden.

Goethe took the chrysalids out of the boy's hand, and laid them again on the table.

How magnificent that fig-tree is in leaf and blossom, exclaimed Frau von Goethe to us from a considerable distance, as she advanced towards us along the middle walk of the garden. After greeting me and receiving my salutations in return, she immediately asked me whether I had gone close to the fig-tree to admire it. We will not forget, said she, at the same time addressing herself to Goethe, to have it matted next winter.

Goethe smiled and said, Let yourself be shown the fig-tree—and that directly—or we shall have no peace this evening. And it really is worth seeing, and deserves to be handsomely dealt with and provided for.

What is the name of the exotic plant, resumed Frau von Goethe, which a man lately brought us from Jena?

Do you mean the great hellebore?

Yes, it thrives admirably.

I am glad of it. We shall make a second Anti-jira, of this place, in time.

There, I see, lie the chrysalids—have you seen nothing yet?

I laid them there for you. Do listen, I beg of you (taking them again in his hand and holding them to his ear), how it knocks; how it jumps; and will burst forth into life!

Wonderful would I fain call these transitions of nature, were not the wonderful in nature the most usual and ordinary. But we must not omit to let our friend here partake of this sight. To-morrow, or the day after to-morrow, the butterfly will probably be here, and a prettier, more elegant thing you have seldom seen in your life. I know the caterpillar, and I summon you to attend to-morrow afternoon, at the same hour, in the garden, if you have a mind to see something more remarkable than the most remarkable of all the remarkable things Kotzebue saw on his long journey to Tobolsk, in the most remarkable years of his life.* Meanwhile let us put the box in which our yet unknown beautiful sylph lies enclosed, and decks herself in all her splendour for to-morrow, into a sunny window in the summer-house.

So there you stand, my nice, pretty child. Nobody will interrupt you in this corner, nor disturb you while you are completing your toilet.

Well, for my part, said Frau von Goethe, casting a side glance at the snake, I could not endure such a nasty thing as that near me, still less feed it with my own hands. It is such a disagreeable creature! It makes me shudder to look at it.

Hold your tongue, replied Goethe,—though, tranquil as he was himself, he was generally not displeased at this vivacity of expression in those around him.

Yes, added he, turning to me, if the snake would but spin himself a house, and turn into a butterfly to oblige her, we should hear no more about nasty things. But, dear child, we can't all be butterflies, nor fig-trees dressed with flowers and fruit. Poor snake! they despise you! they should treat you better! How he looks at me! How he rears his head! Is it not as if he knew that I was taking his part? Poor thing, how he is pent up there, and cannot come forth, how fain soever he be! Doubly, I mean, first in the glass, and then in the scaly case in which nature has enclosed him.

As he said this, he began to lay aside his reed pencil, and the drawing paper to which he had made some strokes towards a fantastic landscape, without seeming the least interrupted by the conversation.

The servant brought water, and while he was washing his hands, he said, to return once more to Katz, the painter, whom you must have met as you came in, the sight of him is most agreeable and refreshing to me. He is exactly the same in every respect in Weimar as he was in the Villa Borghese. Every time I see him it is as if he brought a bit of the dolce farniente of the Roman atmosphere of art, into my presence. As he is here, I will arrange a little scrap-book of my drawings. We constantly talk a great deal too much; we ought to talk less and draw more. I, for my part, should be glad to break myself of talking altogether, and speak like creative nature only in figures. That fig-tree, that little snake, the chrysalis that lies there on the window, quietly awaiting its new existence,—all these are frequent signatures, indeed he who could decypher them might well afford to dispense with the written and the spoken. The more I reflect upon it, the more it strikes me that there is something so useless, so idle, I could almost say so buffoonish in talk, that one is awe-stricken before the deep solemn repose and silence of nature, as soon as one stands withdrawn into oneself, and confronted with her, before some massive wall or rock, or in the solitude of some venerable mountain.

I have brought together a number of varieties of plants and flowers, said he, pointing to the fantastic drawing before him, strangely enough here, on this piece of paper. These spectres might be yet more wild and fantastic, and the question might still remain, whether the originals of them are not actually to be found in some part of the world or other.

In design, the soul gives utterance to some portion of her inmost being; and the highest mysteries of creation are precisely those which (as far as relates to their fundamental plan) rest intirely on design and modelling;† these are the language in which she reveals them.

The combinations in this field are so infinite, that they afford a place even for the exercise of humour. I will take only the parasitical plants; how much of the fantastic, the burlesque, the bird-like, is contained in their fleeting characters! Their flying seeds perch like butterflies on some tree, and feed upon it till the plant is full grown. Thus, rooted in the very bark, we find the mistletoe, from which bird-lime is made, growing like a branch out of the pear-tree. Here, not content with fastening itself as a guest, it forces the pear-tree to supply its very wood out of its own substance.

† Zeichnung und plastic. It might be Englished,—outline and form.—Trans.

The moss on trees, which is also a parasite, belongs to the same class. I have some very fine preparations of this tribe of plants, which undertake nothing on their own account, but deposit themselves, in all directions, on something that comes ready to their hand. I will show you them at some favourable opportunity—remind me of it. The peculiar construction of the rooty part of certain shrubs, which also belong to the parasitical class, is explained by the ascent of the sap, which is not drawn (according to the common course of nature) from a rude, carthy matter, but from one already organized and fashioned.

No apple grows from the middle of the trunk, where it is rough and woody. A long series of years, and the most careful training are necessary to transform the apple-tree into a fruitful, succulent tree, sending forth blossom and then fruit. Every apple is a globular compact mass, and, as such, requires both a great concentration, and at the same time an uncommon refining and perfecting of the juices which flow into it from all sides.

Figure to yourself Nature, how she sits, as it were, at a card-table, incessantly calling au double!—i. e. exulting in what she has already won, through every region of her operations; and thus play on into infinitude. Animal, vegetable, mineral, are continually set up anew after some such fortunate throws: and who knows, whether the whole race of man is anything more than a throw for some higher stake?

During this agreeable conversation, evening had closed in; and as it was grown too cool for the garden, we went up stairs into the sitting-room. Some time after, we were standing at the window, the sky was thick-sown with stars. The chords in Goethe's soul, which the open air in the garden, and the works of nature had struck, still quivered, and during the whole evening their vibration was not stilled.

All is so vast, said he to me, that an end—a cessation of existence—is nowise to be thought of. Or do you think it possible that the all-creating Sun may be intirely effete with the production of his own planetary system; and that his earth-and-moon-creating power may be intirely gone out of him, or lie utterly inactive and useless? I can by no means believe this. It appears to me extremely probable, that beyond Mercury, which is still small enough, a still smaller star will sometime or other become visible. We see, it is true, from the position of the planets, that the projectile power of the Sun is notably decreased; since the greatest masses in the system are at the greatest distance from him. In this way to pursue our reference, the time may come that the projectile force may be so exhausted, that the attempted projection of a planet may miss. If the sun cannot sever and cast off the young planet to a proper distance, like its predecessors, he will, perhaps, have a ring, like Saturn's, form itself around him, which, being composed of earthly particles, would reduce us poor earth-inhabitants to a sad condition. And, indeed, the shadow of such a ring would produce a not very cheering effect upon all the other planets of our system. The genial influence of light and heat must naturally be greatly diminished by it, and all organizations whose development is their work, must in their several degrees be cramped and stunted by it.

On this view of the subject, the spots in the sun might certainly cause us some uneasiness for the future. Thus much is certain, that at least, in all that we know of the past history and the laws of our planet, there is nothing to prevent the formation of a solar ring, though, to be sure, it would be difficult to assign any time for such an event.

A Caution to Uncharitable Judgments of Extraordinary Men.—The world is habitually unjust in its judgments of such men (as Burns); unjust on many grounds, of which this one may be stated as the substance. It decides, like a court of law, by dead statutes, and not positively, but negatively; less on what is done right, than on what is, or is not, done wrong. Not the few inches of deflection from the mathematical orbit, which are so easily measured, but the ratio of these to the whole diameter, constitutes the real aberration. This orbit may be a planet, its diameter the solar system, or it may be a city hippodrome; nay, the circle of a gin-horse, its diameter a score of feet or paces. But the inches of deflection only are measured; and it is assumed that the diameter of the gin-horse and that of the planet will yield the same ratio when compared with them. Here lies the root of many a blind condemnation of such men as the Burnses, Swifts, Rousseaus, which one never listens to with approval. Granted, the ship comes into harbour with shrouds and tackle damaged, and the pilot is therefore blameworthy, for he has not been all-wise and all-powerful; but to know how worthy, tell us first whether his voyage has been round the globe, or only to Ramsgate and the Isle of Dogs.—Thomas Carlyle.

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 29th October, to Tuesday the 4th November.

THE FIRE OF LONDON IN 1666.

In consequence of the late event in the metropolis, of which every body is talking, but which it does not fall within the province of our Journal to write upon, we have been looking into our books to see what we could lay before our readers this week respecting some other event of the like sort. We have to apologize to them for not being able to find anything better than an extract out of a production of our own; but it is not for want of the inclination to do so. We would have given them a better account of the great fire of London, could we have found one. As it is, we may observe that the present narrative, though forming part of a work of fiction, was carefully founded on passages in authentic writers. It is taken from 'Sir Ralph Esher, or Adventures of a Gentleman of the Court of Charles the Second,' a work which was announced as a novel, but which it would have been better to publish solely as what it was intended to be,—the imitation of a real set of translated Memoirs,—an humbler and more scrupulous Count de Grammont. The hero, who is a courtier but a good fellow, is giving the account of the fire himself:—

I was pondering on these things one night, as I was sitting in the parlour at Mickleham, looking on a beautiful moon, and delaying to go to bed, when Bennett came in and told me that there was a dreadful fire in London. One of the tradesmen had brought news of a dreadful fire the day before; but, as every fire was dreadful, and I had seen the good people of London run away from a cow, crying out "a mad bull," I had thought nothing of it, and was prepared to think as little of the new one. The old gentleman, however, assuring me that both fires were one and the same, that it had burnt a whole night and day, and was visible as far as Epsom, I thought it time to see into the truth of the matter. I ordered my horse, and promising to bring back a correct account, purely to satisfy the house that there was no such thing (for some of the domestics had kindred in London), I set off at a round gallop, looking towards the north, as if I could already discern what I had doubted. Nobody was stirring at Leatherhead, but at Epsom, sure enough, there was a great commotion; all the people being at their doors, and vowing that they saw the fire, which, however, I could not discern. That there was a fire, however, and a dreadful one, was but too certain, from accounts brought into the town, both by travellers and inhabitants; so, with the natural curiosity which draws us on and on upon much less occasions, especially on a road, I pushed on, and soon had pretty clear indication of a terrible fire indeed. I began to consider what the King might think of it, and whether he would not desire to have his active servants about him. At Morden the light was so strong, that it was difficult to persuade oneself the fire was not much nearer; and at Tooting you would have sworn it was at the next village. The night was, nevertheless, a very fine one, with a brilliant moon.* Not a soul seemed in bed in the village, though it was ten o'clock. There was a talk of the French, as if they had caused it. By degrees, I began to meet carts laden with goods; and on entering the borders of Southwark, the expectation of the scene was rendered truly awful, there was such a number of people abroad, yet such a gazing silence. Now and then, one person called to another, but the sound seemed as if in bravado, or brutish. An old man, in a meeting of cross roads, was haranguing the people in the style of former years, telling them of God's judgments, and asserting that this was the pouring out of that other vial of wrath which has been typified by the fiery sword,—a spectacle supposed to have been seen in the sky at the close of the year sixty-four. The plague was thought to have been announced by a comet.

Very different from this quieter scene was the one that presented itself on my getting through the last street, and reaching the water-side. The comet itself seemed to have come to earth, and to be burning and waving in one's face, the whole city being its countenance, and its hair flowing towards Whitehall in a volume of fiery smoke. The river was of a bloodish colour, like the flame, and the sky overhead was like the top of a pandemonium. From the Tower to St Paul's there was one mass of devastation, the heat striking in our eyes, and the air being filled with burning sparkles, and with the cries of people flying, or removing goods on the river. Ever and anon distant houses fell in, with a sort of gigantic shuffling noise, very terrible. I saw a steeple give way, like some ghastly idol, its long white head toppling, and going sideways, as if it were drunk. A poor girl near me, who paced a few yards up and down, holding her sides as if with agony, turned and hid her eyes at this spectacle, crying out, "Oh, the poor people! oh, the mothers and babies!" She was one of the lowest of an unfortunate class of females. She thought, as I did, that there must be a dreadful loss of lives; but it was the most miraculous circumstance of that miraculous time, that the fire killed nobody, except some women and infirm persons with fright.

* Evelyn, speaking of this night, says that it was "light as day for ten miles round about, after a dreadful manner." 'Memoirs,' vol. 1. p. 201. second edit. 4to. Sir Ralph does not seem to make the light so strong, but he does not absolutely say it was otherwise. Perhaps Evelyn speaks of a later hour. The flames appear to have become visible afterwards to the distance of forty miles.—EDIT.

I took boat, and got to Whitehall, where I found the King in a more serious and stirring humour than ever I saw him. Mr Pepys, begging God to forgive him for having an appetite at such a crisis, and interrupting his laughter, at the supper they gave him, with tears of pity and terror, had brought word to his Majesty that the whole city would be destroyed, if some of the houses were not blown up. The King accordingly not only dispatched myself and others to assist, but went in person with his brother, and did a world of good. I never saw him look so grim, or say so many kind things. Wherever he went he gave the people a new life, for they seemed dead with fright. Those who had not fled (which they did by thousands into the fields, where they slept all night) seemed only to have been prevented from doing so, by not knowing what steps to take. The Lord Mayor, a very different one from his predecessor, who showed a great deal of courage during the plague, went about like a mad cook with his handkerchief, perspiring, and lamenting himself; and nobody would have taken the citizens for the same men who settled my court friends at the battle of Naseby. The court, however, for that matter, was as frightened as the city, with the exception of the King and one or two others; so terrible is a new face of danger, unless there is some peculiar reason for meeting it. The sight, indeed, of the interior of the burning city was more perilous, though not so awful, as its appearance outside. Many streets consisted of nothing but avenues between heaps of roaring ruins, the sound of the fire being nothing less than that of hundreds of furnaces, mixed up with splittings, rattlings, and thunderous falls; and the flame blowing frightfully one way, with a wind like a tempest. The pavement was hot under one's feet; and if you did not proceed with caution, the fire singed your hair. All the water that could be got seemed like a ridiculous dabbling in a basin, while the world was burning around you. The blowing up of the houses, marked out by the King, was the ultimate salvation of some of the streets that remained; but, as a whole, the city might be looked upon as destroyed. I observed the King, as he sat on his horse at the beginning of Cheapside and cast his eyes up that noble thoroughfare; and certainly I had never seen such an expression in his countenance before. Some said that he now began to see the arm of heaven in these visitations, and that he resolved to bethink himself from that time, and lead a new life. I know not how it was: the new life certainly was not led; but his thoughts were very solemn; perhaps they would have been more so, had not a madman pretended to show him the arm of heaven literally stretched over the city, "like unto the arm of a blacksmith;" and had not another afterwards, (who got hung for it) pretended that he helped to set the city on fire, and that the Papists had employed him. The poor wretch was a Papist himself, and numbers believed him. Others said the French did; others the Dutch; and others the Republicans; particularly as the 3rd of September, that is to say, the day on which it did not break out, was the anniversary of Cromwell's victory of Dunbar. Many thought that all these, Papists and Protestants, had made up a plot; but the opinion that secretly obtained most ground was, that it was a punishment for the sin of gluttony; the greatest argument, next to the looks and consciences of the aldermen, being the appalling fact, that the fire began at Pudding Lane, and ended at Pye Corner. The fire raged four days and nights; and on the 5th of September, London, from the Tower to Fleet street, was as if a volcano had burst in the midst of it and destroyed it, the very ruins being calcined, and nothing remaining in the most populous part to show the inhabitants where they had lived, except a church here and there, and an old statue. I looked into it three days afterwards, when the air was still so hot, that it was impossible to breathe; and the pavement absolutely scorched the soles of my shoes.

The loss of property by the fire was of course far greater than that by the plague; and yet, assuredly, it was not felt a thousandth part so much, even in the city; for money, with the lovers of it, is not so great a thing, after all, as their old habits and affections. The wits at court never chose to say much about the plague; but the fire, after the fright was over, was a standing joke; and the beneficial consequences to the city itself soon became manifest, in the widening and better building the streets, an improvement which came in aid of the cleanliness which was resorted to against the plague; so that instead of a judgment against the King and his government, Rochester said, in his profane way, that heaven never showed a judgment of a better sort.

SPECIMENS OF CELEBRATED AUTHORS.

VOITURE.

VINCENT VOITURE (says the General Biographical Dictionary) once celebrated as an elegant French writer, was the son of a wine merchant, and born at Amiens, in 1596. His talents and taste for the belles lettres gave him considerable celebrity, and easily introduced him to the polite world. He was the first in France distinguished for what is called bel esprit; and though this is all the merit of his writings, yet this merit was then great, because it was uncommon. His reputation opened his way to court, and procured him pensions and honourable employments. He was sent to Spain about some affairs, where, out of curiosity, he passed over to Africa. He was mightily caressed at Madrid, where he composed verses in such pure and natural Spanish, that everybody ascribed them to Lopez de Vega. It appears by his letters that he was in England in 1633. He made two journeys to Rome, where, in 1638, he was admitted a member of the Academy of Humoristi; as he had been of the French Academy in 1634. He was the person employed to carry the news of the birth of Louis XIV to Florence; and had a place in the household of that monarch. He had several considerable pensions from the court; but the love of play and women kept him from being rich. He died in 1648. He wrote verses in French, Spanish, and Italian; and there are some very fine lines written by him, but they are but few. His 'Letters' make the bulk of his works, and have been often printed, in two vols. 12mo. They are elegant, polite, and easy; but, like the genius of the writer, without nerve or strength. Boileau praises Voiture excessively; and doubtless, considered as a polisher and refiner in a barbarous age, he was a writer to be valued; yet his letters would not now be thought models, and are, indeed, seldom read. Voiture, says Voltaire, gave some idea "of the superficial graces of that epistolary style, which is by no means the best, because it aims at nothing higher than pleasantries and amusement. His two volumes of letters are the mere pastime of a wanton imagination, in which we meet with not one that is instructive, not one that flows from the heart, that paints the manners of the times, or the characters of men; they are rather an abuse, than an exercise of wit." With all this insignificance, Voiture's 'Letters' cost him much labour; a single one took nearly a fortnight, a proof that his wit came slower in writing than in conversation, otherwise he would never have been the delight of every company. Pope appears to have had a good opinion of these letters, as he thought them a suitable present for Miss Blount, and never seems to have suspected that this was not paying that lady's delicacy any great compliment.

Notions of delicacy vary with times and manners. The compliment paid to Miss Blount was such as would have been gladly received by any lady of that period, as may be seen by what is addressed to ladies of all ranks and times of life, in the works of contemporary writers. Voiture's pains-taking to be easy amounts to the ludicrous; yet he has succeeded, after his fashion; and it can be easily understood how he may have talked with facility, though he wrote slowly; for personal manner, and the warmth of intercourse, supply what is wanting in the one instance; whereas a letter is to be read deliberately, and in cooler moments; and the writer is thus put upon striving to do his best. We cannot think, with Voltaire, that our author has failed so intirely in painting the manners of the times; for, not to mention the features that occasionally transpire, he has, at all events, given us an egregious picture of the delicacies of his own coxcombry, half banter, and half in earnest. He is the Brummell of flatterers; and his letters should be read accordingly in the last new tone. It is astonishing how this fetches them out. If the reader cannot do it for himself, or chuse to do it, he should fancy them read out by some actor of stage-dandies.

Voiture was one of the artificial wits, whose race was swept away by the manlier genius of Molière. His talent, however, though beaten out and thinned into such trifling, was genuine, and in the subsequent age might have given him a far solid reputation.

tation. The first of the ensuing letters, which is addressed to a celebrated brother wit and letter-writer, is surely exquisite of its kind,—the quintessence of exaggeration. That to the Marchioness of Rambouillet, the great blue-stocking of her day, and patroness of hyperbole, is more extravagant, and not so nicely managed. His ludicrous comparisons with Alexander, now-a-days would be taken for pure affronts to a woman's understanding. But surely these are also specimens of "manners;" and now and then, during his most extravagant moments, it is impossible to help admiring his wit and grace.

But pray let the fancy of the reader mince and dandify the words in perusal.

TO MONSIEUR DE BALZAC.

SIR,—If it be true that I have always kept the rank which you tell me I have held in your memory, methinks you have shown but a very indifferent concern for my satisfaction, in delaying so long to impart the pleasing news to me, and suffering me to be the happiest of men, without dreaming I was so. But perhaps you were of opinion, that this very good fortune was so infinitely above anything I could in reason hope for, that it was necessary you should take time to invent arguments to render it credible, and that you had occasion to employ all the power of rhetoric, to persuade me I was not forgotten. And thus far, at least, I must needs own you have been very just; for, in resolving to let me have nothing but words for all the affection you owe me, the choice you have made of them has been so rich and so beautiful, 'that, let me die, if I believe what they assure me of would be of greater value. This, at least, is certain, that they would suffice to counterbalance any friendship but mine. I am only discontented at one particular, viz. that so much artifice and eloquence should not be able to disguise the truth from me; and that in this I should resemble your own shepherdesses, who are too simple to be beguiled by a man of wit.

Nay, I know not if the very extravagancies of a soul so exalted as yours are not too serious, and too reasonable to descend so low as to me. And I shall esteem myself too obligingly treated, if you have but so much as dreamed of your loving me; for to imagine that you have actually reserved a place for me amidst those sublime thoughts, which are, at present, employed in recompensing every one's virtues, and distributing shares of glory to mankind,—to imagine this—would be an excessive presumption. I have too high sentiments of your understanding to believe you would be guilty of what is so much below you, and I should be unwilling your enemies should have that to object to you. I am perfectly satisfied that the only affection which you can have justly for any one, is that which you owe to yourself; and that the precept of studying oneself, which is a lesson of humility to all but you, ought to have a contrary effect in your instance, and oblige you to contemn whatever you find in others.

I have not seen anything of yours done since your departure which does not surpass all you have done before; and by your last works you have the honour of excelling him who excelled all others. It cannot therefore appear strange, that when you have so much reason to be contented, you should yet be complaining; and that you yourself should be the only great man who remains dissatisfied with you.

For my own part, I have always in so public a manner professed myself so, that if, through ill-fortune, I should not be able to love you as much as I have done, yet here let me swear to you, that you shall be the only man to whom I will dare to declare it; and that I will always proclaim myself, to the rest of the world, to be as much as ever,

Your, &c. &c.

TO THE MARCHIONESS OF RAMBOUILLET.

MADAM,—Though my liberality should, as you tell me, surpass the bounty of Alexander, it would nevertheless be richly recompensed by the thanks which you have returned me for it. He himself, as boundless as his ambition was, would have confined it to so rare a favour. He would have set more value on this honour than he did on the Persian diadem; and he would never have envied Achilles the praise which he received from Homer, if he could but himself have obtained yours. Thus, Madam, on this pinnacle of glory whereon I stand, if I bear any envy to him, it is not so much to that part of it which he acquired himself, as to that which you have bestowed upon him; and he has received no honour which I do not hold inferior to mine, except it be that which you did him, when you declared him your gallant. Neither his vanity, nor the rest of his flatterers, could ever persuade him to believe what was so advantageous to him; and the quality of Son of Jupiter Ammon was abundantly less glorious. But if any thing comforts me for the jealousy which it has raised in me, it is this, Madam,—that knowing you so well as I do, I am pretty well assured, that if you have done him this honour, it is not so much on the account of his being the greatest of mankind, as of his having been now dead these two thousand years. However, we here find cause to admire the greatness of his fortune, which not yet forsaking him, so many years after his decease, has added to his conquests a person who gives them more lustre than the daughters and wife of Darius; and which has gained him a mind greater than the world he conquered. I ought here to be afraid, after your example, of writing in a too lofty style. But how can the writer be too sublime who writes of you, and of Alexander? I humbly beseech you, Madam, to believe that I have for you a passion equal to that which you show for him; and that the admiration of your virtues will oblige me to be always, Madam,

Your, &c. &c.

TO MADEMOISELLE RAMBOUILLET.

MADAM,—I do not at all wonder you laughed so heartily when you wrote me word of the strange, unaccountable report which is spread of me; namely, that I have neither goodness nor friendship in me; for really nothing was ever uttered more ridiculous; and you had good reason to hear it in the same manner, as if you had been told that Mons. de Chateaubonne robs on the highway, or has married the daughter of Mons. Des—'s gentleman. For my part, I cannot help wondering that such a false opinion, and so unguarded a calumny should have extended so far, and infected three provinces; and whoever gave it birth, he who did it must be the most dangerous person on earth. I will inquire diligently to find out the author or authors; and if I discover it, I positively will be revenged, even be she or they as lovely and terrible as yourself.

You told me some time ago, Madam, a piece of news to which I made no answer, because I was then in the dumps; but since you inform me of the report which is now spread, I must say, that I think the other is as strange as ever I heard. Though I am, as well as any one, acquainted with the charms of the Marchioness de, I shall never have done wondering how, at a time when she had no man living in her thoughts beside her Doctor and her Cook, when she was dressed in the Rataan we saw, with two or three napkins about her head; how, I say, she could then win the heart of a man so hard to please, as I take the Marquis to be, and send a lover to sigh for her in the Thebaid deserts? The spark you mention would have done well to go after him; or if he did not care for taking so long a journey, he might at least have turned hermit upon the Valerian mountain. But in sober sadness, instead of putting the questions you propose to me from him, he had better hold his tongue, and not speak again these seven years. Nevertheless, Madam, I will answer them, since you desire it. The first,—“Why, being dressed in blue, he always seems dressed in green?” is one of the most arduous questions I ever heard proposed in any science whatever; and, for my part, I cannot find what can be the cause, unless the gentleman, instead of rising at one in the afternoon, and being dressed by three, as he used to be formerly, is now grown more lazy, and never appears but by candle-light. However it be, I should advise him to wear green, in order to see whether he will not then seem dressed in blue. As for the second,—“Which I would have him resolve upon, to take La Motte, or to deliver me out of the hands of the Saracens?” Without a grain of selfishness, I think this last enterprise, besides its being the juster of the two, is also the more difficult, and consequently the more glorious. There are five-and-twenty thousand foot and six thousand horse, who are to take care to guard me with as much care as Gueldres and Anvers; yet he has no need to be frightened at this; for Hector the Brown did alone defy five-and-thirty thousand men in Northumberland, and I do not think he was so valiant as our friend; and then he has no occasion to apprehend that he shall have any want of laurels here: the finest to be found in all Europe grow in this country. On my side, I promise him, I will take care to see to them, and get the crowns made. But, besides Saracen soldiers, he will have Saracen ladies to fight with too; some of whom will not quietly see me taken from them; and the report which you tell me is spread all over three provinces, is not yet come to one of the seventeen. I have not so ill a character here as I have in the place where you live; and it is believed, that though I should not be so very much inclined to love, I should nevertheless be worthy to be beloved. Yet, Madam, I own this is no consolation to me; and I shall think myself very wretched, if, among all the persons in France for whom I have so good a respect, there is not one who has such a great opinion of me as to believe that my heart is formed as it should be; that I can constantly honour those who deserve it, and infinitely love those who are infinitely lovely. I cannot tell what you, for your part, think of it; but, I assure you, no one has less cause to doubt it; and I am as perfectly as I ought to be, and as you could wish, Madam,

Your, &c. &c.

TO MONSIEUR DE CHAVIGNY.

[A real delicacy and feeling almost intirely pervade this letter.]

SIR,—Take notice, I beg you, how far people have extended the report of the credit I have in you. Mons. Esprit, who is going to court with a letter of recommendation from M. to you, thought it would be better if I recommended him to you, and I was so vain, that I chose rather to be so bold as to do it, than to tell him that I durst not. He is really, sir, one of the most agreeable men breathing; his mind is just such a one as you love; he is very good, very wise, very learned, a very great divine, and a very great philosopher; yet he is not one of those who despise riches; and as he is positive he should know how to make a right use of them, he would not be sorry if he could obtain a good abbey; for which Madame d'Alguillon has written to my lord cardinal. That will depend on his eminence; but it will depend upon you to give him a good reception, and that is all he desires. After the character I have bestowed on him I believe it is needless to add the humble supplication I make you in his behalf; and I only do it because he desires I would, and I have been always used to do whatever he would have me. But, sir, having said thus much for his interest, I hope the rules of friendship do not forbid me to say something of my own, and to beg you will do me the honour to continue loving me, and to believe that I am, Sir,

Your, &c. &c.

SPECIMENS OF THE ESSENCE OF POETRY.

[From a capital article in the 'Dublin University Magazine.' This is the first time we ever really knew what admirable poets existed in old times in Ireland,—men full of the union of an heroic vigour with a woman's feeling. The italics are the writer's own marking, and argue no little critical fortitude in being so spare. We should have been tempted to score almost all the verses, from the whole of the first pathetic and most poignant stanza, down to the exquisite delicacy of the darted javelin at the conclusion.]

The affection of the hereditary bard, it will at once be seen, is, primarily, reverence to the principle of sacred duty ultimately shaping itself, through regard to the point of honour, into its second nature of personal attachment. It is, in a word, piety concentrated into loyalty, natural religion supplying the instinct of natural love. Neither foster-father, nor father himself, could feel more yearning affection for his son, could more anxiously express the fondest alarm for his safety, or more proudly exult in his achievements, than does the bard O'Hussey for his chief, but not relation, Hugh Maguire! We take the extract from Mr Hardiman's unpublished collection in the Egerton MSS., British Museum.

O'HUSSEY'S ODE.

Cold weather I consider this night to be for Hugh!
A cause of grief is the rigour of its show'ry drops;
Alas! insufferable is
The venom of this night's cold.

This night, it grieves my heart,
Is fraught with the thunder-flashing heavy storm,
Succeeded by an icy congealment
Less ruthless than the hate which pursues him.

From the sullen breasts of the clouds
The flood-gates of heaven are let loose;
The vapours exhaled from the salt sea;
The firmament pours down in torrents.

Though he were a wild creature of the forest,
Though a salmon in an inlet of the ocean,
Or one of the winged fowls of air,
He could not bear the rigour of this weather.

Mournful I am for Hugh Maguire
This night in a strange land,
Under the embers of thunderbolts, amid the showers flaming,
And the keen anger of the whistling clouds.

In the country of Clan Daire
It grieves me that his fate should be so severe:
Perhaps drenched with the cold wet dripping off
the thickets;
Perhaps exposed to the high heaven's floods.

Cold seem to me your two cheeks strawberry-red,
As the fury of the cloud-gathering storm
Impels the weather-winds of the aerial expanse
Against the royal hero of resplendent Galeng.

Sore misery to us, and torturing our bosoms
To think that the fine front and sides of his comely frame
Should be ground by this rough, sullen, scowling night
In cold steely accoutrements!

His kind-dealing hand, which punished cruelty,
By frost made numb;
Under some spiked and icicle-hung tree—
Oh, bleak and dreary is this night for Hugh!

Overflowed by the tempestuous torrent
Are the low banks of the cold rivulets;
The lawns of pasture are locked in ice,
So that the cattle cannot graze.

Drenched are their borders also,
So that the inhabitants cannot perceive
The quick-flowing edges of the sunny clear streams:
To keep dry the huts is impossible.

Fearful to him is the excessive rigour
In some intricate wood, 'mongst bones of monsters:
A bright retrospective glance on peaceful days
Were now a torrent to Mac Niadh's tender heart.

This, however, brings the warmth
To his tranquil clear countenance,
His warriors charging like bright billows of the sea,
Wafted in fleeces, wind-borne, fire-flashing.

Unkindled fires shall warm him
Though frost should glaze the glistening dew of his eyes,
Though his fine fair fingers should be bound in icy gauntlets,
And his garments be the red-flaming thunderflash.

Far from the journey of Hugh Maguire
Are Munster's green woods, waving to the fair setting sun in the west;
Her splendid mansions, rich and hospitable,
And a country without frost or misery.

AVRAN.*

Hugh marched, though it grieved me, with his host to battle,
And his tresses soft curling are hung with ice—
Cause of warmth to the hero are the shouts of war,
And the many mansions lime-white which he laid in ashes.

O'Hussey was a poet. There is a vivid vigour in these descriptions, and a savage power in the consolation drawn from their antithetical climax, which claim a character almost approaching to sublimity. Nothing can be more graphic, yet more diversified, than his images of unmitigated horror, nothing more gradually startling than his heroic conception of the glow of glory triumphant over frozen toil. We have never read the poem without recurring, and that by no unworthy association, to Napoleon on his Russian campaign. Yet perhaps O'Hussey has conjured up a picture of more inclement desolation, in his rude idea of northern horrors, than could be legitimately employed by a poet of the present day, when the romance of geographical obscurity no longer permits us to imagine these Phlegrean regions of endless storm, where the snows of Hæmus fall mingled with the lightnings of Etna, amid Bistonian wilds or Hyrcanian forests. This ode possesses a new interest in our papers, for it is the first our readers have yet met, in which description has not been altogether sacrificed to sentiment. But O'Hussey's descriptions are pervaded by intense sentiment, and here there is no sacrifice of either—a rare conjunction of felicities in Irish song.

While the impression is still hot, let us complete the vindication of O'Hussey's claim to descriptive power, pious sentiment, and devoted loyalty. Hear how he strikes out Tiege MacBrian at a single heat:—

How thy wrath springs and bounds
In thy free, ember-like, ruddy aspect,
Like a destructive thunder flash!
Is it the fright of war, or peril of battle,
Excessive anger, or oppression of rulers,
That convulse thy mind,
Thou rak'd-up ember of Connaught!

Again, a battle-piece that makes us almost think we snuff the "war-clouds rolling dun" of Thomas Campbell,—

Heroes polishing their glowing weapons
Sounding trumpets loudly martial,

A frosty foggy wind with whistling darts flying—
These are the music in which you delight at early dawn.

Here again, a scene of intense mystic romance, a Salvator Rosa partner for Keats's — " Magic casements opening on the foam

Of perilous seas in faery-land forlorn."

The perilous ways of the borders of Leinster:—
Borders of slow-calling sounds,
Gloomy borders of bright mountains severe,
The intricate deserts of Anmehaidhe.

* A concluding stanza, in which the condensed sentiment of the piece is given as in the epigraph of an heroic poem.

Between the wooded banks of Barrow, and the steep steps of Blackstairs lie many a black bog and misty valley girdling their grey wall of mountain, with solitude which, we can well imagine, whispered moaning horror from inextricable swamps and thickets, where Kavanagh held sylvan court in Saint Mullins, and O'Hussey made his hearers shudder in the hall of Tempo, at the perils of the dark Leinster borders. Here it was that the ill-fated Richard wound his disastrous way through woods and quags, for six weeks, with Art MacMurrough hanging on his discomforted march, and Henry Bolingbroke turning his reluctant stay to royal account, at home; but neither kern nor quagmire could stop the progress of that Iron Saxon, who first made his way through the scattered clans of Byrne, Toole, and Kavanagh, and from the maiden passes of Kill-Edmond, and the sleepy hollow of Scallagh Gap, carried the fire and sword of the republic through bog and glen, and breached castle wall, from Ballyburris to Waterford and Clonmel. Kill-Edmond is no longer, in O'Hussey's words,—

The breast of mountains, and wind-whirling vales,*
Where no host dare cross.

Yet, were we an exciseman, we should prefer making our descent upon the bogs from Graig or Carlow. But to return to O'Hussey, of whose descriptive excellence we have had abundant proof; let us, by one more extract, exhibit him in his pious character of a faithful and true clansman. His ode is now for Cuconnaught, in the north, with Hugh.

But I would not deem the weather inclement,
If I were with him in his distress:
How happy would I be this night,
If I were under one garment with Cuconnaught!
I would not complain of the rude winds,
When standing on the watch for him;
Nor the pelting rain would I regard, though drenched
my garments,
Beside Hy Duach of tempests!

But the didactic devotion of this declaration is consumed in a glow of adoring affection, when he apostrophises the chief himself,—
Thou joy! thou promise! thou sprightly salmon!
Thou beauteous azure ocean wave!
Thou power of panic into the breasts of heroes!

This exceeds Macpherson; O'Hussey is no unfit representative of the true Ossian, but Ossian was a Prince, and O'Hussey sought no higher honour than to be the bard of Maguire. Maguire was his theme, his mark, his sacred butt for devoted shafts of endless and untiring panegyric. "Be on thy guard!" he cries, aiming at his idol's heart.

Be on thy guard, for I will dart
This lay as a javelin cast from me!

And could he, like Cupid in Anacreon, shoot himself bodily into the soul of his chief, he would follow his swift iambs to their unreluctant destination. Whether the next O'Hussey would as successfully fulfil his military duty by the next Maguire, must have been more than doubtful; for such writing as this as we have just seen, is not to be expected in every generation; but whether or not he might equal his father in poetic art and in fervour of poetic feeling, we have no doubt he would not have been deficient in pious emulation of loyal will.

* What divinus in the tortuous energy of the epithet!

PRETTY STORY OF AFFECTION IN CHILDHOOD.

(From Mr Clarke's 'Adam the Gardener'.)

[We have been given to understand, on the best authority, that this agreeable little picture of mixed liveliness and tenderness (the most agreeable of all pictures) is from the pen of a lady. We mention this, because it is always pleasant to know how much one is obliged to the sex; and the more modest they are in their pretensions, the more delightful does it become to show one's gratitude.

We take this opportunity of stating, that the book we lately inquired after, — Mr Clarke's new and purified edition of Chaucer, with the spelling modernized,—will appear early next month.]

Dame Barton was an honest, hard working woman, who lived with her husband and son, in a small hut under Dover Cliffs. Her husband was a fisherman, and as industrious as herself; for he laboured night and day at his trade to support his wife and child, till one dreadful day he was drowned in endeavouring to save the crew of a ship, that was wrecked in sight of the hut, on the sea-shore.

About three months after his death, as little John Barton was sitting one evening, mending a net for a neighbour, opposite to his mother, he suddenly exclaimed, Oh, mother, how tired you must be of spinning! You have sat at your wheel ever since four o'clock this morning, and now it is seven o'clock, yet you have hardly stirred from your work.

It is the only means of getting you a bit of bread, Johnny, since poor father left us.

Don't cry, mother, said little Johnny, running towards her; but I do so wish that I could do something myself to earn money enough to keep you from sticking so close to that bur—bur—burring wheel; I mean something of real use to you, continued he, as his mother looked at the net which he had been mending; I wish I could do something better than mending the meshes of old nets.

You do enough for your age, dear, said his mother, and we shall manage to go on quite well while the summer lasts; all I dread to think of is the winter.

O, mother, if you should have your rheumatism come on then, what would you do? I wish I were older to work for you.

I cannot bear to think of it, answered his mother, weeping; if I should have my old complaint come back, I should not be able to work any longer, and then who is to take care of my poor Johnny? I have not a friend in the world that I could send to for help, if I were ill.

Don't you recollect, mother, the French gentleman you have often told me about? perhaps he would help you, if he could know you are so poor.

But he lives in Paris, and I can't write, so how is he to know the state I am in? answered his mother; or else I am sure he would never suffer any one belonging to the deliverer of his child to die of want. Besides, I well remember, (for many's the time I have heard my dear husband tell me the tale), when the child fell over the side of the vessel which was just ready to sail, and your dear father, plunging into the waves, brought back his infant safe and sound, and smiling in his face, the gentleman, after bending his head for an instant over the dear dripping babe, to hide his streaming eyes, (for, let a gentleman be never so manly, it's more than he can do to keep from crying like one of us, when he sees his own flesh and blood saved from death), he turned to your poor father, and said, in a fluttering-like, yet grand kind of voice, too—"Barton, you have done more for me than if you had saved my own life; I can never hope to repay you for the happiness you have given me at this moment, yet"—Before he could finish what he was going to say, your poor father turned away, saying, "Lord bless your honour, don't thank me; it's no more than what you'd have done for my Johnny, I'll swear, if you had seen him drop overboard like your young thing there." Your father was proud enough, then, Johnny, and he told me that he guessed that the gentleman was going to reward him, so he jumped into his boat which lay alongside, and the vessel sailed away immediately, and he never heard anything more of the gentleman: but though your father didn't want anything at that time from any body, being able, as he was, to gain his own living comfortably and honestly, much less to have a reward for having saved an innocent fellow-creature's life, yet I can't help wishing he'd made a friend of the gentleman, who couldn't but be grateful.

How long ago was this, mother? said John, after thinking a little while.

It was eight years since, come Midsummer day; I should surely remember it, continued Dame Barton, for when my good John Barton came home with an honest flush on his brow, and first told me the story, I looked on the dear babe I held in my arms, and thanked God it was not my own dear Johnny which had run the chance of a drowning death, instead of the little stranger. You were then a little more than a fortnight old, for to-morrow's the third of June, you know, your birthday, Johnny; and then you will be exactly eight years old.

Do you think the gentleman has forgotten what my father did for him, mother? asked Johnny, after another and a longer pause.

I don't think he has, but I can't say, for gentle-folk are apt to be forgetful. Perhaps, however, he has never been to England since then.

Little John said no more, but went on very busily with his work; so busily, indeed, that when his mother looked at him again, she saw that he had finished his job.

Why, how quickly you have worked, Johnny, said she, you didn't think to have done that net till to-morrow morning, did you?

No, mother, answered John, but when I am talking to you, and thinking hard, it's surprising how the work gets on; I'm glad I've done it though, continued he, rising to put by his mesh and twine, for I shall be able to take it to Bill Haul to-night, instead of to-morrow, as I promised him.

But it's getting dark, dear, I'm going to put away my wheel, said his mother.

Oh, it's not too late, mother, I shall be there and back before you have put by your spinning-wheel, and got the haddocks out ready for supper; so good bye, good bye, mother, added he, seeing that she did not prevent his going, and off he ran.

He's a dear, good little soul, and that's the truth on't, said Dame Barton to herself, as she listened to the eager footsteps of the boy, which crashed among the shingles, growing fainter and fainter every minute, till at last their sound could no longer be distinguished from the restless washing of the waves on the beach. I'm sure I oughtn't to be the one to check him when he's doing a good-natured turn for a neighbour.

It was a beautiful evening, and as little John Barton ran along the beach, he took off his hat, and unbuttoned his shirt-collar, that he might enjoy the cool breeze, for the day had been very sultry.

This air blows towards France, said he, half aloud, for I know that France lies over there across the blue water, and Paris is in France, and he lives in Paris. Oh, how I do wish, exclaimed he, passionately, and suddenly stopping short, and straining his eyes over the wide sea, how I do wish I could go to Paris! I would find him out—I would see him—I would tell him—I will, I must go, said he, interrupting himself, and again running forward. When he arrived at the cottage where his friend Bill Haul lived, he found a strange man there, speaking with Bill's father, whom he did not at first take any notice of, but kept on talking with Bill about the net; however, presently he noticed that the man talked in a different tone from what he usually heard, and used his arms very violently while he spoke, and, at last, John thought that he heard him say the word France, though in the same curious voice he had before noticed.

Isn't that man a Frenchman, Bill, that's talking to your father? asked John.

Yes, he's wanting father to buy a cargo of apples and eggs he has brought from France, and he's in a hurry to strike his bargain, because he wants to be aboard again by four o'clock to-morrow morning, but never mind him, Jack, he speaks such gibberish, that—

Did you say he was going to France at four o'clock to-morrow morning, Bill? interrupted little John.

Yes, the tide serves then to make the harbour of Boulogne, I heard him say, so he wants to be off—do but hear what a chattering the French mounseer makes, said Bill, who was about fourteen years of age, and thought it looked manly to ridicule a Frenchman. By this time the bargain was concluded between the fisherman and the apple-merchant, and, as the latter left the cottage, John Barton took rather a hasty leave of his friend, and ran after the stranger, whom he overtook just as he reached the beach.

Sir, Mr Frenchman, said John, as he approached him, somewhat out of breath,—sir, I want to speak to you if you please.

Heh, what you say, littel boy? said the man, turning round.

A'n't you going to France, sir? said John.

Yes, I am, to-morrow morning, et puis, but what den, my littel shild?

Why, sir, I want very much to go to France, and if you'd be so good as to take me in your boat—

Take you in my boat; what for should I do dat? answered the Frenchman.

Why, I can give you nothing for taking me, to be sure, said John; I have neither money nor anything else of my own to give away, but I will work as well and as hard as ever I can: I can mend nets, and I can tar boats, and I can—

Stop, stop, stop, interrupted the Frenchman, I was not tinking of what you could give me, or what you could do for me, but I was tinking what should be the use if I was to take you in my bateau—in my boat.

Oh, then, you will take me, sir! O, thank you, sir, said John, eagerly; what use did you say, sir? Oh, I want very much to go to France to find a gentleman who I hope will be a friend to my poor mother.

Your moder, did you say, my littel friend—if you want to go to France to do good to your moder, you must be de bons fils—de good son, so you shall go wid me in my bateau.

Oh, thank you, kind Frenchman, taking his hand and shaking it, and pressing it to his bosom, so overjoyed that he scarcely knew what he did, or what he said; then I will come to the harbour, by four to-morrow, and you will be there and take me. I shall be sure to find you?

Oui, yes, returned the Frenchman, you may come, but be sure you do not be too late after—you must be quite positifement a littel before four, because I would not lose de marais, dat is to say de what you call de tide, for de universe. So saying, he walked away in the direction of Dover town, leaving John to pursue his way home to the hut under the cliffs.

By this time the twilight had gradually given way to the coming on of night; and John Barton had been so earnestly engaged in talking and arranging his plan of going to France, that he had not perceived the increasing darkness. The sea that lay calmly before him, and the wide heavens that were above him, were both so exactly the same deep blue colour, that they seemed to touch and be one vast space, except that the waters beneath now and then broke into little white sparkles on the tops of the waves, and the sky over his head was bright with many stars. The cliffs around, with their white fronts stretching down towards the beach, looked cold and ghastly, and there was scarcely a sound to be heard but the flapping wings of a solitary sea-gull and the distant cry of the sailors keeping time to their pulling altogether, as they hauled in their cables.

Little John could not help stopping for a moment to look round upon a scene which, although seen by him every day, yet seemed now to look particularly beautiful, and, at the same time, of a kind of awful loveliness. Now that he stood quite alone, and had time to think, he felt that he had just done a very bold thing in undertaking to make so long a voyage of his own accord, and without having asked the advice of anyone, no, not even the advice of his own mother. And then came the thought of what she would say when she found what he had done. I know, thought he, I am doing right, for I am trying to do good to my mother, and perhaps if I had asked her leave first, she would have been afraid to let such a little boy as I am go all alone, and with strangers, too; but then no one would hurt such a little fellow as I, I am sure; and then she would think that I never should be able to travel in France, because I have no money, and I can't speak French, which I have heard everybody speaks in France, even the little boys and girls, and she would be afraid I should have no bed, and be obliged to lie in the fields, and then she would perhaps forbid me to go, which I should be very sorry for, because I should not like to disobey her, yet all the time I should know I ought to go; for though there will be a great many difficulties, to be sure, yet I feel that if I try hard and do my best to get through them and help myself, that God will be so good and kind as to take care of me. Little John, as he thought of all this, looked over the blue waters, and felt the tears come in his eyes, and a kind of swelling sensation come over his breast, and it seemed to him as if he had never prayed so earnestly in all his life, though he could not say a word. Just then he recollected that it must be very late, and that he had stayed away from home so long that his mother would be uneasy; so he ran as quickly as he could towards the hut, determining that he had better not mention his intention of going to his mother at all.

Why, Johnny dear, said she, as he bounced into the cottage door quite out of breath, what a long time you have been away. I suppose neighbour Haul kept you?

John felt inclined to say, yes, mother; but he knew it would not be quite the truth, so he said, I stayed a little time talking with Bill Haul, mother, and I stayed the rest of the time on the beach, but, if you please, mother, I would rather you wouldn't ask me what I stayed there for.

Very well, dear, said his mother; no harm, I dare say.

No, indeed, mother, answered John; and they sat down to their supper of dried fish, onions, and brown bread.

What ails you, child, a'n't you hungry, said his mother, observing that he cut off his usual portion of bread and fish, but that, instead of eating it at once, he took only a small piece of each, and put by the rest.

Thank'ee, mother, I don't wish the whole of it to-night, said John, for he thought that he should want something to take with him the next morning, and he did not like to deprive his mother of any more than he could help, as she could so ill afford to spare it. And then he was still more glad that he had not told his mother of his intended voyage, for, even if she had allowed him to go, she would have given him everything that she had in the house, and left herself intirely without food.

When the time came for going to bed, and little John wished his mother good night, as she placed her hand as usual on his head, and said, God bless you, my comfort, he again felt the swelling sensation at his breast, and was very much inclined to throw himself into her arms, and tell her all he had intended to do for her; but he checked himself, and saying, May He be a friend to us, kissed his mother fervently and tenderly, and ran hastily into his own little room, where he threw himself on his straw mattress, and was soon soundly asleep.

The first thing when he awoke, he was alarmed to see that it was already light, and feared that the sun must be risen. He jumped up, put on his clothes as quickly as he could, put up his two remaining checked shirts in a bundle together, with two more pair of grey stockings, and tying his best handkerchief (which his mother had given him for a keepsake) round her spinning-wheel, as a sort of farewell remembrance, for he could not write, he left the cottage, and ran as fast as he could along the sea-beach, eating part of the remainder of his supper as he went. It was not until he had reached the harbour, that he found the sun was already up, for the cliffs hindered him from seeing it while he was on the beach underneath them; he was afraid it was very late, and asked a man who was standing with his hands in his pockets looking at a crab that lay kicking on its back among some sea-weed, what o'clock it was. The man carelessly answered, without looking up, past four.

Oh, dear! I shall be too late; what shall I do? exclaimed little John. Master, continued he, turning again to the man, who was now scraping some sand with his foot over the sprawling crab, I say, master, have you seen a Frenchman about here this morning?

The man stared for a moment full in little John's face, and said, Lord, how should I know! and then returned again to his stupid cruel amusement.

Oh, dear me! what shall I do?—but I had better not stay here, thought little John, I must do as well as I can, and try to find him out for myself. He went towards a few men whom he saw at a little distance, who seemed to be watching some fishing-boats going out. As he pushed into the midst of them, he felt himself touched on the shoulder, and on looking round, he saw his friend, the Frenchman.

Ah, my little ami, my little friend, said he, you are very good time here, I see.

Oh, I am glad I have found you, I was afraid I should be too late, for a man told me just now, that it was past four o'clock.

No, no such ting, answered the Frenchman, it is half a hour past tree only.

Oh, I am so glad, for then there will be time for me to run and leave a message with Bill Haul for my mother, who, I am afraid, will be frightened, when she finds I have gone away.

The Frenchman agreed, telling him to mind and be back in time, and so John went to Bill Haul, and told him all about his intended journey to France, begging him to go every day and see his mother, and be kind to her, for his sake, while he was away. Bill Haul promised all this, for he loved little John Barton for his good nature and obligingness, so that when John returned to the harbour he felt much happier than he did before, now that he knew his mother would know where he was, and that she would have some one to go and help her in his absence. At first, John Barton was very happy on board the Frenchman's boat, helping him and two other men who were aboard to work the vessel, but when he had been there about an hour and a half, he began to feel very sick at the stomach, and his head ached so much, that he had a great mind to ask Jacques Bontemps (which was the name of the captain of the little French vessel), if he might go into the cabin and lie down for a little while; but as he saw that he and the men were busy, he thought he would manage as well as he could for himself; so seeing a large boat-cloak in a corner, he threw himself upon it, and had not lain long there before he felt quite recovered, which perhaps would not have been the case if he had gone below, as the warm air of a confined cabin is more likely to bring on sea-sickness than to relieve it. The fresh air of the deck, and his being constantly at work, made him quite well; and when the Frenchman came to him to see if he wanted any breakfast, he found that he was very hungry. He produced a small bit of dried fish and some crust, which was all that was left of his provision, and began to eat it.

Ah, my poor little ami! What, is dat all what you have for your dejeuner?—for your breakfast. Stop, stop! Stay, let me see if I cannot give you something better.

The kind Jacques went and fetched him some boiled eggs, wine, some bread, and something which he called fromage de cochon.*

John thanked him, and eat it very heartily; but he mixed some water with the wine. Jacques Bontemps, who was watching him, said: Ah, ha! it is all very well dat you put de water to de wine now, but you will like it quite by itself when you have been a little time in France. What for are you going to France? continued he, and for how long time?

John answered that he did not know how long he should be there, but he was going to try and find out a gentleman who lived in Paris.

And what name is de gentleman? and what street in Paris does he live in? asked Jacques.

But when little John told him he knew neither, and that he had no money, nor could not speak a word of French, the good-natured Frenchman lifted up his hands and eyes in astonishment, and exclaimed: Bon Dieu, est il possible! My poor little friend, how will you do to travel all dat way if you have no money? I would myself go wid you and show you de way, but I must not leave my métier—my trade; and I have very little money to give away, but what I can give, I will. So saying, the good man took out a half-franc piece, and fifteen sous, and gave them to little John Barton, who had scarcely ever had so large a sum in all his life.

[To be concluded in our next Journal.]

* This literally means pig-cheese: it is pork cut into bits, with sweet herbs, and pressed into a shape, looking something like brawn.

† Good God! is it possible?

§ A sous is worth an English halfpenny.

Self-Riches.—At an inn in Sweden, there was the following inscription in English on the wall, "You will find at Trollhathe excellent bread, meat, and wine, provided you bring them with you;" and this will almost serve for a description of human life, so much depends upon the temper that events are met with, and on the prudence that foresees and provides against them.—Sharp's Letters.

TABLE TALK.

Benefits of Ventilation.—For several weeks before the plague broke out in London, in 1665, there was an uninterrupted calm, so that there was not even sufficient motion in the air to turn a vane. And at the season in which the last plague visited Vienna there had been no wind for three months. To produce agitation in the air, fires were formerly lighted, and pieces of artillery discharged, means altogether inefficient to cause a considerable commotion in the atmosphere at large, though a fire is extremely serviceable in renewing the air of apartments in houses: the only means adequate to this end are beyond our controul, though they frequently take place at the moments of the utmost need: these are storms and hurricanes which, however desolating in their immediate effects, are instruments of great, though less obvious good. After the hurricane which proved so destructive to the inhabitants of the West Indies, in 1780, less disease occurred than had been known before; even those who laboured under sickness at the time were benefited by it; fever, diarrhoeas and dysenteries, but, above all, disorders affecting the lungs, were cured. Cases of intermittent fever were observed to be cured by an earthquake at Caracas, in March, 1812. (See 'Brand's Quarterly Journal of Science' for 1817, vol. II. p. 401.) After the expectation of a storm, plants give out more oxygen, which accounts for the delightful and life-giving freshness of the air, of which every one is sensible who walks out into the fields immediately afterwards.—One of the most convincing proofs of the different influence of foul and pure air is to be found in the 'Report of the Lying-in Hospital of Dublin.' In the space of four years, ending in 1784, in a badly ventilated house, there died 2944 children out of 7650. But after freer ventilation, the deaths in the same period of time, and in a like number of children, amounted only to 279. Attention to this point will prove a protection from numerous causes of disease. The annual mortality of Manchester, in 1757, was 1 in 25, and in 1729, 1 in 28; but in 1811, it was 1 in 74; a charge mainly attributable to the improvements in ventilation effected by Drs Percival and Ferriar.

Opinions of Aristotle.—The works of this philosopher (of which, however, only forty-eight exist, out of a multitude supposed to have amounted to four hundred) embrace nearly the whole range of human knowledge as it existed in his day. He was the inventor of the syllogistic mode of reasoning, the principles of which he lays down in his work on logic. In his books on rhetoric, he has investigated the principles of eloquence with great accuracy and precision, inasmuch that they form the basis of all that has since been written on the subject. His work on poetics, or rather the fragment which has come down to us under that name, although almost intirely confined to the consideration of the drama, contains principles applicable to poetical composition in general, and is equally distinguished for precision and depth of thought. Those on ethics and politics are also remarkable productions; and although the former has been effectually superseded by a more perfect system, the latter contains much that is interesting, even at the present day. In his metaphysics, he expounds the doctrine of Being, abstracted from Matter, and speaks of a first mover—the life and intellect of the universe, eternal and immutable, but neither omnipresent nor omnipotent. When treating of physics, he does not in general lay down rules a priori, but deduces them from the observation and comparison of facts. This being the case, we might expect that such of his writings as relate to natural history should contain much truth. He holds that all terrestrial bodies are composed of four elements, earth, water, air, and fire. Earth and water are heavy, because they tend towards the earth's centre; while air and fire, which tend upwards, are light. Besides these four elements, he has admitted a fifth, of which the celestial objects were composed, and whose motion is always circular. He supposed that there is above the air, under the concave part of the moon, a sphere of fire to which all the flames ascend, as the brooks and rivers flow into the ocean. He maintains that matter is infinitely divisible; that the universe is full, and that there is no vacuum in nature; that the world is eternal; that the sun, which has always revolved as it does at present, will for ever continue to do so; and, finally, that the generations of men succeed one another without having had a beginning or foreseeing an end. He alleges that the heavens are incapable of decay; and that although sublunar things are subject to corruption, their parts nevertheless do not perish; that they only change place; that from the remains of one thing another is made; and that thus the mass of the world always remains intire. He holds that the earth is in the centre of the world, and that the First Being makes the skies revolve round the earth, by intelligences which are continually occupied with these motions. He asserts that all the globe which is now covered by the waters of the sea, was formerly dry land; and that what is now dry land will be again converted into water. The reason is this; the rivers and torrents are continually carrying along sand and earth, which causes the shores gradually to advance and the sea gradually to retire; so that, in the course of innumerable ages, the alleged vicissitudes necessarily take place. He adds that in several parts which are considerably inland, and even of great elevation, the sea, when retreating, left shells, and that, on digging in the ground, anchors and fragments of ships are sometimes found. Ovid attributes the same opinion to Pythagoras. Aristotle further remarks, that these conversions of sea into land, and of land into sea, which gradually take place in the long lapse of ages, are in a great measure the cause of our ignorance of past occurrences. He adds that besides this, other accidents happen, which give rise even to the loss of the arts; and among these the innumerable pestilences, wars, famines, earthquakes, burnings, and desolations, which exterminate all the inhabitants of a country, excepting a few who escape and save themselves in the deserts, where they lead a savage life, and where they give origin to others, who, in the progress of time, cultivate the ground, and invent or rediscover the arts; and that the same opinions recur, and have been renewed times without number. In this manner, he maintains that, notwithstanding these vicissitudes and revolutions, the machine of the world always remains indestructible.—Lives of Zoologists.

A Lesson in Sentiment.—The deeds of their ancestors are painted on the great bridge of Lucerne; and, poor as the pictures are, they gave me pleasure. They must not be considered as works of art, but, as records of memorable acts, are highly honourable, for they nurture a glowing love of freedom. I might reply to any unseasonable critic in the words of Shakspeare, when the courtiers, in the 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' were despising the rude dialogue of Moonshine and Wall; and when Theseus made them this remarkable answer,—"The best of this kind are but shadows, and the worst of them are not worse, if imagination amend them."—Matthison's Travels.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Our best thanks to the Lady who forwarded us in so kind a manner the verses of Mr Landor, addressed to the President of the United States. We need not say how much we regret our inability to insert them in this unpolitical journal. We shall make ourselves and our readers amends however, by the further extracts we intend to give from his last volume of poetry.

Z. Z. next week. Also H. S.

VINDEX will see, by intimations to Correspondents in our two last numbers, that we mean to give no further occasion for the excitement of controversial topics.

The author of the sonnet "To a Friend labouring under severe Indisposition," &c. writes with excellent good sense and feeling, but his style is hardly original enough to do him justice, except in the striking line in which he speaks of "Fortitude, the giant of the heart."

We are not aware of any "cause of complaint" which our friend E. W. V. has with us, on the score of not answering Correspondents. We must really say that we take ourselves to be very well-behaved in that matter. The circumstance he notices with regard to some of the shops, has often astonished us; but we cannot discuss the subject in this Journal, the object of which is to point out the beautiful, and not to contend with the deformed.

H. R.'s feelings are genuine; and his love of poetry worth cultivating, at his leisure. He, and our other young friend TENTATOR, should read the old English poets, that they may learn to care less for conventional styles, and the mere fitting of one line to another.

We will endeavour to do what F. H. wishes.

Thanks to F. Sr JNO. N., for his pleasant letter. We shall be happy to hear from him on the subject he speaks of. Meantime, a letter containing a query is left for him at Mr Hooper's, if he will be good enough to apply for it. Also another for our esteemed Correspondent, PEREGRINE REEDPEN, if he will take the same trouble.

In consequence of a letter we have received from the fair writer, it is proper to state that the verses to Flowers, inserted a few weeks back from her pen, were not intended by her to be signed with her name at length, but only with the initials I. J. T. It was our own doing,—the putting the name at length. We wished to let the reader know that they were written by a lady, and did not consider that one of the Christian names would have been sufficient.

OF PETER WILKINS AND THE FLYING WOMEN.

As we mentioned this book in our last, and our readers (to judge from those who have expressed any opinion on the matter) appear to like the articles we have given them on imaginative beings, we will devote the present paper to some account of our old friend Peter Wilkins and his bride; and then quit, for the present, this tempting class of subjects, in behalf of the variety expected of us.

The 'Adventures of Peter Wilkins' is a book written about a hundred years back, purporting to be the work of a shipwrecked voyager, and relating the discovery of a people who had wings. It is mentioned somewhere, with great esteem, by Mr Southey, if our memory does not deceive us; and has been altogether so much admired, and so popular, that we are surprised Mr Dunlop has omitted it in his 'History of Fiction.' The name, 'Peter Wilkins,' has, to the present perplexed and aspiring generation (not yet knowing what to retain and what to get rid of) a poor and vulgar sound. It is not Montreville, or Mordaunt, or Montgomery. "Peter" is not the name for a card. "Wilkins" hardly announces himself as a diner with dukes. But a hundred years ago people did not conceive that a gentleman's pretensions were nominal. What novelist now-a-days would call his hero "Tom Jones?" Yet thus was his great work christened by Fielding, a man of noble family. However, there is a "preferment" in the instinct of this aspiration. Society has had a lift, and is inclined to take everything for an advantage and an elegance which it sees in possession of its new company. By and bye, it will be content with the real elegancies, and drop the pretended.

It is a great honour to a writer to invent a being, at once new and delightful; and the honour is not the less, for the apparent obviousness of the invention. Let any one try to make a new combination of this sort, and he will find how difficult it is. We will venture to say, that besides genius in the ordinary sense of the word, there is a faith in it, and a remoteness from things worldly, that implies a virtue and a child-like simplicity, not common but to minds of the higher order. Some writers would think they were going to be merely childish; and would very properly desist. Others would be apprehensive of ridicule; and would desist with like reason. Not that everybody would succeed, who fancied he should. Taste and judgment are requisite to all good inventions, as well as an imagination to find them; and there must be, above all, a strong taste for the truth; verisimilitude, or the likeness of truth, being the great charm in the wildest of fictions. It is very difficult to unite the imaginative with the worldly; and men of real genius sometimes make mistakes, in consequence, fit only for the most literal or incoherent understandings.

We have headed our article 'Flying Women,' instead of the Flying People, because, though the beings discovered by our friend Peter are of both sexes, we could never quite persuade ourselves that his males had an equal right to their grandees. All however, that he says about the Flying Nation as a people is ingenious. He has escaped, in particular, in a most happy manner, from the difficulty of introducing his plain-backed hero among them without lessening his dignity, by means of implicating him with a prophecy important to their well-being; and his speculations upon their religion and policy, show him to have been a man of an original turn of reflection in everything; good-hearted, and zealous for the advancement of mankind. But his lords, his architects, and his miners, violate the remoteness of his invention, and bring it back to common-place; nor was this necessary to render his work useful. The utility of a work of imagination consists in softening and elevating the mind generally; and this is the effect of his Flying Woman. All that relates to her is luckily set in a frame by itself; is remote, quiet, and superior. She is as much above Peter's race in sincerity, as in her wings; and yet there is nothing about her which, in a higher state of humanity, the author does not succeed in making us suppose possible. Peter is even raised towards her by dint of his admiration of her truth, and the sweetness of her disposition more than meets him half way, and sets them both on a level.

The author of this curious invention must have been a very modest as well as clever man, or have had some peculiar reasons for keeping his name a secret; for he was living when the work arrived at a second edition. The dedication does not appear in the first; and the writer, who signs himself R. P. speaks in it of the heroine as his property. It is observable, that in all the editions we have met with, the initials R. P. are signed to the dedication, while R. S. is put in the title-page. This also looks like a negligence uncommon in authors. The dedication is to Elizabeth, Countess of Northumberland; the lady to whom Bishop Percy dedicated his 'Relics of Ancient English Poetry.' We have sometimes fancied that Abraham Tucker wrote it, or Bishop Berkeley. It has all the ease and the cordial delicacy of the best days that followed the 'Tatler,' as well as their tendency to theological discussion. The mediocrity of the author's station in life might have been invented, to make the picture of a sea-faring philosopher more real, though the names of the children, Tommy and Pedro, hardly seem a contrast which a scholar could have allowed himself to give into. The turn of words, invented for the flying people, is copied from Swift, and cannot be called happy. There is a want of analogy in them to the smoothness, and even the energy, of flying. The ancient name of the country, Nosmnddgrault, is more fit for that of the Houyhnhnms. Arndrumstake, Babbrindrugg, Crashdoorpt, and Hunkun (marriage), and Glumm (a man), are words too ugly for any necessity of looking natural. We are hardly reconciled to the name of Youwarkee for the heroine. Gawrey (a woman) is hardly so good; but the Grandee, the name of the flying apparatus, will do. There is a grandeur in it. We see it expand and "display its pomp," as Tasso says of the peacock. The hero's name was most likely suggested by that of a celebrated advocate of the possibility of flying, Wilkins, Bishop of Chester.* Upon the whole, if we were in possession of the Berkeley Manuscripts, we should look hard to find a memorandum indicative of his being the author of this delightful invention. Even the miners seem to belong to the author of the Bermuda scheme; and he had traversed the seas, and been conversant with all honest paths of life. There would also have appeared to him good reason for not avowing the book, how Christian soever, when he came to be a Bishop. But these inquiries are foreign to our pages.

* The Bishop is said to have been asked by the flighty Duchess of Newcastle, how people who took a voyage to the moon were to manage for "baiting-places!" to which he replied, with great felicity, that he wondered at such a question from her Grace, "who had built so many castles in the air."

A peacock, with his plumage displayed, full of "rainbows and starry eyes," is a fine object; but think of a lovely woman set in front of an ethereal shell, and wafted about like a Venus. This is perhaps the best general idea that can be given of Peter Wilkins's bride. In the first edition of the work, published in 1751 (at least we know of none earlier), there is an engraved explanation of the wings, or rather drapery, for such it was when at rest. It might be called a natural webbed-silk. We are to fancy a nymph in a vest of the finest texture and of the most delicate carnation. On a sudden, this drapery parts in two and flies back, stretched from head to foot behind the figure like an oval fan or umbrella; and the lady is in front of it, preparing to sweep blushing away from us, and "winnow the buxom air."

It has been objected, that the wings of Peter's woman consist rather of something laced and webbed than proper angelical wings, that this something serves her also for drapery, that the drapery therefore is alive, and that we should be shocked to find it warm and stirring. The objection is natural in a merely animal point of view; and yet, speaking for ourselves, we confess we have been so accustomed to idealities, and to aspirations after the predominance of moral beauty in physical, that it is with an effort we allow it to be so. Supposing it, at first, to be something to which we should have to grow reconciled, we conceive, that pity for the supposed deformity would only endear us the more to the charming and perfect womanhood to which it was attached. We have often thought, that real tenderness for the sex would not be so great or so touching,—certainly it could not be so well proved,—if women partook less than they do of imperfection. But the ethereal power as well as grace belonging to our flying beauties could not long permit us to associate the idea with deformity. Our admiration of beauty, as it is (unless we hold with some philosophers, that it is a direct ordinance of the Divine Being) is the effect of custom and kind offices. It is true, there is something in mere smoothness and harmony of form, which appears to be sufficient of itself to affect us with pleasing emotions, distinct from any reference to moral beauty; but the last secrets of pleasures, the most material, are in the brain and the imagination. The lowest sensualist, if he were capable of reflection, would find that he was endeavouring to grasp some shadow of grace and kindness, even when he fancied himself least given to such refinements. The worst like to receive pleasures from the best. The very seducer, in the sorry improvidence of his selfishness, seeks to be mistaken for what he is not; to enjoy innocence instead of guilt; to read in the eyes of simplicity what a transport it is to be loved; and to piece out the instinctive consciousness of his own want of a just moral power by the stealing of one that is unjust. Being a man, he cannot help these involuntary tributes to the soul of beauty. If it were otherwise, he would be an idiot, or a fly on the wall. We think it, therefore, perfectly natural in our friend Peter, seeing of what lovely elements the mind as well as the body of his new acquaintance is composed, to feel nothing but admiration for an appendage which doubles her power to do him good, and which realizes what it is natural for us all to long for in our dreams. The wish to fly seems to belong instinctively to all imaginative states of being—to dreams, to childhood, and to love. The furious driving of royalty is an unconscious parody on it. Flying seems the next step to a higher state of being; and if we could fancy human nature taking another degree in the scale, and displacing the present inhabitants of the world by a new set of creatures, personally improved, the result of a climax in refinement, what we should expect in them would be wings to their shoulders.

We proceed to lay before our readers, from the complete edition of this romance,* the passages describing our hero's first knowledge of the flying people, and the account of his bride and her behaviour.

As I lay awake, says our voyager, one night or day, I know not which, I very plainly heard the sound of several human voices, and sometimes very loud; but though I could easily distinguish the articulations, I could not understand the least word that was said; nor did the voices seem at all to me like such as I had anywhere heard before, but much softer and more musical. This startled me, and I arose immediately, slipping on my clothes, and taking my gun in my hand (which I always kept charged, being my constant travelling companion), and my outlass. I was inclined to open the door of my anti-chamber, but I own I was afraid; besides, I considered that I could discover nothing at any distance, by reason of the thick and gloomy wood that inclosed me.

I had a thousand different surmises about the meaning of this odd incident; and could not conceive how any human creatures should be in my kingdom (as I called it) but myself, as I never yet saw them or any trace of their habitation.

These thoughts kept me still more within doors than before, and I hardly ever stirred out but for water or firing. At length, hearing no more voices, nor seeing any one, I began to be more composed in my mind, and at last grew persuaded it was all a mere delusion, and only a fancy of mine without any real foundation; so the whole notion was soon blown over.

I had not enjoyed my tranquillity above a week, before my fears were roused afresh, hearing the same sound of voices twice in the same night, but not many minutes at a time, and I was resolved not to venture out, but then I determined if they should come again any thing near my grotto, to open the door, see who they were, and stand upon my defence, whatever came of it. Thus had I formed my scheme, but I heard no more of them for a great while, so that at length I became tranquil again.

I passed the summer (though I had never yet seen the sun's body) very much to my satisfaction; partly in the work I had been describing, (for I had taken two more seals, and had a great quantity of oil from them,) partly in building me a chimney in my anti-chamber of mud and earth burnt on my own hearth into a sort of brick; in making a window at one end of the above-said chamber, to let in what little light would come through the trees when I did not choose to open my door; in moulding an earthen lamp for my oil; and finally in providing and laying stores, fresh and salt (for I had now cured and dried many more fish) against winter. These I say were my summer employments at home, intermixed with many agreeable excursions. But now the winter coming on and the days growing very short, or indeed there being no day, properly speaking, but a kind of twilight, kept mostly in my habitation, though not so much as I had done the winter before, when I had no light within doors, and slept, or at least lay still, great part of my time; for now my lamp was never out. I also turned two of my seal-skins into a rug to cover my bed, and the third into a cushion which I always sat upon, and a very soft warm cushion it made. All this together rendered my life very easy, nay even comfortable; but a little while after the darkness or twilight came on, I frequently heard the voices again; sometimes in great numbers. This threw me into new fears, and I became as uneasy as ever, even to the degree of growing quite melancholy.

At length one night, or day, I cannot say which, hearing the voices very distinctly, and praying very earnestly to be either delivered from the uncertainty they had put me under, or to have them removed from me, I took courage, and arming myself with a gun, listened to distinguish from whence the voices proceeded, when I felt such a thump upon the roof of my anti-chamber as shook the whole fabric, and set me all over into a tremor; I then heard a sort of shriek and a rustle near the door of my apartment; all which together seemed very terrible. But I having before determined to see what and who it was, resolutely opened my door, and leaped out. I saw nobody; all was quite silent, and nothing that I could perceive, but my own fears, a-moving. I went then softly to the corner of my building, and there looking down, by the glimmer of my lamp, which stood in the window, I saw something in human shape lying at my feet. I asked, who's there? No one answering, I was induced to take a near view of the object. But judge of my astonishment when I discovered the face of the most lovely and beautiful woman eyes ever beheld! I stood for a few seconds transfixed with astonishment, and my heart was ready to force its way through my sides. At length, somewhat recovering, I perceived her more minutely. But if I was puzzled at beholding a woman alone in this lonely place, how much more was I surprised at her appearance and dress. She had a sort of brown chaplet, like lace, round her head, under and about which her hair was tucked up and twined; and she seemed to me to be clothed in a thin hair-coloured silk garment, which upon trying to raise her, I found to be quite warm, and, therefore, hoped there was life in the body it contained. I then took her in my arms, and conveyed her through the door-way into my grotto; where I laid her upon my bed.

When I laid her down, I thought, on laying my hand on her breast, I perceived the fountain of life had some motion. This gave me infinite pleasure; so warming a drop of wine, I dipped my finger in it and moistened her lips two or three times, and I imagined they opened a little. Upon this I be-thought me, and taking a tea-spoon, I gently poured a few drops of the wine by that means into her mouth. Finding she swallowed it, I poured in another spoonful and another, till I brought her to herself so well as to be able to sit up.

I then spoke to her, and asked her divers questions as if she understood me; in return of which she uttered language I had no idea of, though in the most musical tone, and with the sweetest accent I ever heard.

You may imagine we stared heartily at each other, and I doubted not but she wondered as much as I by what means we came so near each other. I offered her everything in my grotto which I thought might please her: some of which she gratefully received, as appeared by her looks and behaviour. But she avoided my lamp and always placed her back towards it. I observed that, and took care to set it in such a position myself as seemed agreeable to her, though it deprived me of a prospect I very much admired.

After we had sat a good while, now and then, I may say, chattering to one another, she got up and took a turn or two about the room. When I saw her in that attitude, her grace and motion perfectly charmed me, and her shape was incomparable; but the straightness of her dress put me to a loss to conceive either what it was, or how it was put on.

Well, we supped together, and I set the best of everything I had before her, nor could either of us forbear speaking in our own tongue, though we were sensible neither of us understood the other. After supper I gave her some of my cordials, for which she showed great tokens of thankfulness. When supper had been sometime over, I showed her my bed and made signs for her to go to it; but she seemed very shy of that, till I showed her where I meant to lie myself, by pointing to myself, then to that, and again pointing to her and to my bed. When at length I had made this matter intelligible to her, she lay down very composedly; and after I had taken care of my fire, and set the things I had been using for supper in their places, I laid myself down too.

I treated her for some time with all the respect imaginable, and never suffered her to do the least part of my work. It was very inconvenient to both of us only to know each other's meaning by signs; but I could not be otherwise than pleased to see that she endeavoured all in her power to learn to talk like me. Indeed, I was not behind-hand with her in that respect, striving all I could to imitate her. With this we at last succeeded so well, that in a few months, we were able to hold a conversation with each other.

After my new love had been with me a fortnight, finding my water run very low, I was greatly troubled at the thought of quitting her to go for more; and, as well as I could, intreated her not to go away before my return. As soon as she understood what I signified to her, she sat down with her arms across, leaning her head against the wall, to assure me she would not stir.

I took my boat, net, and water-cask, as usual; desirous of bringing her home a fresh-fish dinner, and succeeded so well as to catch enough for several meals, and to spare. What remained, I salted, and found that she liked that better than the fresh, after a few days sitting; though she did not so well approve of that I had formerly pickled and dried.

Thus we spent the remainder of the winter together, till the days began to be light enough for me to walk abroad a little in the middle of them; for I was now under no apprehensions of her leaving me, as she had before this time many opportunities of doing so, but never attempted it.

I must here make one reflection upon our conduct which you will almost think incredible, namely, that we two, of different sexes, fully inflamed with love to each other, and no outward obstacle to prevent our wishes, should have been together under the same roof alone for five months, conversing together from morning till night (for by this she pretty well understood English, and I her language), and yet I should never have clasped her in my arms, or have shown any farther feelings to her, than what the deference I all along paid her could give her room to surmise. Nay, I can affirm that I did not even then know that the covering she wore was not the work of art, but the work of nature, for I really took it for silk. Indeed, the modesty of her carriage and sweetness of her behaviour to me, had struck into me such a dread of offending her, that though nothing upon earth could be more capable of exciting passion than her charms, I could have died rather than have attempted to salute her only, without actual invitation.

When the weather cleared up a little, by the lengthening of day-light, I took courage one afternoon to invite her to walk with me to the lake, but she sweetly excused herself from it, whilst there was such a glare of light; but told me, if I would not go out of the wood, she would accompany me; so we agreed to take a turn only there. I first went myself over the stile of the door, and taking her in my arms, lifted her over. But even when I had her in this manner, I knew not what to make of her clothing, it sat so true and close; but I begged she would let me know of what her garment was made. She smiled, and asked me if mine was not the same under my jacket? No, lady, answered I, I have nothing but my skin under my clothes. Why, what do you mean? she replied, somewhat tartly; but indeed I was afraid something was the matter, by that nasty covering you wear, that you might not be seen. Are not you a glum? Yes, fair creature. Then, continued she, I am afraid you must have been a very bad glum, and have been crashed, which I should be very sorry to hear. I replied, I hoped my faults had not exceeded other men's; but I had suffered abundance of hardships in my time, and that at last, Providence having settled me in this spot, from whence I had no prospect of ever departing, it was none of the least of its mercies to bring to my knowledge and company the most exquisite piece of all his works in her, which I should acknowledge as long as I lived. She was surprised at this discourse, and said, Have not you the same prospect that I or any other person has of departing? You don't do well, and really I fear you are slit, or you would not wear this nasty cumbersome coat (taking hold of my jacket-sleeve), if you were not afraid of showing the signs of a bad life upon your natural clothing.

I could not for my heart imagine what way there was to get out of my dominions; and as to my jacket, I confess she made me blush; and, but for shame, I would have stripped to my skin to have satisfied her. But, madam, said I, pray pardon me, for you really are mistaken; I have examined every nook and corner of this island, and can find no possible outlet. Why, replied she, what outlets do you want? If you are not slit, is not the air open to you as well as other people? I tell you, sir, I fear you have been slit for your crimes; and though you have been so good to me that I can't help loving you heartily for it, yet, if I thought you had been slit, I would not stay a moment longer with you, though it should break my heart to leave you.

I found myself now in a strange quandary, longing to know what she meant by being slit. But seeing her look a little angrily upon me, I said, Pray, madam, don't be offended, if I take the liberty to ask you what you mean by the word crashed, so often repeated by you? for I am an utter stranger to what you mean by it. Sir, replied she, pray answer me first how you came here? Madam, replied I, if you will please to take a walk to the verge of the wood, I will show you the very passage. Well, replied she, now this odious dazzle of light is lessened, I don't care if I do go with you.

When we came far enough to see the bridge, There, madam, said I, there is my entrance, where the sea pours into this lake from yonder cavern! It is not possible, answered she; this is another untruth; and as I see you would deceive me, and are not to be believed, farewell; I must be gone. But hold! let me ask you one thing more, that is, by what means did you come through that cavern? You could not have used to come over the rock! Bless me, madam! said I, do you think I and my boat could fly? Come over the rock, did you say? No, madam; I sailed from the great sea, in my boat, through that cavern into this very lake. What do you mean by your boat? said she; you seem to make two things of your boat you sailed with and yourself. I do so, replied I, for I take myself to be good flesh and blood, but my boat is made of wood and other materials. Is it so? And pray where is this boat that is made of wood and other materials? under your jacket? Lord, madam! said I, what! put a boat under my jacket! No, madam, my boat is in the lake. What more truths! said she. No, madam, I replied, if you would be satisfied of what I say (every word of which is as true as that my boat now is in the lake), pray walk with me thither, and make your own eyes judges what sincerity I speak with. To this she agreed, it growing dusky; but assured me if I did not give her good satisfaction, I should see her no more.

We arrived at the lake; and going to my wet-dock, Now, madam, pray satisfy yourself whether I spoke true or no. She looked at my boat, but could not yet frame a proper notion of it, till I stepped into it, and pushing from the shore, took the oars in my hand and sailed along the lake by her as she walked on the shore. At last she seemed so well reconciled to me and my boat, that she desired I would take her in. I immediately did so, and we sailed a good way; and as we returned to my dock I described to her how I procured the water we drank, and brought it to the shore in that vessel.

Well, said she, I have sailed, as you call it, many a mile in my life-time, but never in such a thing as this. I own it will serve where one has a great many things to carry from place to place; but to be labouring thus, when one intends pleasure in sailing, is in my mind most ridiculous. Why, pray, madam, how would you have me sail? for getting into the boat only will not carry us this way or that, without using some force. But pray where did you get this boat, as you call it? O, madam! I answered, that is too long a story to begin upon now; but I will make a faithful relation of all to you, when we get home.

I now perceived, and wondered at it, that the later it grew, the more agreeable it seemed to her; and as I had now brought her into a good humour again by seeing and sailing in my boat, I was not willing to prevent its increase. I told her if she pleased we would land, and when I had docked my boat, I would accompany her where and as long as she liked. As we talked and walked by the lake, she made a little run before me, and sprung into it. Perceiving this, I cried out; whereupon she nervently called on me to follow her. The light was then so dim, as prevented my having more than a confused sight of her when she jumped in; and, looking earnestly after her, I could discern nothing more than a small boat on the water which skimmed along at so great a rate that I almost lost sight of it presently; but running along the shore for fear of losing her, I met her gravely walking to meet me; and then had intirely lost sight of the boat upon the lake. This, accosting me with a smile, is my way of sailing, which I perceive by the fright you were in, you were altogether unacquainted with; and as you tell me you came from so many thousand miles off, it is possible you may be made differently from me; and I suspect from all your discourse, to which I have been very attentive, it is possible you may no more be able to fly, than to sail as I do. No, charming creature, that I cannot, I'll assure you. She then stepped to the edge of the lake, for the advantage of a descent before, sprung up into the air, and away she went, farther than my eyes could follow her.

I was quite astonished; but I had very little time for reflection; for in a few minutes after, she alighted just by me on her feet.

Her return, as she plainly saw, filled me with a transport not to be concealed; and which as she afterwards told me was very agreeable to her. Indeed I was some moments in such an agitation of mind from these unparalleled incidents, that I was like one thunderstruck; but coming presently to myself, and clasping her in my arms with as much love and passion as I was capable of expressing, Are you returned again, kind angel, said I, to bless a wretch who can only be happy in adoring you! Can it be, that you, who have so many advantages over me, should quit all the pleasures that nature has formed you for, and all your friends and relations, to take an asylum in my arms! But I here make you a tender of all I am able to bestow—my love and constancy. Come, come, replied she, no more raptures; I find you are a worthier man than I thought I had reason to take you for; and I beg your pardon for my distrust, whilst I was ignorant of your imperfections; but now I verily believe all you have said is true; and I promise you, as you have seemed so much to delight in me, I will never quit you, till death or some other fatal accident shall part us. But we will now, if you please, go home; for I know you have been for some time uneasy in this gloom, though agreeable to me: for, giving my eyes the pleasure of looking eagerly on you, it conceals my blushes from your sight.

In this manner, exchanging mutual endearments and soft speeches, hand in hand we arrived at the grotto.

The author here proceeds to give an account of his nuptials, which, though given in the very best taste of the time, and evincing great purity as well as pleasurable nature, is better left in its place than brought forward out of the other circumstances which invest it.

But are not such of our readers, as did not know her before, glad of their new acquaintance?

MEMOIRS OF ANTOINETTE BOURIGNON.

A VERY unchristian Christian was Antoinette Bourignon, and perhaps quite as unworthy of the title as most of those to whom she refused it; though she was an honest woman, too, after her fashion, and an extraordinary instance of self-delusion. The following account of her is taken from Miss Hays's 'Female Biography.'

This singular enthusiast (says the fair biographer) was born at Lisle, in Flanders, January 13, 1616. She appeared so much deformed at her birth, that it was debated for some days, in the family, whether the infant ought to be permitted to live. But as she grew older, her figure improved. She gave early indications of an extraordinary character; at four years of age she was disturbed by the immorality of the people of Lisle, and desired to be carried into a country of Christians, for she could not be persuaded that persons, whose conduct was so opposite to the precepts of Jesus Christ, had a title to be called by his name.

Her father and mother had frequent domestic disagreements; the little Antoinette, on these occasions, took the part of her mother, and endeavoured to soften her father, whose temper was harsh and severe, by her infant caresses. From these scenes, which made a strong impression on her mind, she conceived an aversion to marriage. My God, grant that I may never marry! was her daily prayer. Thus early disgusted with the world, she threw all the ardour of her mind, as she advanced towards maturity, into devotion, in which she became an extravagant fanatic.

Her father, incapable of entering into these refinements, and desirous of establishing his daughter in life, promised her in marriage to a Frenchman, who demanded her hand, and, without considering the consent of Antoinette as essential to the engagement, appointed Easter-day, in 1630, for the celebration of the nuptials. The young lady fled to avoid a measure so coercive, disguised in the habit of a hermit; but was stopped at Blacon, a village of Hainaut, on suspicion of her sex. An officer of the guards had seized her, from whom she was delivered by the Curate of the place, who, observing in her something extraordinary, mentioned her to the Archbishop of Cambray, by whom she was sent back to her father.

Being persecuted soon after with new proposals of matrimony, she absconded a second time, to avert a compulsion that appeared to her so odious. She once more made a visit to the Archbishop, and obtained his permission to form in the country a small community of young women, who, like herself, should determine to abjure the nuptial tie. She had conceived an aversion to a cloister, having early learned, that the spirit of the Gospel must not be sought for in convents. The Archbishop afterwards retracting the licence he had granted her, Antoinette retired to Liège, whence she returned privately to Lisle, where she resided many years in great privacy and simplicity.

Her patrimonial estate at length falling to her, she determined at first to reject it; but afterwards altered this resolution, for which she gave the following reasons:—First, that it might not come into the hands of those who had no right to it. Secondly, that it might not be possessed by those who would make an ill use of it. Thirdly, that God had shown her she should have occasion for it for his glory. This patrimony, which she wisely resolved to accept, was somewhat considerable. Her habits were simple, and her wants but few; she bestowed no charities; her wealth, therefore, daily accumulated. John de Saulieu, the son of a peasant, became enamoured of the lady's riches, and resolved to address her. With this view, he assumed the prophetic character, but, like the oracles of old, with great wariness; and insinuated himself into the confidence of the pious Antoinette, by discourses of refined spirituality. At length he drew off the mask and avowed more earthly motives: his suit was listened to with little complacency, and somewhat severely checked. On finding his fair mistress intractable, the lover grew desperate, and obliged her to apply to the magistracy for protection. This furious innamorato threatened, if denied admission, to break the doors and windows of his dulcinea, and to murder her, though he should be hanged for it in the market place of Lisle. The Provost, to whom the distressed dame had recourse for protection, sent two armed men to guard her house. Saulieu, in revenge, basely attempted to blast the reputation of the woman who had despised alike his arts and his menaces; he reported in the town that she had promised him marriage, and that she had even suffered him to attempt its privileges. A reconciliation was, however, soon after effected between them: Saulieu was persuaded to retract his slanders, and to leave Mademoiselle Bourignon at liberty; when a young man, more complaisant, consoled him for his disappointment.

But our fair recusant had not yet come to the end of her persecutions. The nephew of the curate of St Andrew's conceived a passion for her, and, as he resided in her neighbourhood, frequently attempted to force an entrance into her house. Antoinette threatened to abandon the place, if she were not relieved from the presumption of this new and adventurous lover, whose uncle, on her complaints, drove him from his house. The passion of the young man was, by the cruelty of his mistress, converted into rage, and, in a fit of desperation he discharged a musket through her chamber window; while he affirmed among the neighbours that she was his espoused wife. The devotees, offended by this report, threatened to affront Mademoiselle Bourignon, should they meet her in the streets; the preachers were obliged to interfere, and to publish from the pulpit the innocence of the injured lady.

Some time after these adventures, Antoinette was elected governess of an hospital, in which having taken the habit and order of St Augustin, she shut herself up in 1658. In this situation a new calamity befel her, not more horrible than strange. The hospital was infected with sorcery; all the girls who inhabited it having made a contract with the devil. The governess was taken up on this extraordinary occasion, and examined before the magistrates of Lisle; nothing however was proved against her, but to prevent further persecution, she wisely determined to abandon her station. She then retired to Ghent in 1662, where God discovered to her some great secrets.

About this period she acquired a faithful friend who remained attached to her through life, and who left her at his death a good estate. This gentleman, whose name was De Cort, was one of the fathers of the oratory, and their superior; he was also director of an hospital for poor children. M. de Cort was the first spiritual child of Madame Bourignon, of which the following quotation may afford an explanation. "It is certainly known by all who are acquainted with Antoinette Bourignon (let wicked and impious scoffers say what they please), that when any persons received, by her conversation or writings, light and strength to forsake the world, and give themselves to God, she felt pains and throbs similar to those of a woman in child-birth, as it is said of her whom St John saw in the 12th of the Revelations. She experienced these pains in a greater or smaller degree, in proportion as the truths she had delivered, had more or less strength in their operation on the souls of these her spiritual offspring."

M. de Cort was twice successively divinely warned and threatened, to lend his property to some relations, who were endeavouring to drain an island, which the sea had overflowed in the country of Holstein, where he determined to prepare a retreat for the persecuted disciples of God. He sold a seat in this island to his spiritual mother, Madame Bourignon, who, when she had published at Amsterdam her book intitled 'The Light of the World,' prepared to retire thither in 1668. She also wrote at Brabant several treatises and epistles, and, after her persecutions at Lisle, engaged in the disputes of the Jansenists and Molinists. She made a longer stay at Amsterdam with her proselyte, than she had at first intended. She was here visited by all descriptions of persons, particularly by prophets and prophetesses; the popularity of her discourses inspired her with sanguine hopes of effecting a reformation in this nation of traders; but, commerce prevailing, among this phlegmatic people, over spiritual motives, her expectations ended in disappointment. Her books and sermons were more numerous than her disciples; but even in Holland she was not without admirers. The celebrated Labadie, with his disciples, became desirous of forming a community with Antoinette, at Noordstrandt, the newly-recovered island.

Labadie had offered to M. de Cort a large sum of money for the purchase of the whole island, but Antoinette prevailed on her proselyte to reject this proposal. Should you determine to accept it, said she, you must leave me behind you; because I perceive and know that we can never agree together. Their opinions and the spirit that governs them, are altogether contrary to my views, and the spirit that governs me. She had a divine vision respecting M. Labadie, wherein she saw, in the spirit, a little man very busy, with a great pole in his hand, with which he strove to hinder the fall of a large building, or a church that was falling. She was fully persuaded from some conferences she had held with him, that this man had no other illumination than that of the learned of those times, reading, study, and barren speculation; and that he was in no respect enlightened by God, or directed by divine inspiration. She had formed a terrible idea of the principles of the Cartesians, who had the temerity to set up the light of reason as a guide. God, she affirmed, had shown, and even expressly declared to her, that this error of Cartesianism was the worst and most accursed of all the heresies that were ever in the world, that it was a formal atheism or rejection of God, in whose place corrupt reason was substituted. Every kind of philosophy was substituted, while she denied the equal abhorrence of their malady. She proceeded from pretending to commend all things by the activity of the human intellect, without waiting for the divine illumination of faith, which requires the sacrifice of our reason and weak understandings, that God may diffuse in our minds his divine light; that by the activity of corrupt reason, true knowledge is driven out of our souls; and that such reasoners are the real atheists and the contempters of God.

The conversations of Madame Bourignon with God were very frequent at Amsterdam, where she had many visions and particular revelations; and where also she composed many books, which were but little read by the worldly-minded burghers. M. de Cort died the 12th of November, 1669, and left his spiritual directress heiress to his effects; an event which exposed her to more persecution than she had even suffered for her doctrines, and involved her in many law-suits. Being at the same time in ill-health, and ill attended, she endured about this period great distress. In 1671 she left Holland, with an intention to go to Noordstrandt. She stopped on her way at several places in Holstein, where she found it necessary to dismiss some of her disciples, who, from sinister motives, had enlisted in her suite. She began to despair of collecting a flock of new Christians, when she perceived that everyone appeared solicitous only for his own interest and convenience. Her pen grew now so prolific and her productions so numerous, that she thought proper to provide herself with a printing house, from which her works issued in different editions of the French, Dutch, and German languages. Her tenets and her morals having been attacked by some writers, she vindicated herself in a performance entitled 'The Testimony of Truth,' in which the clergy were treated somewhat severely. This was certainly not the way to remain at proper peace. Two Lutheran ministers took up their pens, and entered the lists against her, declaring that many persons had been beheaded and burned, whose heresies were more tolerable than those of Madame Bourignon. The Labadists also wrote against her, and her press was ordered to be shut up.

In December, 1673, she retired to Flensburg, where her enemies stirred up the people against her; she was accused of sorcery and witchcraft, and compelled privately to retreat; persecuted from town to town she was at length obliged to quit Holstein, and to take refuge in Hamburg, where her arrival was no sooner known than endeavours were used to seize her. Having concealed herself for some days, she fled to East Friesland, where the Baron of Lutsburg granted her his protection. The direction of an hospital was there given to her, to which she consecrated her industry and her cares. If she reserved her purse on this occasion, she gave for it two reasons, both of which, it must be allowed, are admirable: First, she alleged that her effects had already been dedicated to God for the use of those persons who sincerely sought to be true Christians; and, secondly, that men, and all things human, were inconstant, and not to be trusted. To this she added, that these poor people lived like beasts, who had no souls to save; and that she would rather throw her goods, which had been consecrated to heaven, into the sea, than bestow on them the least mite. Her followers also adopted these prudent maxims. The people, who understood not these refinements, were disgusted with what they profanely called the sordid spirit of Madame Bourignon: the authority of the Baron de Lutsburg proved insufficient for her protection; she again became the object of persecution, and was again compelled to fly.

In 1680, she passed once more into Holland, whence she departed to Franeker, in the province of Friesland, where, on the 30th of October, in the same year, she took a final leave of the world. Her constitution had been so good, that, in spite of all her vexations, and of a choleric and morose temper, she appeared at sixty years of age to be no more than forty. Her birth, the time of her commencing author, and her death, were each signalized by the appearance of a comet; a circumstance which could not fail of proving favourable to the promulgator of a new religion.

She is said to have exercised over her family and servants "a government as cruel as that of the Sicilian court;" and to have justified this humour, so contrary to the meekness of the Gospel, by maintaining, that anger was the love of justice and true virtue; and alleging, as an example, the rigors used by the prophets and apostles. Having suffered some depreciations upon her property by the dishonesty of those about her, she manifested a revengeful and vindictive spirit, severely censuring her friends for not pursuing these wretches with all the severity of the law. We must prevent evil, said she. We oppose it with all which an extraneous law is found. Her system, of semblance has been already given, bore a resemblance to that of the Quietists, excluding external worship, and requiring a cessation of the power of the human intellect, that God might fill the mind with his divine light. She had also some very singular notions respecting Antichrist, whom she was persuaded would be a devil incarnate, or produced by a demoniac human generation. She was inveterate against the church of Rome; nor did she treat the Protestant societies with greater moderation. She beheld this Antichrist, or devil incarnate, in a vision, from which she described, in verse, his stature, complexion, and hair.

Her writings appear to have made more proselytes than her discourses: she had, after her death, many disciples in Scotland, both among ecclesiastics and laymen. One of her principal works, intitled 'The Light of the World,' was published in that country in 1696, to which the translator added a long preface, declaring, "that the maid ought at least to pass for an extraordinary prophetess." A controversy afterwards took place, respecting her doctrines, on the part of Mr Charles Lesley, a man of learning and merit, who exposed their absurdity, and Dr Cockburn, against Messrs Paret, de Cort, and the English translator of the 'Lux Mundi,' who endeavoured to prove that Antoinette was divinely inspired, and had received a commission from God to reform the Christian world. The Bourignonists replied in an apology for their leader. The remains of this dispute still exist in some parts of North Britain.

The Will of Aristotle.—Antipater, the regent of Macedonia, is appointed his executor. To his second wife, Herpylis, he leaves the choice of two houses, the one in Chalce, the other at Stagira. He commends her domestic virtues, and requests his friends to distinguish her by the kindest attention. To Nichomachus, his son by Herpylis, and to Pythias, his daughter by his first wife, he bequeaths the remainder of his fortune, excepting his library and writings, which he leaves to Theophrastus. He desires that his daughter shall be given in marriage to Nicanor, the son of his benefactor, Proxenus, or should he not be inclined to receive her, to Theophrastus, his esteemed pupil. The bones of Pythias (his first wife) he orders to be disinterred, and buried with his own body, as she herself had desired. None of his slaves are to be sold; they are all either emancipated by his will or ordered to be set free by his heirs, whenever they shall become worthy of liberty. Finally, he orders that the dedications which he had vowed for the safety of Nicanor be presented at Stagira to Jupiter and Minerva.—Lives of Zooticists. [The passage we have marked in italics, shows the small light in which females were regarded in those days; yet Aristotle manifests an affectionate disposition in this will, and even a respect towards the sex, and probably was thought to manifest both in this very part of the determination of his property. His daughter would be thought well taken care of, however ungallant and arbitrary the manner appears to modern opinion; and his wife, shows that she had some claims of equality, which her husband has affectionately remembered. But the history of the progress of human nature is full of these inconsistencies. Altogether this will does great honour to the memory of a philosopher, whose heart and moral character have been much, perhaps invidiously, doubted.]

Aristo was generally frugal and not choicé in his meals, though at times he ate much and hurriedly, because, his son says, he was not then thinking of what he was doing, being busy in his mind about his verses, or about his plans for building. One day a visitor appeared just after he had dined. While they were conversing, the servant brought up dinner for the stranger; and, as the latter was engaged in talking, Aristot fell on the viands laid on the table, and ate all himself, the guest, of course, not presuming to interrupt him. After the guest was gone, Aristot's brother remonstrated with him on his inhospitable behaviour, when the poet, coming to himself, exclaimed, "Well, it is his fault, after all, why did he not begin to eat his dinner at once?"—Gallery of Portraits.

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 5th to Tuesday the 11th November.

DESCRIPTION OF NOVEMBER.—KEEPING BIRDS IN CAGES.

(From Mr Howitt's 'Book of the Seasons'.)

In a month of darkness, storms, and - of the whirling away of the withered leaves, and the introduction of complete winter. Rain, hail, and wind, chase each other over the fields and amongst the woods in rapid alternation. The flowers are gone; the long grass stands amongst the woodland thickets withered, bleached, and sere; the fern is red and shrivelled amongst the green gorse and broom. The plants, which waved their broad white umbels to the summer breeze, like skeleton-trophies of death, rattle their dry and hollow leaves to the autumnal winds. The brooks are brimful; the rivers, turbid and covered with masses of foam, hurry on in angry strength, or pour their waters over the champagne. Our very gardens are sad, damp, and desolate. Their floral splendours are dead; naked stems and decaying leaves have taken the place of verdure. The walks are unkept and uninviting; and as these summer friends of ours are no longer affluent and of flourishing estate, we, of course, desert them.

The country presents, in its silence and gloom, a ghastly scene to those accustomed to towns and dissipation. To them there is something frightful in its solitude; yet, to the reflective mind it is, and has been, at all times grateful. In its sternest moods it presents solemn thoughts, and awakens solemn feelings. Great and philosophic minds have in all ages borne but one testimony to the charms of its quietude. In its profound repose the mourner seeks to indulge the passion of grief; to it, the projector of some great work in art or literature flies to mature his labour, and, while hidden from all eyes, to achieve that which shall make his name familiar to all ears; and to the poet, what is more affluent of imaginative stimulus and precious suggestions than ströls through wood, walks, mountain-glens, and along wild sea-coasts, at this season? The universal stillness is felt through the whole soul. Every object is exaggerated, and yet recommended to the eye through the media of gloom and mist; and while the eye, unsounded by mind, would discern nothing but dreariness, he finds something congenial to the loftiest moods of his spirit, and is often led into strains, which, though solemn, are anything but sad.

Fieldfares and redwings will be generally seen this month. Sometimes they quit their northern regions as early as October, if the season be very severe, but more frequently they make their first appearance here in this month. If the weather be mild, they will be heard, as they sit in flocks upon the trees, warbling in concert very cheerfully in the same manner as before their departure in spring. Fine days will occasionally peep out so Spring-like, that the sky-larks attempt their flights, and sing merrily; but, perhaps the very next morning shows a landscape of frost and snow:

I saw the woods and fields at close of day
A variegated show; the meadows green,
Though faded, and the lands, where lately waved
The golden harvest, of a mellow brown,
Upturn'd so lately by the peaceful share.
I saw, far off, the weedy fallow smile
With verdure not unprofitable, grazed
By flocks, fast feeding, and selecting each
His favourite herb; while all the leafless groves
That skirt the horizon, wore a sable hue,
Scarce noticed in the kindred dusk of eve.
To-morrow brings a change, a total change,
Which even now, though silently performed,
And slowly and by most unfelt, the face
Of universal nature undergoes.
Fast falls the fleecy shower; the downy flakes
Descending, and with never-ceasing lapse,
Softly alighting upon all below,
Assimilate all objects. Earth receives
Gladly the thickening mantle, and the green
And tender blade, that feared the chilling blast,
Escapes unhurt beneath so warm a veil.

COWPER.

The return of winter is pleasurable even in its severity. The first snows that come dancing down; the first frost that rimes the hedges, variegates the windows, or shoots its fine long crystals across the smallest puddle, or the widest sheets of water, bring with them the remembrance of our boyish pleasures, our slidings and skatings—our snow-balls and snow-rolls—our snow-man making—the wonders of hoar frosts—of nightly snow-drifts in hollow lanes—of caves and houses, scooped in the wintry heaps with much labour and delight; and of scampering over hedge and ditch on the frozen snow, that "crunched beneath the tread," but broke not.

The dark, wet, and wintry day, and the long dismal nights of this season, are, however, favourable to fire-side enjoyments and occupations. Driven from the fields and woods where we have found so much delight, so many objects of interest, or employment, we may now sit within and hear the storm rage around, conscious that the fruits of the earth are secured, and that, like the bees in their hives, we have not let the summer escape, but have laid up stores of usefulness for the time of darkness and sorrow. In large farm houses, many useful avocations may enliven the evening fireside. In some districts, the men mend their own clothes and shoes; in others, various repairs of smaller implements, as flails, sieves, &c. are done; and it is now become a laudable custom in many superior farms, to encourage reading and other means of mental improvement, which the continual engagements of a rural labourer preclude during the summer. The promotion of this spirit is highly to be desired; no part of our working population having been so lamentably deficient in common knowledge as that of farmers' servants. Through the summer they have toiled from morning till night, and from day to day incessantly, and their only intervals of rest, Sundays and winter nights, have been lost in drowsiness. The cottager may usefully, by his winter fire, construct bee-hives, nets, mole traps, bird-cages, &c. With any of these employments, I have more sympathy than with the last, however.

Of all men who pursue rural occupations, the bird-catchers, especially the summer bird-catchers, are the least feeling. They do not capture birds when they have congregated in winter, when they have no mates or young to feel the effects of their loss, and are rearing for the table of the epicure, but take only singing birds, and take them too wherever and whenever they can, without regard to their having young, which may perish by their absence, or to that harsh change, from the full enjoyment of summer sunshine and pleasures to the captivity of the cage. When I see their nets spread in the fields, where linnets, goldfinches, &c. resort to the seeds of grass, plantain, sow-thistles, &c. I wish them all manner of villainous ill-luck; and I never omit a favourable opportunity of deranging or destroying lined twigs, when they fall in my way.

There are none of our customs which more mark our selfishness than that of keeping singing birds in perpetual confinement, making the pleasure of our ears their misfortune, and that sweet gift, which God has given them, wherewith to make themselves happy and the country delightful, the curse of their lives. If we were contented, however, with taking and rearing young ones, which never knew the actual blessings of liberty, or of propagating them in cages or aviaries, the evil would not be so enormous. But the practice of seizing singing-birds which always enjoyed the freedom of the earth and air, in summer, when they are busy with the pleasant cares of their nests or young broods, and subjecting them to a close prison, is detestable—doubly detestable in the case of migratory birds. They have not merely the common love of liberty, but the instinct of migration to struggle with; and it may be safely asserted, out of every ten nightingales so caught, nine pine away and die. Yet the capture of nightingales is very extensively practised. The bird-catchers declare them to be the most easily taken of all birds; and scarcely can one of these glorious songsters alight in a copse or a thicket, but these kidnappers are upon it. Some of these men assure me that the female birds arrive about ten days later than the males, whose songs give notice of their retreats, on hearing which the females alight; therefore, when nightingales first appear, the bird-catchers are almost sure of taking only male birds, which, being the singers, are the only ones they want. The nightingale, a bird which God has created to fly from land to land to crown the pleasantness of spring with the most delicious music, or a lark which he has made to soar in the rapture of its heart, up to heaven's gates "cribbed, cabined, and confined," in a narrow cage by man, is one of the most melancholy objects on earth. Let those who have hearts for it keep them, and listen to them with what pleasure they may; for my part, while I am myself sensible of the charms of freedom, and of the delights of the summer fields, I shall continue to prefer the "wood notes wild" of liberty to a captive's wail.

Moles now make their nests where they lodge during winter, and which are ready to deposit their young in, the following spring. Salmon begin to ascend the rivers to spawn. Bees require to be moved under shelter, and their hives to be covered with their winter coat; pigeons also require feeding.

Many wild creatures now retire to their winter retreats. The frog sinks to the bottom of ponds and ditches, and buries himself in the mud. The lizard, the badger, the hedge-hog, creep into holes in the earth and remain torpid till the spring. Bats get into old barns, caves, and deserted buildings, where, suspending themselves by the hind feet, and wrapping themselves in the membranes of their fore-feet, they sleep winter away, except some unusual interval of mild weather should awake and call them out for a little while occasionally. Squirrels, rats, and field-mice shut themselves up with their winter stores; and the dormouse betakes itself to slumber.

When the hedges are bare, numbers of old birds' nests become visible, and when they are near the grove they are found full of the seeds of the hips, the field-mice being in the habit of climbing up the hedges for this fruit, and using the nests as stations where they may sit and eat.

Thrashing and wintering of cattle are now resumed. Many operations of manuring, draining, levelling ant-hills, and other inequalities, irrigating, ploughing, and fencing, go on by intervals, as the weather permits. Timber of all kinds, except those of which the bark is used, is felled. Gates, crates, flakes, &c. are made, and fire-side occupations, making and mending baskets, bee-hives, traps for vermin, &c. fill up the long evenings. The business of the garden this month is principally in preparing manure, making all clean and neat, and defending plants from coming frosts.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XLIII.—THE CONSPIRACY OF FIESCO.

BESIDES the reality of this event, there is something, however brief, in the conjugal part of Fiesco's history, which comes home to the bosom of familiar life; nor is the trivial accident by which he died without its interest, as a circumstance contradicting the historical grandeur of his attempt.

Giovanni Lodovico di Fiesco was a wealthy, powerful, and ambitious nobleman of Genoa, which may be called the land of political experiment, as there is scarcely any form of government which it has not tried.

After emerging from the yoke of the Romans, the Lombards, and Charlemagne, it has, at different times, been governed by dukes, by counts, by consuls, podestats, captains of the people, councils of twelve and of twenty-four, and by doges; but, in spite of every precaution, has alternately experienced the evils of family cabals, aristocratic usurpation and popular insurrection.

Andrew Doria, a name still mentioned in Genoa with reverence, seemed at length sent by heaven to rescue his country from foreign interference and domestic dissension. It was during this short interval of repose (1547) that the subject of our present article endeavoured to interrupt it, assisted by the intrigues of France and of Alexander Farnese, who then governed Rome and the Church, as Pope Paul the Third. Most conspiracies have originated from the grievances of an oppressed people, or the ruined fortunes of bold bad men and desperate individuals. But, at the moment of that insurrection which I propose to give a short account of, Genoa possessed more real freedom, happiness, and peace, than it had enjoyed for several centuries; and Fiesco united in an extraordinary degree the precious gifts of fortune, fame, person, and understanding.

In the prime of life, for he had scarcely reached his twenty-second year, blessed with the affections of a wife whom he tenderly loved, the beautiful, the virtuous, and tender Eleanora, and enjoying the friendship of his fellow-citizens, he was stimulated by ambition to aim at supreme power.

To effect this purpose, he joined an ardour, which no obstacle could resist, with a deep policy and premeditating coolness, which baffled or did not excite suspicion. Having secured men, arms, and galleys, and distributed corn and money, under the pretence of a charitable donation, he embraced every opportunity of displaying himself to the people in splendid attire, and mounted on horses richly caparisoned, gaining the affections of all by gentle manners and graceful familiarity.

On these occasions, as he conversed with the citizens, he would sometimes lament the pride and oppressive conduct of the nobles, venture to hint that a remedy was not impossible; but, after a short pause, recommend patience and submission.

Fiesco continued to visit as usual the two Dorias, Andrew and Jeanetin, treating them on all occasions with marked attention and respect.

To prevent any suspicion being excited by exercising his vassals at his country seat, he complained that he had been insulted by the Duke of Placentia, when, in fact, that Prince had promised to assist him with two thousand men, and he was able to muster the same number himself; at the port and on board the galleys he had also many dependents.

To account for several of his armed galleys entering the harbour, he proposed cruising against the Turks.

The fatal, the guilty secret had as yet been communicated to three persons only, Calcagno, Sacco, and Verrina, three of his most confidential friends in this unwarrantable proceeding; the two first deliberate, cautious, but determined; the last, haughty, furious, and bloody-minded; each of them considering the plot in which they were engaged as a means of gratifying envy and private revenge, more than the probability of its success; but all devoted to their leader by strong personal attachment and considerable pecuniary obligation.

After many consultations, the conspirators considered the means they possessed as fully adequate to the object in view; and determined, if possible, to dispatch the two Dorias without further delay; as the vigilance, abilities, and patriotism of this family were the chief obstacles to their design.

For this purpose, they were invited to a public entertainment at the Fiesco palace; thus, a man of rank, education, and considerable moral rectitude, who, a few months before, would have started at injuring a fellow-creature in the slightest degree, was stimulated, by thirst for power, to stain his threshold with the blood of the venerable fathers of his country, and, under the guise of hospitality, to commit assassination. A sudden illness of Andrew prevented the execution of this part of their plan.

Fiesco thought it necessary to discover the conspiracy to Paul Pansa, the friend and tutor of his youth, respectable for his age, his learning, and integrity, hoping that he would join and assist their counsels.

Pansa replied, that from the alteration in his looks, manners, and mode of speaking, and from his associating with persons of inferior rank and doubtful reputation, he had long suspected that a dangerous enterprise was in agitation, that he had forbore from delicacy, friendship, and respect, to enter on the subject; but, although he would not betray, he could not participate in the undertaking.

The good old man conjured him, by the honours of his house, by his friendship, by his belief in that holy religion, whose maxims it had been the business of his life to inculcate and impress on his mind; by those locks which were grey in the service of his family, and, lastly, by his love for Eleanora; not to throw away the real and certain happiness he possessed for chimerical and hazardous expectations; which, if they succeeded, could not elevate him to a situation more splendid, honourable, and happy, than that in which he was already placed; but, if they failed, would be productive of death, infamy, and confiscation to all concerned.

That, to many of his associates, bankrupts in fame as well as fortune, and looking only to what they could get in a general plunder, massacre, and confusion, such considerations were useless; but that men like himself and a few others, who had something to lose, would do well coolly to weigh the consequences and hazard of so momentous and irrevocable a step; neither argument nor entreaty could prevail on Fiesco, and the worthy veteran departed from his palace in tears.

The evening of the next day was fixed for executing their purpose, and a cannon fired in the harbour, by Verrina, was to be the signal that he was ready to co-operate.

An entertainment having been announced, many guests repaired to the palace, which they found crowded with strangers and armed soldiers; the persons invited, being conducted to a spacious saloon in a remote part of the building, found the leader and principal conspirators assembled, when Fiesco thus addressed them:—

The hour at length approaches when you have it in your power to relieve Genoa from the yoke of a tyrannic and haughty nobility; in less than an hour our portion will be honourable death, or the recovery and establishment of our freedom on a glorious and eternal basis;—this is the feast to which I have invited you.

The younger Doria has, for several years, been endeavouring to secure to himself and family absolute power; in order more completely to deceive, and that your chains may be indissolubly rivetted, he would establish despotism under the forms of a republic; considering me as one determined to oppose his designs, he has resolved to assassinate me, but I have hitherto been preserved by Providence from his stiletto, for the purpose of restoring you to liberty.

You are grievously oppressed by arrogant taskmasters, whose pride and hardness of heart will increase, should the Doria family succeed in their wishes.

If we succeed in the undertaking to which you are called, I will immediately restore the popular government; so well planned are our precautions, and so effective the means we have taken, that success and easy victory may be pronounced as certain.

The city guards and artificers are wholly devoted to my will; their number is nearly three thousand; these, with two thousand of my own vassals, and the same number from the Duke of Placentia, wait only for my orders.

Our designs are a profound secret; the enemy is off his guard, the danger, the difficulty, the expense and anxiety have been mine; to share in the glory, to rescue yourselves from slavery, and enjoy the blessings I offer, is your portion.

But, as I wish no man to engage who cannot cheerfully co-operate with hand and heart, should any person present be averse to the business in question, let them retire to a tower which adjoins to my palace, where they shall remain in safety till the short struggle is concluded, when, I pledge my honour, that they shall return unmolested to their families.

The guests, who had been invited, as they imagined, to an entertainment, were motionless and silent; but, when they had recovered from the surprise naturally excited by so unexpected a proposal, they declared, with the exception of only two citizens, that they would support the cause with their lives and fortunes: the company then partook of a hasty repast, while to each of them his post and duty were assigned.

A hard, a painful task, still remained for Fiesco; the fever of ambition had not extinguished love; he repaired to the apartment of Eleanora, to which he had invited his friend Pansa for the evening, hoping that his interesting conversation and agreeable manners would prevent her from observing what passed; for, with a degree of cruel kindness, he had not yet given her any intimation of the conspiracy.

Supporting, as far as he was able, the agitation in his breast, he communicated, in a few words, to the trembling Eleanora, the business of the night. Terrified and distracted, she rushed into his arms, conjuring him, by every tender tie, to abandon his enterprise.

The thunder of the cannon fired by Verriani shook the palace, and prevented further words; tearing himself from the friend he loved, and from the wife he adored, Fiesco returned precipitately, exclaiming, To retreat, or even to deliberate, is now too late; success alone can prevent death and destruction; in a few minutes, you will be mistress or a widow of Genoa. Placing himself at the head of his companions, they instantly sallied forth. The city gates were immediately taken possession of, the galleries of the Dorias secured, and the populace in arms, crying out Fiesco and liberty, crowded through the streets; the wishes of the insurgents were accomplished. Jeanetin had rushed, at the first alarm, towards the harbour, but fell a sacrifice to popular fury; the venerable Andrew, sinking under age and infirmity, was safely conveyed by his faithful domestics through a postern, to his villa, a few miles from the city. The senate assembled to know their fate, but Fiesco, for whom everything had been in motion, was no more; in attempting to get on board a galley, a plank on which he trod, being insecurely placed, he fell headlong into the water; the tide was low, but the weight of his armour, the mud, and the darkness of the night prevented his extricating himself.

Thus, by an unexpected accident, which a little care would have prevented, perished an extraordinary young man, at once the ornament and enemy of his country; and his designs perished with him. His brothers endeavoured to take his place, but when the people heard that their favourite was dead, they retired, in sullen melancholy, to their houses, and tranquillity was immediately restored.

The senate proclaimed a general pardon, by sound of trumpet, and the friends of the republic mingling their tears with those of Andrew Dorea for his nephew, and Paul Pansa for his friend, soothed, by every means in their power, the sorrows of the widowed Eleanora.

PRETTY STORY OF AFFECTION IN CHILDHOOD.

(From Mr Clarke's 'Adam the Gardener'.)

[Concluded from last week's Journal.]

THE vessel just then requiring the captain's attention, he left the little boy, bidding him rest himself, as he would have a long way to walk soon. So John threw himself again upon the boat-cloak, where he slept soundly some hours.

He was awakened by a loud confused noise, and, starting upon his feet, he found that the vessel was alongside the quay in the port of Boulogne, where a great number of people were assembled to witness the arrival of a steam-packet from London. All these people seemed to be talking at once, and at the very top of their voices. He saw some men dressed in green coats adorned with silver, with canes in their hands, who seemed to be ordering every one about, and now and then, some of them conducted the people who left the packet boat, to a small house at a little distance, surrounded with white pillars. There were some strange-looking women, with very short dark-blue woollen petticoats on, curious little figured cotton caps on their heads, very long gold earrings, round baskets strapped to their backs, and heavy wooden-soled slippers on, which went clicket-i-clack, clicket-i-clack, every time they moved a step, and added to the noise they made by screaming and bawling to each other. Then he noticed a number of young men and boys who held little cards in their hands, which they seemed to be endeavouring to force upon every one who lapsed, talking, like all the rest, as loud as they possibly could. Even some fishermen and sailors, who were assisting Bontemps to moor his boat, all shouted in the same high tone of voice as every one else. John Barton could not help remarking how different they were from the English sailors at Dover, who seemed to do double the work, though they spoke not a word, perhaps, the whole time, much less made such a bustle and hub-bub as these strange sailors did. What made all this noise seem still more confusing to little John was, that not one word of what he heard around did he understand. No; nothing was spoken everywhere about him but French;—he was now in France! He felt still more helpless and desolate when he had taken leave of his kind friend, Jacques Bontemps, and was wandering along one of the streets of Boulogne, uncertain which way to go; however, he was determined to keep up his spirits, and not to give way to fear and anxiety till there should be real occasion for them. He now began to feel extremely thirsty, and therefore looked about for some place where he might get a draught of water or milk, but it was in vain; there was not a single shop which seemed at all likely to sell anything of the kind. At last he determined to ask, as well as he could, for some at the first shop he should come to of any kind. It happened to be a baker's; he went in, and stood opposite to a woman, who said, Eh, bien! que voulez vous?

John Barton put his finger to his mouth to signify what he wanted.

Ah, vous avez faim; vous voulez du pain? said she, holding up a small loaf.

John Barton shook his head, still pointing to his mouth.

Allez, allez; je ne vous comprends pas, said she, crossly; and she pointed to the door.

John, disappointed, left the shop, fearing he should never be able to make any one understand him in France; he walked on, and at the end of the street came to a square open place that looked like a market. To his great joy he saw on one of the stalls some fine ripe cherries and strawberries, and upon producing a sous the woman placed in his hand a large cabbage-leaf full of fruit. As he was eating it, and thinking how much better his bargain was here, than the little paper pottles with, perhaps, half a dozen strawberries in them, for the same money in England, he saw standing opposite to him, at a small distance, a little beggar-girl, whose eyes were fixed longingly on the juicy fruit he held in his hand, but directly she perceived he noticed her, she hastily withdrew them. Her face was extremely pale and thin; her eyes, though of a beautiful dark brown, looked hollow and sickly; her clothes hung in rags about her; and her little tender feet were bare. John Barton went towards her, and held his leaf of fruit before her. She hesitated, and looked up in his face; he took her hand, which was hot and parched, and placing it among the tempting red berries, he said, Do eat some, little dear!

The little child, again fixing her large dark eyes on his, and smiling, took some of the strawberries, and began to eat very eagerly, as if she were extremely hungry. When she had finished all the fruit that remained in the leaf, John thought she still seemed to be hungry, and asked her if she would not like some more. The child shook her head, and smiled again. I cannot make her understand me, thought he, but I will buy some bread, which will be better for her, for I am sure she looks still hungry. He was accordingly going towards a shop, but, directly he attempted to move, the little girl shrieked out Baste donc, baste donc! and caught hold of his jacket lest he should escape. He took hold of her hand, and pointing to the shop, he led her towards it, and gave her a little loaf, which she ate as hungrily as she had before done the fruit. As John Barton stood watching his young acquaintance enjoy his present, he was delighted to see the colour come into her cheeks, and he felt very happy to think he had been able to help a poor little creature who was still more helpless than himself. He now began to think of continuing his journey; he therefore shook hands with the little girl, and kissed her, and then pointed that he must leave her. This, however, he could not do, for she placed herself before him, then ran round and put her arm in his, and led him on a little way, then stopped and pointed quickly from him to herself two or three times, and then, clapping her little hands together, and looking up in his face, she nodded and smiled, as if she had arranged that they should go together. John Barton could not help feeling pleased, that this little stranger had taken such a fancy to him, especially as he thought he should not be likely to take her from home, as, from her wandering about the streets alone and hungry, he did not think it probable that she lived there; and he found also, that he could make this little creature understand his meaning better than any one else he had spoken to since he had been in France. Well, they were just trotting off together, when suddenly John recollected, that he did not know which way he ought to turn to go toward Paris. He turned to his little companion and said, Paris, Paris, two or three times; then pointed to himself, and then all around. The child shook her head and smiled. Je ne te comprends pas, mon petit ami, said she.

John Barton did not know how to make her

• Well, what do you want?

† Ah, you are hungry;—you want some bread!

‡ Go, go! I don't understand you.

§ O, do stay, do stay!

|| I don't understand you, my little friend.

comprehend his meaning, when just at that moment a stage-coach came by, and stopped just where the two children were standing. On it were some words in French, and among them was one, which John made out to be Paris; he pointed to it, and when the little girl saw what he meant she screamed out with joy, and exclaiming, À Paris! à Paris! O, quel bonheur! nous allons à Paris! she skipped about like a little mad thing.

John thus found out that the word Paris was written the same way in France as in England—but that the French people sounded it differently. The little girl now took his hand, and led him straight up the hilly street they were now in, and when they came to the top, she turned round and pointed across the town. John looked round and saw the wide sea, over which he had so lately passed, dancing and sparkling in the sunbeams, at a little distance off. The day was so clear, that he could distinctly see the cliffs of England; and as he looked upon them, he thought of his own dear mother, and prayed that he might soon return to her with good news. They then entered a gate under some huge walls, on the top of which the trees were growing; and after they had walked through some more streets, they came out at another gate like the former, and they found themselves on a straight road; upon which, at some distance off, John again saw the stage-coach travelling slowly along. They trudged on, keeping it in sight for some time, but it went much faster than they could possibly walk, and so it was not long before they lost it altogether; but still they kept walking on, John every now and then looking at his little companion, to see if she seemed tired. But, on the contrary, she appeared to be gay and brisk, and as if she had been well accustomed to walking; she now and then ran to the side of the road to gather the weeds which she would stick into John's hat, and then smile in his face, as if trying to show how happy she was. Once or twice she endeavoured to get his bundle from him, but when he found that she only wanted it to carry it for him, that she might save him the trouble, he would not let her have it, though she continually put her hand on it, crying, Je le porterai, te dis-je; laisse moi faire. However, when she found nothing could make him give it up, she ran and gathered some very large dock-leaves out of the hedge, and held them over John's and her own head to keep the heat of the sun off, all the time smiling, and playing several little graceful tricks, as if she mocked a fine lady with her parasol, to the great delight of our friend John, who, as he watched her sweet cheerful countenance and winning actions, thought he had never beheld such a pretty creature in all his life. Suddenly she stopped, and pointing to herself, she said Julie, Julie; then pointing to him, she looked up in his face with an asking look, to which he replied John, for he could not but directly understand that she meant to tell him her name and inquire his.

Tchon! Tchon! Ah, que c'est drôle! exclaimed the child, laughing, and again she frisked about; then she came back to him, and, stroking his face, said, in a half-laughing half-soothing tone, Ah, mon pauvre Tchon!

Little John could not help laughing too, so he patted her on the cheek, saying, O you dear little Julie! which made her laugh and skip about ten times more; so these merry little travellers went on and on, for many a long mile, without feeling tired, so happy they were with each other.

It was about four o'clock in the afternoon, when they began to feel both hungry and tired, so John began to look about for some house where they might rest and get something to eat; and as he spied a cottage at a little distance, he went towards it, and upon looking in, he saw a woman standing at a table, cutting some slices off an immensely large brown loaf, and giving a piece to each of her children, six of whom were sitting round the table, with a large bowl of milk before them. Julie, who had likewise peeped in, went towards the woman, and said something to her, when immediately the good woman came to where John was standing, and saying, Entrez, entrez, mon pauvre petit ami, she led him to the table, where she made him sit down, and placed a bowl of milk and two large slices of bread before him and Julie, all the time encouraging them to eat by her kind looks and tone of voice. They were soon quite at home with this good family, for though they could not make out a single word that John said, yet his good-natured face, and (to them) curious language, soon won the children to take a fancy to him; and as for Julie, no one could look at her beautiful face and winning manners without loving her directly. When they had finished their pleasant meal, John took out two of his sous, and offered

• To Paris! to Paris! O what joy, we are going to Paris!

† I'll carry it, I tell thee; let me do it. French people who are familiar with each other, say thee and thou, not you, as we do.

‡ Tchon! Tchon! O, how droll!

|| Come in, come in, my poor little friend.

them timidly to the woman, who put back his hand, saying, Non, non, garde ton argent, mon garçon, tu en auras bien besoin; quant à moi j'en ai assez pour mes enfants, et pour un pauvre étranger.

John could not understand the woman's words, but he saw by her action that she refused his money: he thanked her very heartily several times, hoping, by the tone of his voice, to make himself understood; and he took hold of her hand, and drew her face towards him, and kissed her very affectionately. The woman returned his caresses with a very gentle manner, and then went towards a door at the other end of the apartment. She opened it, and pointing to a small bed which stood in the next room, looked at him, and then spoke some words to Julie. John shook his head, in token that they had no place to sleep in, and the good woman seemed to settle that they should remain with her that night. Our two little travellers, after a good game of romps with the children of the cottage, on some hay, which was lying in a field behind the house, went to bed, and slept soundly till six o'clock on the following morning. The good woman having given them some bread and milk for breakfast, our two little travellers took an affectionate leave of her, and proceeded on their journey. We will not follow them day by day, in all their adventures: it will be sufficient to say, that what with John's good-natured face, and frank active manners, together with Julie's pretty voice, and sweet engaging looks when she spoke to strangers for him, our two little wanderers were never in want of a supper or a bed. Once, indeed, they met with a very cross man, who would have nothing to say to them; so that they were forced to endure the pain of hunger, and to lie all night in the open air; but even then they were not down-hearted, for John luckily found some wild strawberries, which he gathered for Julie; and when night came, he made up a nice bed for her on some hay, which he piled up in the corner of a meadow, under a thick hedge, and covered her up with his coarse, but warm blue sea-jacket. It was, fortunately, a fine warm night in July, so that, instead of feeling sorry they had no bed, John could not help being very grateful and happy, as he looked up at the deep blue sky over his head, which was sparkling with thousands of bright stars. As he was silently thanking the kind and good God for his protection, and for his enabling him to help himself, and manage his journey so well as he had till now done, he suddenly heard voices on the other side of the hedge. He listened, but could not make out a word, as the voices talked in French. He rose softly from his bed of hay, and crept to that of Julie, who was at a little distance. He awakened her very gently, and placed his fingers on his lips, in token that she should listen in silence. Julie, who saw his signs by the star-light, after having hearkened to the voices with great attention, suddenly started up, and drew John quietly, but quickly from the spot. He saw that her face was much agitated, and she looked pale and frightened. He had distinguished in the midst of the conversation he had just overheard, the name of the cross man, who had refused them a supper and bed that evening. He particularly recollected it, because it was written over the man's door, Lion; and Julie had laughed when she read it, as if she had meant to say that it was a good name for such a cross person. Well, he now noticed that Julie was leading him back to the village where Mr Lion lived, and that she at last stopped at his door. She knocked loudly, and at last the man came to the window, and asked, in a gruff tone, what they wanted. Julie only spoke a few words in a loud whisper, when he hastened down stairs, muttering all the way, Que Diable! et Morbleu! and opened the door for them. After bringing the children in, he immediately called up some workmen who slept in the house, and placing them at the doors and windows, with sticks in their hands, he gave them some directions in a frightened tone of voice, and seemed to be expecting something in great alarm. They did not wait long before they heard a voice at one of the window shutters. All the workmen immediately sallied out, and after a short scuffle, they came in again, bringing with them two men bound hand and foot, who no sooner uttered a word, than John discovered them to be the same men whose voices he had heard in the meadow. He now found that Julie had overheard them plotting an attack on Mr Lion's house; and had, in fact, returned good for evil, by coming and warning him of his danger, although he had been so unkind as to refuse them a little food and a night's lodging. The man himself seemed now to be ashamed of his behaviour, for he pulled out a golden coin, and offered it to Julie, but she shook her head, and John stepped forward and put back his hand, for he would not be paid for doing a good action, especially by a man whom he did not respect, even though he felt that that piece of money would be of very great use to him and Julie on their journey: so he took her hand, and without wishing him good bye, they both left the house, and went to their pleasant beds in the meadow, where they both slept soundly till morning, when they jumped up betimes, and continued their journey as merrily and happily as usual.

Often and often did John Barton thank God for having caused him to meet with his dear little friend, Julie. Had he unkindly eaten all his fruit, instead of sharing it with the poor little stranger, he never could have managed his journey half so well, so that he felt how true the proverb was he had heard his mother repeat—"A good deed always meets its reward."

By being constantly together, and helping and loving each other, John and Julie at last became to understand each other's signs almost as well as by talking; and, by degrees, John learnt to understand a few words of French, and Julie of English.

At length, after about fifteen days' travelling, by the help of Julie's inquiring the way in all the towns they passed through, and by noticing all the stage coaches that passed them on the road, the two little wanderers entered the city of Paris.

Here then, at last, was our hero in Paris; at which place he had, for the last fortnight, been so anxious to arrive. But how was he to proceed in order to find out the French gentleman, who, he hoped, would be a friend to his mother? He did not even know his name, and as he looked at the rows and rows of houses that surrounded him on all sides of this immense town, his heart almost failed him, when he recollected that he did not even know the name of the street in which the gentleman lived.

However, he tried to keep up his spirits, for he recollected that he had never found grieving or crying do him any good, or help him forward in anything; so he began to think what he had better first do, in order to set about looking for the French gentleman.

At this moment, a rude boy, passing quickly and unconcernedly, happened to knock down a basket of fine peaches belonging to a fruit-woman, whose stall was just opposite to the spot where our two little friends were standing.

John immediately, with his usual active good-nature, ran to assist the woman in picking up her fruit, and replacing it in the basket; and she, after having bestowed a few hard words on the awkward boy, turned and thanked our hero, and then gave him a fine peach for his pains. John, although he felt rather hungry, yet (as he always did, when anything nice was given to him) he instantly gave it to Julie, because he thought that she, being a little girl, and weaker than himself, must want it still more than him.

The fruit-woman, who observed this action of his, was very much pleased, and exclaiming, C'est bien fait, mon petit ami, de la donner à ta sœur; tiens, en voilà une autre, pour toi-même, she placed another peach in his hands for himself.

While the children were eating their peaches, and still standing by the stall, a lady bought some fruit of the woman, and then wished to have it sent home for her.

The fruit-woman, who liked John's honest face and his kindness to the little girl, desired him to carry it to the lady's house; and when Julie had made him understand what he was to do, he took the basket, and, accompanied by his little friend (who would never leave him for an instant), he followed the lady home. Upon his arriving there, he delivered the basket of fruit to a servant, and the lady, who was pleased with the two children, gave them each a cinque-sous piece.

John, thinking this to be the price of the fruit, immediately returned with it to the fruit-woman, who was still more pleased with him, from this fresh proof of his honesty and goodness. He now made his usual signs to Julie, that she should inquire about a sleeping-place. He soon saw by the smiling looks of the good woman, that their petition for a night's lodging was granted, and he felt very grateful that they had so soon found a home in that great busy city, where everyone seemed to be so much occupied with their own thoughts and business, that John had felt much more solitary and neglected since he had come amongst them, than he had ever felt whilst he was travelling along through country roads, meadows, and had only come now and then to a cottage, where the people seemed to have more leisure and inclination to attend to him. In fact, the good fruit-woman had quite taken a fancy to the two strange children, from their honesty, good behaviour, and fondness for each other, and she felt scarcely less pleased than they did, when they were both happily settled in her nice little lodgings in the Rue.

In return for all her kindness to them, John endeavoured to make himself as useful as possible to her; and he really was a great assistance to his kind friend, by carrying the baskets of fruit to the houses of the people who purchased them at the stall, and by going on all kinds of errands for her, when out of doors, and when at home, by rubbing the fruit, arranging it in the baskets for the next day's sale, picking out the best leaves and placing them among the fruit so as to make it look more tempting, besides various other little jobs in the household, which made him quite a valuable helpmate.

As for little Julie, she was not able to do much to assist, but her sweet merry face, happy voice, and playful gaiety, made her a most charming companion to their kind friend; and as for her young protector, John, he devoted upon her more and more every day, while she, on her part, was so fondly attached to him, that she would never upon any account be prevailed upon to quit him. In all his walks, she accompanied him; during his work she would constantly sit by him, and either sing him some songs, of which she seemed to know an immense number, or merely smile, pat his face, chatter French to him, dance about, and in short use every means in her power to amuse and please him; or if he were sent on any message, she was sure to be trotting beside him, helping him to carry the basket or parcel, and trying, by all kinds of little winning ways, to make the way seem short and pleasant.

In the meantime, John Barton never for a moment lost sight of the main object which had induced him to come to Paris, so far from his own dear mother, and his own home in the little cottage under the cliffs. Whenever he was out, in all his long ramblings through the large city, he never failed to look at all the faces he met, in the hope of seeing one like that which he had often heard his mother describe as belonging to the French gentleman, who had been so much benefited by his father. Every name that he saw written up, he took pains to spell out as well as he could, for he thought he had heard his mother mention it, though he could not recollect the exact sound, and he thought that, if he were to see it, it might be recalled to his mind; these were very slender chances, and the poor little boy began at last almost to despair of ever succeeding; when an event occurred which proved that the good and kind God never deserts those who are really persevering, cheerful, and hearty in their efforts to help themselves.

One fine morning John was sent with a message from the fruit-woman to one of her customers who lived in a distant part of the city, and as he was returning through the Rue de ——— he stopped for an instant to look at a handsome cabriolet which stood opposite the door of a fine large house. Just at that moment a piercing scream from Julie made him turn his head abruptly round, and to his horror he beheld her stretched upon the pavement apparently dead! whilst a gentleman was bending over her, and raising her from the ground.

Mon Dieu! j'ai peur que j'ai tué cette pauvre petite! exclaimed the gentleman.

John ran towards his darling little friend, and lifting her head gently in his arms, beheld her face perfectly pale and motionless. He burst into tears at this dreadful sight, and broke forth into reproaches against the gentleman, (who in passing quickly to his cabriolet, had knocked the little girl down,) forgetting that he was speaking English, and would therefore most probably not be understood.

However, the gentleman mildly replied in the same language, though with a foreign accent, My little friend, I am exceedingly sorry to have hurt your sister; but I cannot imagine how it is she fell, for I scarcely seemed to touch her; I think it must have been something else, and which frightened her, for the poor little thing is in a swoon. Baptiste,† added he, calling to a servant who stood by, prenez cette petite bien doucement dans vos bras, et placez la sur la chaise-longue dans le salon.

The servant obeyed: and John, seeing they were carrying away his dear little Julie, loudly protested against it.

My dear little friend, said the gentleman, leading John into the house, be patient; we are only going to try to recover your sister from her fainting fit.

John followed the gentleman into a superbly furnished apartment, where he saw his beloved little friend placed carefully on a soft sofa, where she continued to lie for some time, perfectly still and pale. As John hung over her sobbing, and endeavouring as well as he could to assist in the efforts made by the gentleman and his servants to restore her, he at last beheld her colour come a little into her cheeks, and he had the pleasure of feeling her breath come upon his face, as she sighed and turned a little round.

Où est mon cher Papa? said she, in a faint voice, J'ai cru l'avoir vu. Est ce un songe?

Grand Dieu! c'est mon enfant! c'est ma petite Julie! c'est ma chère fille! || exclaimed the gentleman, and

* My God! I fear I have killed this poor little thing!

† Baptiste (the name of the servant), lift this little one carefully in your arms, and lay her on the sofa in the parlour.

‡ Where is my dear Papa?

§ I thought I had seen him. Is it a dream?

|| Great God! it is my child! It is my little Julie! It is my dear daughter!

* No, no, keep thy money, my boy, thou wilt want it: as for me, I have enough for my own children, and for a poor stranger.

† What the diable and morbleu is another French exclamation which it is impossible to translate—it is a kind of oath.

* That's well done, my little friend, to give it to thy sister; hold, here's another for thyself.

† A small coin, worth twopence halfpenny, English.

rushing to the sofa, he caught the little girl in his arms, and covered her with kisses, while she, in her turn, flung her arms round his neck, and stifled him with weeping and joyful caresses.

John in astonishment beheld this scene, and wondered what could be its meaning, when the gentleman, after indulging in a long embrace of his dear little girl, at last turned to where he was standing, and said, And how came you, my little Englishman, to be with my dear child? Is Julie your daughter, Sir? asked John in amazement.

Yes, my long-lost child, for whom I have grieved these last two years; and whom I feared I should never see again; but come, tell me how you came to be with her, come tell me the whole story.

John recollected at this moment, that his kind friend the fruit-woman would be uneasy at his long stay, so he told the gentleman that he believed he ought to return to her to relieve her anxiety: but the gentleman, (though pleased with this instance of his thoughtfulness for an absent friend,) would not hear of his leaving him, and therefore he dispatched a footman to bid the fruit-woman not to feel anxious for the two children, as they were perfectly safe.

By this time the poor little Julie had quite recovered from the effects of her swoon, (which was only occasioned by the sudden shock of surprise and joy in seeing her dear papa after so long a separation), and she could now sit up on the sofa and talk, with her usual sprightliness. With her eyes and lips glistening with mingled New-fallen tears and beaming smiles, and her cheek resting on her kind father's bosom, she chatted away to him with such a happy tone of voice as made her father stop every now and then to kiss her for joy, and gave John a sensation of such proud gladness as he had never in his life felt before. And now, my fine brave little fellow, said the gentleman, turning to John after his daughter had stopped speaking, it is but fair you, who have been so kind a protector to my poor little wandering child, should be told who she is, and indeed her whole story, which she has just been relating to me, though I see you did not understand her; and you may be sure that in the course of her tale, she did not forget to mention your kindness to her, my little friend; at any rate, her father never will forget it.

So saying, the gentlemen shook John Barton very heartily by the hand, and after doing so two or three times, he continued. Having lost my dear wife when my little Julie was very young, I was compelled to trust the child very much to the care of servants; and one afternoon, when she was about five years old, the maid who had the charge of her, returned home with the dreadful news, that, in the course of their walk, she had suddenly missed Made-moiselle Julie, and that she had searched everywhere in Paris for her, but in vain. The agony I then suffered, said the gentleman, looking affectionately at his little girl, can only be equalled by the delight I now feel in again beholding my child, whom I have so long mourned as lost to me for ever. Her loss was so sudden and strange, as to seem almost like a dream; no trace whatever could be discovered of the cause of her removal, and after the strictest inquiry and search were made throughout Paris, I was compelled to give up my efforts for her recovery, as perfectly hopeless. The cause of her extraordinary disappearance is explained by the account Julie has just given me. She says, that while she was walking with the servant in the gardens of the Tuileries,* she saw a very beautiful butterfly, which she begged the maid to try and catch for her, but as this latter was busily engaged in talking with some acquaintance, and did not attend to her request, she tried to run after it herself, and as she was pursuing it behind one of the many statues which adorn the gardens, a tall woman with glaring black eyes had started out, caught her up in her arms, and ran off with her as quick as possible; at the same time covering her mouth with her dirty brown hand so tightly as almost to stifle her, in order that she might not cry out for help. My poor little girl tells me, that from that day she went through the most shocking hardships; that the horrid gipsy used to beat her dreadfully, if she did not perform tasks which were much too hard for her possibly to accomplish; that she stripped all her own nice clothes off, and dressed her in filthy rags; that she used to make her walk miles and miles with her about the country, till her feet used to bleed, and till she was obliged to drop down by the road-side and cry for very weariness; and that she never gave her sufficient food to eat. This cruel usage was all because my child would never obey her in two things:—no threats, no entreaties, could prevail upon her either to beg or steal; both of which this wicked wretch wanted her to do, and had stolen her for the purpose. At last my poor little Julie found an opportunity of escaping from the power of this horrid fiend: she ran away, but she had not wandered far, when she would have perished for want of food and protection, had she not met with you, my kind good little boy, to support her in her misery, and at last to conduct her to the arms of her sorrowing father.

* These are public gardens, something like our Kensington Gardens.

May God Almighty bless and reward you for it, and render your parents as happy as the possession of so good a son ought already to make them, and as he deserves they should be. But I have forgotten all this time to ask your name, my brave boy; twice in her life have I nearly lost my darling. Her first preserver I intirely lost sight of; but you, her second deliverer, must receive the reward due to one who has rendered so important a service to the now happy Béliard.

Béliard! Béliard! that's it! exclaimed John, utterly regardless of the gentleman's question, I knew I should remember it if I once heard it. And is Béliard really your name, sir? added he, eagerly.

Certainly, my little friend, answered the gentleman, astonished; and what then? And you say you nearly lost your little Julie twice in her life?—O, it must be, it must be! O, my dear, dear mother! my dear mother! exclaimed John, nearly crying with joy, as he started from his chair, and ran to the window, just as if he could have really looked out towards his own house and his dear mother.

The gentleman, amazed at this strange behaviour of the little boy's, asked him what he meant by his exclamations, and also reminded him that he had not yet told him his name.

O, sir, I am almost sure you will remember it, for it was my poor father's as well as mine—John Barton.

Good heavens! and are you the son of that brave seaman who rescued my dear infant from the waves? Twice has my darling Julie been saved from perishing by the generous Bartons.

You may easily imagine, that Monsieur Béliard, upon discovering that the wife and mother of the two preservers of his child was living in want and misery, hastened to relieve her. On the very day following, he set out for England, accompanied by John and Julie, (whom he would not trust from his sight for an instant,) but not till he had first called upon the good fruit-woman and handsomely rewarded her for her kindness to the two children. He also stopped a day at Boulogne, for the purpose of recompensing the good Jacques Bontemps.

At last the impatient John had the happiness of again embracing his dear mother, for whom he had done so much, and of beholding her provided for comfortably, for the remainder of her life, by the generosity of Monsieur Béliard, and (as he could not help feeling), owing to his own exertions, his perseverance, his humanity, and his reliance on the goodness of God.

TABLE TALK.

A True Lesson of Charity.—Let us be sure, our enemy is not that hateful being we are too apt to paint him. His vices and basenesses lie combined in far other order before his own mind, than before ours, and under colours which palliate them, nay, exhibit them as virtues. Were he the wretch of our imagining, his life would be a burden to himself; for it is not by bread alone that the basest mortal lives; a certain approval of conscience is equally essential to physical existence; is the fine all-pervading cement by which that wondrous union, a Self, is held together. Since the man, therefore, is not in Bedlam, and has not shot or hanged himself, let us take comfort, and conclude that he is one of two things; either a vicious dog, in man's guise, to be muzzled and mourned over, and greatly marvelled at; or a real man, and, consequently, not without moral worth, which is to be enlightened, and so far approved of. But to judge rightly of his character, we must learn to look at it, not less with his eyes than with our own; we must learn to pity him; to see him as a fellow-creature, in a word, to love him, or his real spiritual nature will ever be mistaken by us. —Thomas Carlyle.

The better Part of Brahminical Teaching.—Those Brahmins who are really learned, and such are by no means uncommon, have a nice perception of moral influence. They teach the doctrines of a refined practical philosophy, contending for inward purity and integrity of heart, as well as for external decorum of conduct, and there are many among them of very rare mental endowments. We find, moreover, many axioms of a high morality among their religious and philosophical writings. I take one at random from the institutes of Menu: "Let not a man be querulous even though in pain; let him not injure another in deed or in thought; let him not utter a word by which his fellow-creatures may suffer uneasiness, since that will obstruct his own progress to beatitude." There is a beautiful maxim quoted by Sir William Jones, and written upwards of three hundred years before the Christian era, which would do honour to any religious community—it pronounces the duty of a good man, even in the moment of destruction, to consist, "not only in forgiving, but even in a desire to benefit, his destroyer, as the sandal tree, in the instant of its overthrow, sheds perfume on the axe that fells it." These are the suggestions of no common minds, and whoever, in seeking to ascertain the Hindoo character, shall judge of it from those with whom he may happen to come in contact, in passing rapidly through any part of their country, will be sure to look at it through a false medium, and consequently not appreciate it justly. If there be much to despise, there is also much to admire. It cannot, indeed, be denied that many of their religious teachers are so ignorant as to uphold the most barbarous superstitions, which, of course, are eagerly received by the deluded multitude; but, it is equally true that, in almost every age of the world, they have produced learned men among them, who would have done honour to any country and at any period.—Oriental Annual.

Ducange and his Glossary.—Ducange was a worthy, well-bred, good-natured man; fond as he was of study, he always cheerfully laid aside his book to welcome any visitors, saying, that he studied for his pleasure, which yet he could always postpone to social duties. The most remarkable particular we have of him is, that once having sent for some book-sellers, he showed them an old trunk, telling them that it contained materials for a saleable book, and upon any reasonable consideration, they were theirs. The offer pleased, but upon opening the trunk they could only find a heap of flitters of paper, which seemed to have been torn, and thrown by, as of no use. Ducange, laughing at their embarrassment, told them again, I assure you, gentlemen, my manuscript is actually in that trunk. At length, one of them, upon a closer examination of some of the snips, discovered each to contain a word, with Ducange's remarks and illustrations upon it; and that all the difficulty would be to bring them into an alphabetical arrangement. Ducange's probity and erudition being well known, the bookseller, without any further explanation, made him a handsome offer for the trunk and its valuable contents; and this is said to be the origin of Ducange's curious Latin Glossary.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have not forgotten the poems of J. and M. S. nor is our opinion of them changed. They will be noticed again next week.

We do not recollect having seen the verses mentioned by B. W. C. M.

Our fair correspondent, E. F. A., has much gratified us by the interest she takes in our opinion on the point she speaks of, and will oblige us by putting in practice her kind offer of setting those right who have so strangely mistaken it.

If "One of the Million" will have the goodness to state explicitly his own opinion upon the point in question, we shall be the more easily enabled to give him an explicit answer.

We should have answered the question of ALFRED sooner, but doubted, from the way in which he put it, whether his object might not have been misconstrued in these advertising days. Our opinion is that "emasculated editions" of such writers as Shakspeare are good, in order to enable every circle of readers to become acquainted with those works; while editions unemasculated are good also, in order that such works may not be at the mercy of different states of opinion, but remain capable of producing whatever chances of improvement and lessons of charity may be suggested even by the licenses of great minds. We must take the world liberally, as it is made. There are people (at least it would follow so from their assumptions) who, in the impiety of their prudery, would cut and carve Nature herself, if they could; instead of seeing the manifest and kindly lesson taught us by her genial bosom.

A "first attempt" in praise of a native county can afford to be told that its versification requires more study.

The opening specimens of a new weekly publication have been sent us, intitled 'Cumberland's Portrait Gallery.' It is written in a spirit singularly commendable, that of an inclination to approve, combined with the power to object. We shall be happy to quote from it, when in the natural course of its variety it offers us subjects less political or controversial.

Two correspondents inquire why we do not notice two several publications that have lately issued from the pens of popular writers? The reason is, that it is not a part of the system of this Journal to notice books that are not sent it.

A NEW BOOK WORTH KNOWING.

We have been deeply interested in a book just published, intitled 'Necessity of Popular Education as a National Object; with Hints on the Treatment of Criminals, and Observations on Homicidal Insanity.' By James Simpson, Advocate. It is printed for Adam and Charles Black, Edinburgh; and Longman and Company, London; and should be in the hands of every friend of his species that can afford to purchase it. To many such true readers of books, we hope, by this announcement, to give it introduction; and extracts shall bring many others acquainted with it, whose pockets are not equally rich as their hearts. We see, at page 121, that Mr Simpson commends our estimable contemporaries, the Messrs Chambers, for reprinting in their Journal, "with the author's consent," the lectures given by Mr Combe, in Edinburgh, on Popular Education. We should be happy to obtain the like honour for the 'London Journal,' in Mr Simpson's permission to avail ourselves, not indeed of the use of his intricate work (there is a difference in this respect between lectures already delivered, and a good-sized original work—not to mention other circumstances), but of the liberty to draw more freely upon his pages than we feel warranted in doing unlicensed. There is a good long chapter, for instance, and a very edifying one, which we should like to give intire, 'On the Effects of Imperfect Education upon the Condition of the Class of the People above Manual Labour;' and as we read further (for we have just received the book, and, at present, have got little beyond), we see very plainly that our love will be for taking larger draughts of it. We should like to know how far we and our readers may drink.

That chapter just mentioned has particularly struck us. It helps to show what a quantity of education is wanted even by "the educated," and how it becomes us all to look about us, lest our defects of moral training, rendered still more visible by the supposed and ostentatious perfection of our intellect, should not only be keeping up the old war between our passions and our judgments, but expose us to the amazement of the very infants whom such men as Mr Simpson and Mr Wilderspin are instructing,—as they too often do, in fact, already, in our own homes and families; for children are far shrewder and more attentive observers than people suppose; and by no means shut up the eyes of their natural discernment, purely because we, in our more than childish will, wish them to do so, or run our own heads behind some fine fancied veil of sophistry and inconsistency, itself an exposure.

Meantime we have extracted from Mr Simpson's book the interesting evidences afforded by the Edinburgh Infant School Society, of the easiness and success of a system of love and candour, in fetching out these natural powers of children, and enabling them to teach and govern themselves. The secret is twofold, and consists, firstly (not in telling them, but) in convincing them, that you desire their good, and not your own power; and in so habituating them to a consideration for others, that, when they come to judge of their own actions, they do it as third parties.

O those two grandest of all secrets for making men loving and true! It scarcely need be observed, that we do not agree in every item of reasoning or practice as it arises in Mr Simpson's book, and the examples he brings before us. This is not to be expected with any book or with any readers, till all our understandings get respectively into completer and more harmonious condition. He, and all of us, are doubtless to seek in numberless matters; but with love for his guide, and the substitution of the good of others for self-seeking, he surely is in the best way for acquiring wisdom as well as imparting it; and when we differ from such men, we differ from them with respect and hesitation, and delight to see how calculated such a system is to correct its errors as it goes.

I.—EFFECTS OF MORAL TRAINING.

I. Incidents to show the good effects of exercising kindness and consideration for others, in opposition to reckless mischief, hard-heartedness, and cruelty; vices which render the lower orders dangerous and formidable.

1. Two of the children, brothers, about five and four years of age, coming one morning late into school, were to go to their seats without censure, if they could give an account of what they had been doing, which should be declared satisfactory by the whole school, who should decide. They stated separately that they had been contemplating the proceedings of a large caterpillar, and noticing the different positions of its body as it crossed their path—that it was now horizontal, and now perpendicular, and presently curved, and finally inclined, when it escaped into a tree. The master then asked them abruptly, Why did you not kill it? The children stared. Could you have killed it? asked the teacher. Yes, but that would have been cruel and naughty, and a sin against God. The little moralists were acquitted by acclamation; having, in ants as they were, manifested a character which, were it universal in the juvenile population, would in another generation reduce our penal code to a mass of waste paper, in one grand department of its bulk.*

2. The teacher mentioned to the children one day that he had been occupied about a boy and a girl who had no father or mother, and whose grandfather and grandmother, who took care of them, were bed-ridden and in great poverty. The boy was seven years of age, too old for the Infant School; but some gentlemen, he said, were exerting themselves to get the boy into one of the hospitals. Here he purposely stopped to try the sympathies of his audience for the girl. He was not disappointed; several little voices called out at once: O! Master! what for no the lassie too? He assured them that the girl was to come to the Infant School, and to be boarded with him and Mrs Wright; and the intelligence was received with loud plaudits.

3. One day, when the children were in the playground, four boys occupied the boys' circular swing, while a stranger gentleman was looking on with the teacher. Conscious of being looked at, the little fellows were wheeling round with more than usual swiftness and dexterity, when a creature of two or three years made a sudden dart forward into their very orbit, and in an instant must have been knocked down with great force. With a presence of mind and consideration, and with a mechanical skill, which to admire most we know not, one of the boys, about five years old, used the instant of time in which the singular movement was practicable, threw his whole body into a horizontal position, and went clear over the infant's head! But this was not all: in the same well-employed instant, it occurred to him that this movement was not enough to save the little intruder, as he himself was to be followed as quick as thought by the next swinger. For this he provided, by dropping his own feet to the ground and stopping the whole machine, the instant he had cleared the child's head. The spectator of this admirable specimen of intellect and good feeling, which was all necessarily the thought and act of a moment, had his hand instinctively in his pocket for a shilling, but was stopped by the teacher, who disowns all inferior motives for acts of kindness and justice. The little hero, however, had his reward: for the incident was related by the teacher in full school, in the presence of the strangers, and was received with several rounds of hearty applause.

* This instance of practical mercy occurred strongly to my mind one day last spring, in London. When passing along a street, I saw several big boys with a live mouse at the end of a string. I returned in a few minutes the same way, and found they had killed it, and were beating it to atoms with their sticks!!

4. J. J. accused H. S. of having eat up J. J.'s dinner. It was proved by several witnesses that H. S. not only appropriated the dinner, but used force. The charge being proved to the satisfaction of the jury (the whole school), the same tribunal were requested by the teacher to decide what should be the consequences to the convict. One orator rose and suggested that, as H. S. had not yet eat his own dinner, he ought to give it to J. J. This motion, for the children always welcome any reasonable substitute for corporal punishment, was carried by acclamation. When one o'clock came, and the dinner was handed over, coram publico, to J. J., H. S. was observed by him to be in tears, and lingering near his own dinner. They were by this time nearly alone, but the teacher was watching the result. The tears were too much for J. J., who went to H. S., threw his arms about his neck, told him not to cry, but to sit down and take half. This invitation was of course accepted by H. S., who manifested a great inferiority of character to the other, and furnished an example of the blindness of the unjust to the justice of retribution, which they always feel to be mere revenge and cruelty. He could not bear to see J. J. even sharing his dinner, and told him, with bitterness, that he would tell his mother. Weel, weel! said the generous child, I'll gie ye'd a' back again. Of course the teacher interfered to prevent this gross injustice; and, in the afternoon, made their school-fellows completely aware of the part each had acted. It is not easy to render a character like that of H. S. liberal; but a long course of such practice, for precept is impotent in such cases, might much modify what in after life would have turned out a selfish, unjust, and unsocial character.

II. Incidents to show the good effects of practically exercising honesty and truth,—to the end of superseding another branch of criminal jurisprudence.

1. One of the children lost a halfpenny in the play-ground. The mistress was so certain that it would be found and accounted for, that she lent the loser a halfpenny. Some time after, when the incident was nearly forgotten, one of the boys, J. F., found a halfpenny in the play-ground, and although no one saw him find it, he brought it at once to the teacher. As the latter knew nothing about the loss of a halfpenny already alluded to, it appeared to him a halfpenny without an owner; but one of the children suggested that it must be the lost halfpenny for which the mistress had given the substitute. What then shall be done with it? Many voices answered, The mistress should get it. The girl who lost the halfpenny was called out, and at once knew her own. It was given to her, and she immediately transferred it to the mistress. The teacher then appealed to the whole school. Is that right? Yes, yes, right, right, was called out by the whole assemblage with much applause and animation. This last accompaniment of their approbation is strongly contrasted with the more tranquil and evidently regretting way in which they condemn, when anything is wrong.

2. A penny was found in the play-ground, which had lain so long as to be mouldy and rusty. It was held up for an owner, but claimed by none. What shall we do with it? Keep it master, keep it. Why should I keep it? I have no right to it more than any one here. This was puzzling to all, till a little girl, not four years old, stood up and said, Put it in the box. Many voices seconded this excellent motion, and the master referred it to a show of hands; up went every hand in the school, most of the children showing both hands for a greater certainty, and the penny was put into the subscription-box amid cheers of animation and delight.

3. Immediately before the vacation in August, 1890, three boys plucked a few black currants, which had ripened on the play-ground wall; fruit and flowers being cultivated to exercise self-denial and refinement in the children. One of the boys kept to himself double the quantity which he vouchsafed to each of the other two, but gave a part to a fourth boy, who had seen the transaction, evidently to purchase his silence; but thinking this hopeless, he took back the gift, and struck the boy to give it up, remarking, that as he knew he would tell, he, the speaker, need not lose his berries into the bargain. They all confessed, and expressed their sorrow, except the striker, decidedly in all respects the most guilty, who maintained a bold and hardened countenance. The voice of the school was, however, merciful to them all, which so much affected the last-mentioned offender, that he burst into tears. A Clergyman, one of the Directors, was present, whose eye the boy caught, and instantly brushed away his tears, and joined in the hymn which was sung at the moment. He staid behind the rest, assiduously assisted the master to put away the things, a civility he never showed before, and begged to shake hands with him when he went away.

4. P. M. was brought to solemn trial before the whole school, for keeping up a penny of his weekly school fee. After the trial and award, which were both just and judicious, the teacher asked the school, How many of us have been tried now? A voice called out, J. H. has been tried. This was indignantly denied by J. H. The teacher turning to J. M., asked him if he had ever been tried? He hung his head and answered, Yes. What was it for? Master, do you not remember yourself? I do; but are you any the better of your trial and punishment? I've never stolen since, any how. What was your reason for not stealing? I listened to the thing in my breast, and that told me it was a crime.

J. M.'s offence had been, watching, all the time of school, a penny-piece which had been dropped under the stove, and secretly appropriating it when the school was dismissed. His confession bore that his first purpose was to buy bowls (marbles), but he felt so unhappy that he could not make up his mind to look upon what he should purchase, and formed the singular resolution to expend the money in something eatable, that he might get it out of his sight! This he did, and gave a share to a schoolfellow. He was asked whether his conscience did not upbraid him? He answered, It did not speak very loud at first; but I grew very unhappy, and was happier after I was tried and punished. His contrite tears moved the compassion of his numerous judges, who wished to have spared him; but this was not admissible in the circumstances, and a few pats on the hand was the form of corporal punishment allotted him. He was sorely tempted, for he confessed that he kept his eye on the penny-piece for two hours before he took it.

5. The following incident was communicated by a gentleman from England, Dr Harrison Black, who, in company with the Chevalier de Frasans, Judge of Assize under Charles X., witnessed the whole occurrence:—The Chevalier de Frasans being present, the master was suddenly called into the play-ground, in consequence of a cry that one boy had struck another on the forehead, so as to make the blood flow. All the children were immediately called in, and inquiry made as to who had been witness of the affair. Those who presented themselves were sent into an adjoining room, and the injured party desired to state his grievance. He simply said that T. B. had struck him with a spade (which had for a moment been left by a workman), and that he did not believe it had been done on purpose. The offending party being called, said, J. M. had told him he could not lift up the spade, and in trying to show that he could do it, the blow was given. The witnesses were called in, one by one, and gave their testimony with great clearness, particularly a little Quaker girl. They all corroborated the statement of the accused party.

The teacher then asked of the whole assembly of children what punishment ought to be awarded? The general cry was, Three palmies (i. e. three pats upon the palm of the hand), because that punishment had been a few days before awarded to H. S. But one boy rose, and exclaimed, No, that is not fair, for H. S. told a falsehood about the fault he had committed, and T. B. did not tell any falsehood.

The justice of this remark seemed to be generally understood; and part only of the punishment was determined on. The culprit was then reminded, that, although the blow had not been given intentionally, still he had broken a law which forbade all the children to touch the tools of the workmen, and was made sensible that the punishment was not inflicted because the teacher was angry, but because he, T. B., had broken a law. The truth of this the little offender fully acknowledged to the bystanders, as well as to his master and schoolfellows. The punishment actually inflicted was a gentle tap upon the hand.

Hereupon, a new and unexpected scene arose: the offended party, seeing that all around concurred in condemning the offender, cried out, I'll find a coachman's whip and lash him. This gave occasion to another appeal to the children as to the injustice of this threatened second punishment, and ended by the threatener being made sensible that all present were now against him. As a proof, he said, Don't be frightened, Tom, I'll not whip you or sell my father. It appeared that he had been so short a time in the school, as not to have become imbued with the governing principles of the place.

6. A little boy came to school with his hands covered with paint. He applied to the teacher's sister to aid him in his extremity, which she did effectually by dint of hot water and soap. He promised to reward her with a halfpenny, whenever he should get one. She, wishing to try him, asked him some days afterwards if he had forgot his promise? He answered, No, but that he had put the first halfpenny he had got into the poor's plate, at church. Having soon after got a halfpenny from a lady, he rung the teacher's house-bell, and gave the money to his creditor, who took it, but, after some days, restored it.

III. Proofs of the success of the system, in its fundamental principle of governing by Love, and not by Fear, and that consistently with the most perfect order and discipline.

1. The master one day intimated that he wanted a number of articles, of a kind which he enumerated, to illustrate the lessons. He was next day inundated with all sorts of odds and ends, every child bringing with him something—leather, feathers, cloth, silk, stones, wood, glass, &c.

2. Accidentally saying that he would come and visit his pupils at their own homes, and if he did, how would they entertain him, the question was answered by a burst of hospitality, and the number and variety of the articles of cheer enumerated were too much for his gravity. We observed, however, that whisky was not among the temptations offered him, in the competition for the preference of his company.

3. A parent came one day to the school, expressly to be satisfied on the puzzle, as he said it was to him, how a schoolmaster could render himself the object of love. His own was always the object of terror; and, instead of running to him when he appeared, he and his schoolmates went off in the opposite direction, with the greatest alertness. His boy, he said, runs to the master whenever he sees him, and is proud to come home and tell that he has shaken hands with Mr Wright; of whom, as well as Mrs Wright and Maggy, (the latter a worthy of three years old, the master's child, who sets an example to the whole school,) he never ceases to speak.

Mr Wright requested the inquirer to remain and see how he treated his scholars. He did so, and witnessed the kindness, the cheerfulness, and the fun which never flags, while he saw discipline and obedience at the same time. The children went to the play-ground, and to the amazement of the visitor, the teacher ran out, crying, Hare and hounds! Hare and hounds! taking the first character on himself. He was instantly pursued full cry by the whole pack round and round the play-ground: at last he was taken, and worried by an immense act of co-operation. In his extremity, he rang his hand-bell for school: instantly the hounds quitted their prey, rushed into school, the door being scarcely wide enough for them, and were, within a minute, as still as a rank of soldiers, seated in their gallery, and busy with the multiplication table. The visitor went away, with a shrug, muttering, Na, the like o' that I ne'er saw.

Many pages might be filled with anecdotes illustrative of the beneficial effects of the system, in preventing the numerous fears, follies, envyings, discontents, and prejudices, which render the lower classes so intractable. The superstitious fear of ghosts, witches, &c., is practically removed. A person informed Mr Wright that, as he was crossing the church-yard, not without the habitual dread which from his youth he could not separate from the place, he met a little girl of five years' old marching through, all alone. Was she not afraid? Not a bit: we learn at the Infant School that ghosts and all that is nonsense. All dirty, gross, destructive, selfish, and insolent habits are proscribed, and carefully prevented; and, above all, whisky is held up as the greatest of curses to society, and many a lesson is taught of its effects on both mind and body. The children heard, with much indignation, of a crowd in the street insulting a poor Turk, of some boys who teased an idiot, of the mob breaking windows on occasion of the illumination, and of the people maltreating the doctors for their kindness in trying to cure the cholera.

N.B. It is unnecessary to give examples of the Effect of Intellectual Practice, as there is less novelty in children being trained to acuteness and sagacity; and much of this is capable of exhibition to the public, which is not possible, on set occasions, with proofs of moral advancement. The results in this department, it may, however, be mentioned, are most satisfactory.

II.—LETTERS FROM THE PARENTS.

In order to ascertain that the effects of the moral training were not a mere show at school, Mr Wright was directed to write a circular note to a large proportion of the parents, requesting their opinion, in writing, of the improvement of their children attending the school, in learning, manners, affection, obedience, health, and happiness. Above thirty answers were received, of which we can only give a very few as specimens, which we do at random. The originals may be seen by any one who chooses, in Mr Wright's hands. It may in general be remarked that there is a striking agreement among them in a zealous readiness to express, in strong terms, their sense of and gratitude for the advantages their children enjoy at school, and the improvement of their own comfort in their intercourse with their children at home. The delight of the children in attending school, and affection for the teacher, are mentioned in most of them.

1. Dear Sir,—I can scarcely express to you how much my children have been benefited by your more than excellent mode of tuition. Whether the many improvements so perceptible in them proceeds from your own qualifications, or from the general system, I know not; but this I know, that before my children attended the Infant School, they were slow, dull, and unmanageable; they are now active, lively, and obedient.—I am, &c.

(Signed) JAMES FORBES.

2. Sir,—I received your letter regarding the opinion I had formed of my son's improvement at the Infant School. I beg leave to state, that it has exceeded my utmost expectation; and, in answer to your questions, the Infant School System, so far from alienating the affections of children to their parents, it increases them to a high degree, and makes them more obedient, and promotes greatly their health and happiness, and they are greatly benefited by the instructions they receive. I have also to return my sincere thanks for your kindness and indulgence to them.—I am, &c.

(Signed) E. GRAHAM.

3. Sir,—I have the pleasure to inform you that my child has improved in every respect. The affection of the child is not alienated from its parents: it is more affectionate and obedient. The health and happiness of the child is greatly improved and much benefited by the instructions received at the school.—I am, &c.

(Signed) JAMES FOGG.

4. Dear Sir,—It gives me great satisfaction to inform you of the rapid progress the child is making under your care; indeed, it is wonderful for so short a time. Owing to your excellent method, she has acquired a taste for learning she never could get at home. She has forgot her playthings, and if the day is so bad that she cannot go to school, she either sings us a song, tells us a story, or goes through part of her school exercises the best way she can by herself. She often mentions some part of scripture, although she is only five years old. I assure you, Sir, her love and respect for her master are great. I think, Sir, all this will give you pleasure to hear, and with good wishes for the improvement of the children, and thanks for what has already been done, I am, &c.

(Signed) CATHERINE ROBERTSON.

5. Sir,—I am really delighted with my son for his intelligence since he went under your tutorage; and I altogether approve of Mr Wilderspin's system of treating children, and, in my opinion, it is not only now, but in future years, it will be installed in his memory. And, you, Sir, I am convinced have done your duty, from the affection that he has towards you; for he is always speaking about Mr Wright, or giving us a recital of the useful information you give him; and so much I approve of the system, that I am going to send another boy of mine as soon as the days get a little longer, and please accept of our best thanks for your attention to our son.—I am, &c.

(Signed) THOMAS WATSON.

6. Sir,—With regard to our son's morals, we think them very much improved; for he has a true sense between right and wrong, and the greatness and goodness of God. His intellectual parts are as far advanced as we could expect in the time he has been at school, and we by no means think his affections alienated from us. As far as our judgment can direct us, we think it must be a great benefit to society. I am, &c.

(Signed) JAMES THOMSON.

Many of the other letters are both well written and worded, and all of them are interesting and satisfactory.

One day, says Menage, I had hold of one of Madame de Sevigné's hands betwixt both mine. Upon her drawing it away, M. Pelletier, standing by, said, Menage, that is the finest work which ever came from your hands.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A BUTTERFLY.

For the London Journal.

I HAVE outlived three score sunsets and ten. Summer is no more—and her warm honeyed breath I find no longer gently resisting the motion of my wings, and lifting me from the ground. The flowers, too, are dead—or dying now around me. The sunny beams, in which I floated as in a sea of gold, grow fainter every day, and every day the sun returns but for a shorter period. It is then time that I should lay my wings at rest, and that the holy sun, whose rays have been my life, should now withdraw me from this vegetable world—to dwell for ever in its realms of warmth and light.

Threescore days and ten!—a longer life than is vouchsafed to any of our favoured race. I am not vain—but yet I may surmise that the experience of such a life may not be without its use and moral for the world.

I can give little account of my birth and parentage. Conjecture is open—but spark-like is the light I could ever obtain on this immaterial question, though my mind was early turned to the inquiry by the impertinent question as to “who I was,” put to me by a fair but conceited tulip. Prompted by affection, I searched in every quarter for information, but little was my success, and the time lost was great: so much so, that, when I returned to my goddess with what I hoped might prove satisfactory information, I found her charms so greatly on the wane, that I began to wonder what had brought me thither, and so flew off again, humming a favourite air, “I am free, I am free!” And so the tulip lost her lover, and gained no information.*

But this is what I either remembered, or had heard of myself, before I was myself. When I first woke up, it was in a field of waving grass, and it must have been its angry war, as the wind levelled its proud crests to the earth, that woke me up. All was sweet around, and bright and sunny. But so soon as I found the use of my wings, and that I could remove from the uproar by their friendly aid, I pushed off, and settled in a more tranquil spot. Methought I had had a dream—a long and pleasant dream—of wandering among trees and over leaves—of living well and banqueting for ever, and that my life was one continual feast. Could this have been reality? no, it must have been a dream, for life is not quite all enjoyment. But after this, it seemed as if there came a blank—a dream within a dream—a helpless sleep, perchance. I thought I was alone, alive, but could not move; not dead, but yet no life was stirring in me. Perhaps—mysterious thought—I grew as grows the seed I’ve seen the gardener strew upon the ground. I may have been enclosed, like it, within a husk, and my wings have then burst forth like opening leaves!

Say, first, of life before, or life to be,
What can we reason but from what we see?

What strengthens me in this belief is, that one with whom I always was at enmity, did tell me once, but in scorn he said it, that he had seen me long before lying like a clod among the clods, rolled up in a shapeless, ugly mass. (The latter description can never have been true, but let it pass.) How many minutes’ labour have hypotheses, built on these slender foundations, cost my philosophic mind! One thing I learnt, however, by the incident—that is, to gain information even from the lips of an enemy.

In my career there has been much to puzzle me. Passing my days mostly in a region of flowers, I observed that there was one enormous creature who tended them continually: sometimes beings like himself would visit us, and stare about—and look upon the flowers; but in their stupid faces, I never could perceive the love which I bore to each flower. These beings are too big—they cannot see one hundredth part of what goes on around them. I have seen them poke their noses into a rose—and say “’twas sweet,”—but their gross senses cannot taste the intoxication of the odour of a flower—and then, like us, reel joyously above it till, overpowered with delight, they sink upon its bosom! The gardener I always liked (his huge size he could not help) for he really loved the garden—and long before the sun arose to shine upon the flower-beds and trees, he would come whistling down the walks. But will it be believed, that this superior being paid the respect of an inferior to the poor creatures who so seldom came to taste the fragrant breath of nature? I may be asked, how I know the tokens of respect and fear among men? Have I not hovered around the coils of the spider, when a poor fly has supplicated for life and liberty? and may it not be surmised that the subdued voice and humble look speak the same language with both man and fly?

* There seems hardly verisimilitude enough in the love between an insect and a flower, considering there are creatures more kindred to their nature. Yet our correspondent (besides the visits manifestly paid by a butterfly, and the phrase “love for flowers,” and what else the depth of his floral philosophy might say for it) has critical warrant in the Persian loves of the nightingale and the rose; and Dr Darwin was inclined to think that insects were portions of flowers let loose,—warmed into distinct life by an unusual glow of the vital spirit.—Ed.

It is but an unworthy task for an old butterfly—one o’er whom a long life has passed, and bleached the hair of his head even as the grass of the meadow is bleached by the sun’s rays—it is, I say, for one so sage, so ripe, so time-honoured, a ridiculous task to record the events of his youthful loves. But yet, in all candour, I confess that the recollection of those events fills me with delight (one excepted, which I shall narrate) as the recovery of some sense long lost. Yes, time has destroyed these things, as the plain of waving green was levelled by the scythe; but still how fragrant did the insipid grass become when lying dried, scattered, and dead—scattered by the spoiler, too, upon its own hearth! Such is the hallowed light thrown over the past: such are the uses of adversity.

I have already touched on the subject of my first amour, when my fair friend was too particular as to my pedigree. But there remains another to narrate, which, as I have known insects whose complexions changed with the colour of what they took for dinner, so, its progress and its end being luckless and unhappy, for ever after tinged my joyous nature with the dark hue of melancholy. My heart was wrapped in darkness. And yet, who could have read my feelings? How smooth my feathers still—how sleek and clean my feelers—my head how nicely powdered; and my wings—ah! who to have seen me pour the oily fluid on those well-formed limbs, could have presumed to think me wretched, and that concealment, like a worm in the bud, preyed on my heart?

I loved a lily (time was the thing was common, but now the papillon has spurned the fleur-de-lis). I found my love returned, and, for a time, things prospered gloriously. Hours went—returned—and still found me at her side. We lived but for each other. She said not much—what would you have a virgin say?—but then she looked so sweet! One luckless evening I was lured away, on some excursion, no matter where or wherefore. Oh, unhappy hour! on my return, I found a spider, a bloated wretch, had usurped my place. He now reigned triumphant, and the noxious cannibal had spread his fearful nets over that fair head which I most adored. In despair I fluttered away, almost sinking to the earth, cursing him—as only butterflies can curse—and hating her for her inconstancy. I consoled myself, however, with making this reflection,—that, to retain the female heart, you must watch over it as zealously as the miserly ant guards her ill-gotten grain.

It was not till sometime after this that I discovered how my passion had hurried me into indiscretion. In quitting Lily so precipitately, I had done her wrong, for I learned that the spider was but an unwelcome intruder, and would have forced her affections. To me she looked for succour, while I—mad fool!

How often have I since reflected that even flies cannot see everything, and that it behoves them to be very circumspect when other beings are concerned.

A joyous life I led of it too, for a long period before this. Fanned by the zephyr, courted by the rose, floating for hours in the sun-beam, bathing in the transparent softly-scented dew, watching every opening flower, and catching their first sweet breaths as they softly sighed forth life—these were but a few of my daily pleasures. With what delight I rocked upon the taper branches of the lavender, till sleep crept over me! And then came night, and with the night the moon, whose beams reflected strange unwonted beauty alike upon the plainest and the loveliest objects.

But now I come to the most fearful event of my troubled life. Near where I dwelt there lived a glow-worm, round whose cheering light a jovial set of us were wont to congregate o’ nights. A chattering knot were we, and often have we made the night gallop through her course to the music of our revels. When the club dispersed, I used to mount to my retirement aloft, and there gaze on the friendly lamp of my light-hearted friend, till I dropped asleep. One night I woke from dreams of these happy meetings—the merry notes of my mates rang in my ears—and I thought they were keeping it up without me, and accordingly determined to drop in upon their revels; but, strange to say, no light shone below, as was usual. I looked about, and at last perceived it above me. This was strange; but, without thinking, up I mounted. Higher still and higher, but no nearer did I approach. They are keeping it up, thought I, with a vengeance. I wonder where Master Snail got his wings to mount so high! Time flew on, and so did I, but it was of no avail: the enticing light was as distant as ever, and the malicious rogues were moving off as fast as I could move on. Meantime, the air grew colder, the zephyrs were cross, and handled me most roughly. I felt myself beating about in space, nor knew I where to fly. My heart failed me, and my strength was gone; and I had fallen back into the realms of darkness, had not the strong winds caught me in their arms and hurried me onwards, now a helpless victim, till I landed suddenly on the earth. Unhappy wretch, I had mistaken a star for the light I sought! and now, for punishment, I found myself a bruised wanderer in a land of strangers. Here, then, have I sojourned, unknown, uncared for.

Commiseration is dear to the heart of a fly; therefore have I put pen to paper, in the belief, that when dead, my tale will at least draw one tear from the well of grief springing in every heart. This hope will throw a glow over the sunset of my days. For, although neither gouty, nor flying with the aid of crutches, still I am very old—I feel it. My voice is weak in physical power; but, from my age, I think it intitled to be heard. If time is not at an end—if other butterflies should ever live to love, and to mistake an unapproachable for a friendly light—to them I leave this long memorial of my patriarchal days, now so near their closing. Here ends my task.

Here, too, ended his innocent life. One moment sufficed him to die, whose creation had been the miracle of months. The butterfly is dead, “his wings are at rest,” his bright eye shall no more be dimmed by a passing cloud—his pure loving heart no longer be vexed at the puzzles of insect life—nor his bones rattle in the cold blast of coming Autumn.

PSYCHOPHILUS.

A Pleasant Ensign of the Guards.—La Calprenede (afterwards the writer of the old celebrated French romances, ‘Cleopatra,’ ‘Cassandra,’ &c.), was an Ensign in the Guards, and when he was upon duty at Court, used to get up into the apartments, and there soon get an audience about him by the agreeable knack he had of telling stories. The Court ladies and maids of honour were often among his hearers. The Queen, one day, reprimanded her women, that of late they seemed all at once to have entered into a combination to neglect their duty, upon which one of them answered, “That there was a new Ensign who came up into the ante-chamber, and told such delightful stories, that there was no leaving him.” This raised the Princess’s curiosity, and she was so taken with him, that she added a pretty pension to his pay.

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 12th, to Tuesday the 18th November.

HONEY-COMBS AND WAX-LIGHTS.

We did wrong the other day to say that the flowers were all going, for, not to mention the present mild season, which has wonderfully retained the beauties both of our woods and gardens, it is ungrateful and monstrous in us to forget that there are flowers of some sort all the year round, or nearly so, especially the most beautiful of all flowers—the rose, which Nature seems to love so fondly as to be unable to part with it. You may see cottages still covered with it all over, like household smiles.

Even of the flowers that have gone, we possess the results, and we should not forget to see their floral elements in those. The other night we were sitting at a friend's house amidst wax-candles, and thought how busy those little fairies, the bees, had been in making them for us, bringing, with mysterious efficacy, out of the flimsiest beauty, a beauty so solid. Wax-lights, though we are accustomed to over-look the fact, and rank them with ordinary common-places, are true fairy tapers,—a white metamorphosis from the flowers, crowned with the most intangible of all visible mysteries—fire.

Then there is honey, which a Greek poet would have called the sister of wax,—a thing as beautiful to eat as the other is to look upon, and beautiful to look upon too. What two extraordinary substances to be made, by little winged creatures, out of roses and lilies! What a singular and lovely energy in Nature to impel those little creatures thus to fetch out the sweet and elegant properties of the coloured fragrances of the gardens, and serve them up to us for food and light!—honey to eat, and waxen tapers to eat it by! What more graceful repast could be imagined on one of the fairy tables made by Vulcan, which moved of their own accord, and came gliding, when he wanted a luncheon, to the side of Apollo!—the honey golden as his lyre, and the wax fair as his shoulders. Doubtless he hath eaten of it many a time, chatting with Hebe before some Olympian concert, and as he talked in an under-tone, served as the bees', the bass-strings of his lyre murmured as they.

Let honey then be on our November breakfast-table, reminding us of the flowers, and let us have a good and intire account of the nature of it out of the pages of Dr Bevan.

Honey is a well-known, sweet, tenacious substance, which, in fine weather, is continually secreting in the nectaries of flowers, chiefly from certain vesicles or glands situated near the basis of every petal, from whence it is collected by bees and other insects. The domestic honey-bees consume a portion of this honey for food, at or near the time of gathering; but the principal part is regurgitated, and poured into the cell of the hive, for the use of the community in winter. So very abundant are these collections in favourable seasons, as to afford to the apiarian an extensive share of them, without distressing the provident hoarders. Mr Wildman states that, in the year 1789, he purchased a glass filled with exceedingly fine honey-comb, weighing 63 pounds, which had been collected within a month; and that the hive which it had surmounted still contained a full supply for the winter's consumption for the bees. This, however, was an unusual quantity; a hive, or box, of the dimensions recommended in this work, may be considered as well stocked when it yields from 30 to 40 pounds of honey.

The honey intended for early use, and for the nursing bees and drones, is deposited in cells which are allowed to remain open, and is, probably, of an inferior sort; whilst the finest honey, which is laid up in store for winter, is placed in the most inaccessible parts of the hive, and closed in the cells with waxen lids.

There, clustered now, clear wells of nectar glow,
Like amber drops that sparkle in the Po,
And now (so quick the change), ere one short moon
Shrinks with waned crescent 'mid the blaze of noon,
All veiled from view, these amber drops are lost,
And each clear well with waxen crown embost.

In the 'Philosophical Transactions for 1792,' Mr Hunter has stated that, whatever time the contents of the honey-bags may be retained, they still remain pure and unaltered by the digestive powers. Mr Polhill, a gentleman to whom the public are indebted for several articles in 'Rees's Cyclopædia' appertaining to bees, is also of this opinion. Messrs

Kirby and Spence do not admit this statement; as the nectar of flowers is not of so thick a consistence as honey, they think it must undergo some change in the stomach of the bee. This opinion is strengthened by what has been stated by Reaumur: he observed that, if there was a deficiency of flowers at the season of honey-gathering, and the bees were furnished with sugar, they filled their cells with honey, differing in no other respect from honey collected in the usual way but in its possessing a somewhat higher flavour, and in its never candying, nor ever losing the fluidity by long keeping. The same will be observed when they imbibe the juices of sweet fruits, for bees do not confine themselves solely to flowers and honey-dewed leaves; they will sometimes very greedily absorb the juice of raspberries, for instance, and thus spoil them for the table; they also visit, in crowds, the vats of the cider and wine-maker.

Reaumur has likewise remarked that, in each honey-cell, there is a cream-like layer covering, of a thicker consistence than the honey itself, which apparently serves to retain the more liquid collections that may from time to time be introduced under it. Messrs Kirby and Spence say that, if honey were the unaltered nectar of flowers, it would be difficult to conceive how this cream could be collected in proper proportions. This observation is made in consequence of their presuming that some of this cream-like covering is conveyed into the cells with each deposition of fresh honey, and it has been supposed, that 'this' cream was the last portion disgorged. According to an article in 'Rees's Cyclopædia,' probably written by Mr Polhill, this cream-like matter is formed at the very first, and every addition of honey is deposited beneath it. The bee, entering into the cell as deeply as possible, puts forward its anterior pair of legs, and with them pierces a hole through the crust, or cream; while this hole is kept open by the feet, the bee disgorges the honey, in large drops, from its mouth; these, falling into the hole, mix with the whole mass below; the bee, before it flies off, new models the crust, and closes up the hole. This mode of proceeding is regularly adopted by every bee that contributes to the general store.

The power of regurgitation in the bee is very remarkable: its alimentary organs, like those of the pigeon, besides being subservient to the purpose of nutriment, afford it a temporary store-room or reservoir. Ruminating animals may be considered as regurgitating animals, though in them the operation is performed for different purposes. In some, it is exercised for the purpose of digesting the food—in others, for feeding the young; but in bees, its use is to enable them to disburden themselves of the honey which they gather for the winter's store of the community.

The finest flavoured and most delicate honey is that which is collected from aromatic plants, and has been stored in clean new cells: it has been usually called virgin-honey, as though it were elaborated by a fresh swarm of bees; but this is not essential to the perfection of honey; for, provided the cells in which it is deposited have never contained either brood or farina, it is not material whether it have been collected by swarms or by old stocks: the season and the flowers having been the same, the quality of the honey will, in both cases, be alike. F. Lamberti asserts, that the best honey in the world is produced in Pontus, and that its superiority is attributable to the greater quantity of balm growing there. In this quarter of the world the Narbonne honey is regarded as the finest, owing to the rosemary which abounds in the neighbourhood of Narbonne. "The honey, for which Narbonne is so deservedly celebrated, is every year diminishing. Bees have ceased to be an object of attention to the peasantry; they now devote their time to the vineyards, and neglect the bees. The flowers of the wild plants in the neighbourhood of Narbonne are highly aromatic, and give the flavour which is peculiar to its honey: this peculiarity is attributed exclusively to the wild rosemary, Rosmarinus officinalis."—('Dappe's Miscellaneous Observations and Opinions on the Continent, 1825.') Attempts are said to have been made to imitate Narbonne honey, by adding to other honey an infusion of rosemary flowers.

Of the power which some flowers possess of imparting deleterious qualities to their honey, I have already spoken in the chapter on pasturage. I will here add, however, what has been said of the appearance of the pernicious kind of honey. It is usually distinguished from what is innocent, by its crimson or reddish brown colour, its better flavour, and thicker consistence; but in Florida and Carolina, it is so similar, in all respects, to innocent honey, that the hunters depend upon experience only, and, knowing that bad honey soon shows its effect, they at first eat very sparingly. The converse of this would appear in the blood-red honey found by Mr Bruce at Dixon, in Abyssinia, to which he ascribes no evil properties. ('Travels to the Nile,' vol. v.) Linnaeus informs us, that, in Sweden, the honey of autumn is principally gathered from the flowers of the erica or heath, and that it has a reddish cast. The honey of our native heaths is also of the same colour. Dr Barton has observed that, during his residence at Edinburgh, the Highland honey was often of a dirty brownish colour, which was supposed to be given to it by the "blooming heather," as Burns calls it; the people of Edinburgh, however, though great consumers of it, never complain of any ill-effects from it. It produced upon the Doctor a soporific effect. The most innocent honey will often disagree with those who take it in large quantities, or who have irritable bowels. The mischievous qualities of honey have been said to be destroyed by boiling and straining, or even by long keeping only; yet when made into methueglin it has been found as deleterious as ever.

The quality of honey varies with the time of gathering, and that, even, though the whole season may have been favourable. The collection at the commencement of summer is regarded as the prime honey of the year, the flowers being then most abundant, and in the full glow of health; and that which is collected in spring is superior to the gleanings of autumn.

Heber states that the secretion of honey and the formation of wax are singularly promoted by electricity: hence the works may always be observed to advance rapidly when there is a southerly wind, a moist warm air, and an impending storm; whereas the secretion is impeded and sometimes suspended, by long protracted droughts, cold rains, and a northerly wind.

Prime honey is of a whitish colour, an agreeable smell, a pleasant taste, and a thick consistence. When taken from the combs it is in a fluid state, but gradually thickens by age, and in cold weather, if genuine, becomes firm and solid. In England, it has seldom, if ever, been known to assume this solid state while in the hives; and even out of them, if it remain in the combs, it will preserve its clearness, purity, and fine flavour, for at least a year. The honey of tropical climates is always in a fluid state.

Much of the fine flavour of honey will depend on the manner of its separation from the comb. That will be the most delicate which flows spontaneously from the purest and whitest combs; the next in excellence will be that which is expressed without heat; and the coarsest, that which is obtained by the aid of heat and pressure.

Care should be taken in the selection of the vessels used for storing honey; the most appropriate are jars of stone ware, called Bristol ware. The principal constituents of sugar and honey are the same, viz. hydrogen, carbon, and oxygen. Besides these, their common elements, honey contains mucilage and extractive matter, and also an excess of oxygen: in plain English, honey possesses a greater portion of acid than is contained in sugar, and in a state more capable of acting upon those bodies with which it comes in contact. From this arises the reason for my recommending stone jars for its preservation: the acid of the honey, acting upon the lead with which every other kind of earthen ware is glazed, causes the honey to receive an impregnation from it, which may prove injurious to those whose constitutions are delicate; the stone ware, being glazed with common salt, cannot communicate any injurious property to the honey which is stored in it. Honey should be kept in a cool and dry situation, as warmth promotes fermentation and generates a sensible acidity. The circumstance of honey, when separated from the combs and put into jars, being disposed to ferment in a temperature much below the usual heat of the hive, is calculated to excite our admiration of the instinctive intelligence of the bee, which leads it to distribute its treasure in small cells and to seal them closely over, whereby the honey can be preserved from fermentation for a long period, even in a high temperature. The Jews of Moldavia and the Ukraine, prepare from honey a sort of sugar, which is solid, and as white as snow, which they send to the distilleries at Dantzic. They expose the honey to frost for three weeks, in some places where neither sun nor snow can reach it, and in a vessel which is a bad conductor of caloric, by which process, the honey, without being congealed, becomes clear and hard like sugar.

Prior to the discovery of sugar, honey must have been an article of great utility; and, notwithstanding that discovery, if we may judge from the quantity imported into this country, and the price at which it sells when of fine quality, it may still be regarded as a commodity of great importance, and worthy of more attention from our rural population than it generally obtains. In the Ukraine, some of the peasants have four or five hundred hives each, and find their bees more profitable than their corn. This is a number, however, which, I should think, would overstock most districts, and which could only be supported naturally by having recourse to transportation. This seems to be evinced by the inhabitants of Egypt, France, Savoy, Piedmont, and other places availing themselves of that practice, as already stated.

The most productive parts of this kingdom, in all probability, are the borders of Cambridgeshire, Hertfordshire, and part of Hampshire, which, abounding in heaths, commons, and woods, afford so much pabulum for bees, as to enable some of the farmers to have from 100 to 150 stocks of them, the largest number that I have ever heard of in this kingdom.

On the subject of overstocking, M. Espinasse says, that few parts of England which he has visited afford flowers in sufficient profusion and of sufficient variety to support numerous colonies. "In the village," says he, "where my house is situated, many persons, induced by my example, produced bees; they were too numerous for what was to feed them; more than one half of them died in the ensuing winter, and nearly one third of my own were with difficulty saved with feeding." The proprietor of bees may know whether or not his situation is overstocked, if he will attend to the produce of his apiary for several years together.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

THE author of the 'Lounger's Common-Place Book' says there have been two songs written on the following adventure, but that they are bad. We have an impression upon our memory, that we have seen a good song upon it, though we cannot remember where,—probably in Mr Allan Cunningham's collection of the Songs of Scotland. We should be obliged to any correspondent who could find it for us. The subject, one would think, is too affectingly true, not to have called forth some corresponding strain.

Adam Fleming, the son of a little farmer, during the reign of Mary, inheriting from nature an attractive person and a vigorous mind, and receiving, from the kindness of a maternal uncle an education superior to what is generally bestowed on persons of his rank in society, had won the affections of a beautiful and wealthy heiress in the shire of Dumfries. But, as it seldom happens that we can enjoy any pleasure or any happiness without exciting envy or discontent in those who are less fortunate or less deserving, the preference given to Fleming by Helena Irving, before a host of visitors, excited in one of the disappointed candidates inveterate malignity, and vows of vengeance. Observing that a favourite evening walk of the lovers was on the banks of the Kirtle, a romantic little stream, skirted with shrubs and overhanging rocks, flowing in a serpentine course near the Abbey of Kirkconnel, the villain procured a carbine, and at their accustomed hour concealed himself in a thicket near the place. The fond pair soon approaching, he levelled the instrument of death at his unsuspecting rival; but occasioning, as he moved, a rustling of the leaves, Helena turned quickly round, saw his deadly purpose, and defeated it by throwing herself before her lover; but, in preserving him, she received the contents of the gun in her own bosom, and sunk a bloody and lifeless corse into his arms.

Neither love nor justice admitted a moment's delay: placing his murdered mistress gently on a bank, Adam pursued the flying, the cowardly assassin with the fury of a hungry lion; soon overtook him, and seizing the merciless ruffian by the hair of his head, planted a dagger in his heart. The report of the piece, and the cries of the dastardly fugitive drawing several peasants to the spot, Fleming, instead of submitting his conduct to the justice of his country, which must have considered it as a justifiable homicide, and without well knowing what he sought, fled towards the sea-coast, where he saw a vessel outward bound; throwing himself into a boat, he went on board, made a confidant of the captain, and sailed with him to Lisbon.

Careless of life, and probably wishing to shorten it, he entered into the service of the king of Portugal, and distinguished himself, in a military capacity, at some of the distant possessions of that monarch, in the Brazilia. Receiving, after many years, ample rewards, and an honourable dismissal, he resolved, in the spirit of the times, to expiate the crime of a murder, to which he received such urgent provocation, but for which he could not forgive himself, by a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. Having accomplished his purpose, he was anxious to pass the short space of life which remained in his native country; trusting for safety to the mercy or oblivion of his former neighbours. Soon after landing in Scotland, he determined to visit the spot where his beloved, his long-lost Helena was interred: worn down by years, sorrow, and the toils of war, and naturally agitated by recollecting the circumstances, and viewing the place of her death, his debilitated frame was not equal to such emotion: reaching with difficulty her tomb in the chapel of Kirkconnel, he sunk on the earth which covered her remains, and expired without a groan.

This little narrative, which the scrupulous critic may consider as the romantic fiction of a novelist, is founded on fact, supported by the evidence of authentic family documents in the possession of a worthy baronet, who resides near the spot, and corroborated by the remains of a monumental inscription in the chapel, which is now in ruins.

HORTENSIVS.

[A full-blown specimen of the ornate, insincere, prosperous, luxurious, and splendid-living Roman orator; with the vicissitude which his family experienced. From Mr Dunlop's 'History of Roman Literature.']

This celebrated orator was born in the year 640, being then ten years younger than Cotta and Sulpicius. His first appearance at the bar was at the early age of nineteen—that is, in 659: and his excellence, says Cicero, was immediately acknowledged,—like that of a statue by Phidias, which only requires to be seen in order to be admired. The case in which he appeared was one of considerable responsibility for one so young and inexperienced, being an accusation, at the instance of the Roman province of Africa, against its governors, for rapacity. It was heard before Scœvola and Crassus, as judges—the one the ablest lawyer, the other the most accomplished speaker of his age; and the young orator had the good fortune to obtain their approbation, as well as that of all who were present at the trial. His next pleading of importance was in behalf of Nicomedes, King of Bithynia, in which he even surpassed his former speech for the Africans. After this we hear little of him for several years. The imminent perils of the Social War, which broke out in 663, interrupted, in a great measure, the business of the Forum. Hortensius served in this alarming contest for one year as a volunteer, and in the following season as a military tribune. When, on the re-establishment of peace in Italy, in 666, he returned to Rome, and resumed the more peaceful avocations to which he had been destined from his youth, he found himself without a rival. Crassus, as we have seen, died in 662, before the troubles of Marius and Sylla. Antony, with other orators of inferior note, perished in 666, during the temporary and last ascendancy of Marius, in the absence of Sylla. Sulpicius was put to death in the same year, and Cotta driven into banishment, from which he was not recalled until the return of Sylla to Rome, and his election to the dictatorship, in 670. Hortensius was then left for some years without a competitor, and, after 670, with none of eminence but Cotta, whom also he soon outshone. His splendid, warm, and animated manner, was preferred to the calm and easy elegance of his rival. Accordingly, when engaged in a cause on the same side, Cotta, then ten years senior, was employed to open the case, while the more important parts were left to the management of Hortensius. He continued the undisputed sovereign of the Forum, till Cicero returned to his quartership in Sicily, in 689, where the talents of that orator first displayed themselves in full perfection and maturity. Hortensius was thus, from 666 till 679, at the head of the Roman bar; and being, in consequence, engaged, during that long period, on one side or other, in every cause of importance, he soon amassed a prodigious fortune. He lived, too, with a magnificence corresponding to his wealth. An example of splendour and luxury had been set to him by the orator Crassus, who inhabited a sumptuous palace in Rome, the hall of which was adorned with pillars of Hymettian marble, twelve feet high, which he brought to Rome in his ædileship, at a time when there were no pillars of foreign marble even in the public buildings. The court of this mansion was particularly ornamented by six lotus trees, which Pliny saw in full luxuriance in his youth, but which were afterwards burned in the conflagration in the time of Nero. He had also a number of vases, and two drinking cups, engraved by the artist, Mentor, but which were of such immense value that he was ashamed to use them. Hortensius had the same tastes as Crassus, but he surpassed him and all his contemporaries in magnificence. His house at Rome, which was splendidly furnished, formed the centre of the chief imperial palace, which increased from the time of Augustus to that of Nero, till it nearly covered the whole Palatine Mount, and branched over other hills. Besides his mansion in the capitol, he possessed sumptuous villas at Tusculum, Bauli, and Laurentum, where he was accustomed to give the most elegant and expensive entertainments. He had frequently peacocks at his banquets, which he first served up at a grand augural feast, and which, says Varro, were more commended by the luxurious than by men of probity and austerity. His olive plantations, he is said to have regularly moistened and bedewed with wine; and, on one occasion, during the hearing of an important cause, in which he was engaged along with Cicero, begged that he would change with him the previously arranged order of pleading, as he was obliged to go to the country to pour wine on a favourite platanus, which grew near his Tusculan villa. Notwithstanding this profusion, his heir found not less than 10,000 casks of wine in his cellar, after his death. Besides his taste for wine and fondness for plantations, he indulged a passion for pictures and fish-ponds. At his Tusculan villa, he built a hall for the reception of a painting of the expedition of the Argonauts, by the painter Cydias, which cost the enormous sum of one hundred and forty-four thousand sesterces. At his country seat, near Bauli, on the sea-shore, he vied with Lucullus and Philippus in the extent of his fish-ponds, which were constructed at immense cost, and so formed that the tide flowed into them. Under the promontory of Bauli, travellers are yet shown the Fiscina Mirabilis, a subterraneous edifice, vaulted and divided by four rows of arcades, and which is supposed by some antiquaries to have been a fish-pond of Hortensius. Yet, such was his luxury, and his reluctance to diminish his supply, that when he gave entertainments at Bauli, he generally sent to the neighbouring town of Puteoli, to buy fish for supper. He had a vast number of fishermen in his service, and paid so much attention to the feeding of his fish, that he had always ready a large stock of small fish to be devoured by the great ones. It was with the utmost difficulty he could be persuaded to part with any of them; and Varro declares that a friend could more easily get his chariot-mules out of his stable, than a mullet from his ponds. He was more anxious about the welfare of his fish than the health of his slaves, and less solicitous that a sick servant might not take what was unfit for him, than that his fish might not drink water which was unwholesome. It is even said that he was so passionately fond of a particular lamprey, that he shed tears for its untimely death.

The gallery at the villa, which was situated on the little promontory of Bauli, and looking towards Puteoli, commanded one of the most delightful views in Italy. The inland prospect, towards Cumæ, was magnificent and extensive. Puteoli was seen along the shore at the distance of thirty stadia, in the direction of Pompeii; and Pompeii itself was invisible only from its distance. The sea view was unbounded; it was enlivened by the numerous vessels sailing across the bay, and the ever changeful hue of its waters, now saffron, azure, or purple, according as the breeze blew, or the sun ascended or declined.

Hortensius's villa at Laurentum, which also commanded a distant prospect of the sea, rivalled, in its sylvan pomp, the marine luxuries of Bauli. This mansion lay between Ostia and Lavinium, near the spot where the town of Paterno now stands, and contiguous to the still more celebrated residence afterwards possessed by the younger Pliny. Around were the walks and gardens of patrician villas; on one side was the village of Laurentum, with its public baths; on the other, but at a greater distance, the town of Ostia. Near the house were groves, and fields covered with herds—beyond were hills clothed with woods, and magnificent mountains bounded the horizon.

Hortensius had here a wooded park of fifty acres, encompassed with a wall. This enclosure he called a nursery of wild beasts, all of which came for their provender at a certain hour, on the blowing of a horn, an exhibition with which he was accustomed to amuse the guests who visited him at his Laurentian villa. Varro mentioned an entertainment where those invited supped upon an eminence, called a Triclinium, in this sylvan park. During the repast, Hortensius summoned his Orpheus, who, having come with his musical instruments, and being ordered to display his talents, blew a trumpet, when such a multitude of deer, boars, and other quadrupeds rushed to the spot from all quarters, that the sight appeared to the delighted spectators as beautiful as the courses with wild animals in the great circus of the Ædiles.

The elegance of Hortensius procured him not only all this wealth and luxury, but the highest official honours of the state. He was Ædile in 679, Prætor in 682, and Consul two years afterwards. The wealth and dignities he had obtained, and the want of competition, made him gradually relax from that assiduity by which they had been acquired, till the increasing fame of Cicero, and particularly the glory of his consulship, stimulated him to renew his exertions. But his habits of labour had been in some degree lost, and he never again recovered his former reputation. Cicero partly accounts for this decline, from the peculiar nature and genius of his eloquence. It was of that showy species called Asiatic, which flourished in the Greek colonies of Asia Minor, and was infinitely more florid and ornamental than the oratory of Athens, or even Rhodes, being full of brilliant thoughts and sparkling expressions. This glowing style of rhetoric, though deficient in solidity and weight, was not unsuitable to a young man; and being further recommended by a beautiful cadence of periods, met with the utmost applause. But Hortensius, as he advanced in life, did not correct this exuberance, nor adopt a chaster eloquence; and this luxury and glitter of phraseology, which, even in his earliest years, had occasionally excited ridicule or disgust among the graver fathers of the senatorial order, being totally inconsistent with his advanced age and consular dignity, which required something more serious and composed, his reputation diminished with increase of years; and though the bloom of his eloquence might be in fact the same, it appeared to be somewhat withered. Besides, from his declining health and strength, which greatly failed in his latter years, he may not have been able to have given full effect to that showy species of rhetoric in which he indulged. A constant tooth-ache and swellings in the jaws, greatly impaired his power of elocution and utterance, and became at length so severe as to accelerate his end.

A few months, however, before his death, which happened in 703, he pleaded for his nephew, Messala, who was accused of illegal canvassing, and who was acquitted, more in consequence of the astonishing exertions of his advocate than the justice of his cause. So unfavourable, indeed, was his case esteemed, that, however much the speech of Hortensius had been admired, he was received, on entering the theatre of Curio the following day, with loud clamour and hisses, which were the more remarked, as he had never met with similar treatment in the whole course of his forensic career. The speech, however, revived all the ancient admiration of the public for his oratorical talents, and convinced them, that if he had always possessed the same perseverance as Cicero, he would not have ranked second to that orator. Another of his most celebrated harangues was that against the Manilian law, which vested Pompey with such extraordinary powers, and was so warmly supported by Cicero. That against the sumptuary law, proposed by Crassus and Pompey, in the year 683, which tended to restrain the indulgence of his own taste, was well adapted to Hortensius's style of eloquence; and his speech was highly characteristic of his disposition and habits of life. He declaimed, at great length, on the glory of Rome, which required splendour in the mode of living followed by its citizens. He frequently glanced at the luxury of the consuls themselves, and forced them, at length, by his eloquence and sarcastic declamation, to relinquish their scheme of domestic retrenchment.

The speeches of Hortensius, it has been already mentioned, lost part of their effect, by the orator's advance in years, but they suffered still more by being transferred to writing. As his chief excellence consisted in action and delivery, his writings were much inferior to what was expected from the high fame he had enjoyed; and, accordingly, after death, he retained little of that esteem which he had so abundantly possessed during his life. Although, therefore, his orations had been preserved, they would have given us but an imperfect idea of the eloquence of Hortensius; but even this aid has been denied us; and we must now, therefore, chiefly trust for his oratorical character to the opinion of his great but unprejudiced rival. It was by means of Hortensius that Cicero was chosen one of the College of Augurs,—a service of which his gratified vanity ever appears to have retained an agreeable recollection. In a few of his letters, indeed, written during the despondency of his exile, he hints a suspicion that Hortensius had been instrumental in his banishment, with a view of engrossing to himself the whole glory of the bar; but this mistrust ended with his recall, which Hortensius, though originally he had advised him to yield to the storm, urged on with all the influence of which he was possessed. Hortensius also appears to have been free from every feeling of jealousy or envy, which in him was still more creditable, as his rival was younger than himself, and yet ultimately forced him from the supremacy. Such having been their sentiments of mutual esteem, Cicero has done his oratoric talents ample justice, representing him as endued with all the qualities necessary to form a distinguished speaker. His imagination was fertile—his voice was sweet and harmonious—his demeanour dignified—his language rich and elegant—his acquaintance with literature extensive. So prodigious was his memory, that, without the aid of writing, he recollected every word he had meditated, and every sentence of his adversary's oration, even to the titles and documents brought forward to support the case against him—a faculty which greatly aided his peculiarly happy art of recapitulating the substance of what had been said by his antagonist or by himself.* He also originally possessed an indefatigable application; and scarcely a day passed in which he did not speak in the Forum, or exercise himself in forensic studies or preparation. But, of all the various arts of oratory, he most remarkably excelled in a happy and perspicuous arrangement of his subject. Cicero only slightly approaches him with showing more study and art in his gestures than was necessary for an orator. It appears, however, from Macrobius, that he was much ridiculed by his contemporaries, on account of his affected gestures. In pleading, his hands were constantly in motion, whence he was often attacked by his adversaries in the Forum for resembling an actor; and, on one occasion he received from his opponent the appellation of Dionysia, which was the name of a celebrated dancing girl. Æsop and Roscius frequently attended his pleadings, to catch his gestures, and imitate them on the stage. Such, indeed, was his exertion in action, that it was commonly said, that it could not be determined whether the people went to hear or to see him. Like Demosthenes, he chose and put on his dress with the most studied care and neatness. He is said, not only to have prepared his attitudes, but also to have adjusted the plaits of his gown before a mirror, when about to issue forth to the Forum; and to have taken no less care in arranging them than in moulding the periods of his discourse. He so tucked up his gown, that the folds did not fall by chance, but were formed with great care by the help of a knot artfully tied, and concealed by the plies of his robe, which apparently flowed carelessly around him. Macrobius also records a story of his instituting an action of damages against a person who had jostled him, while walking in this elaborate dress, and had ruffled his toga, when he was about to appear in public with his drapery adjusted according to the happiest arrangement,—an anecdote which, whether true or false, shows, by its currency, the opinion entertained of his final attention to everything that concerned the elegance of his attire, or the gracefulness of his figure and attitudes. This appears to have been the only blemish in his oratorical character; and the only stain on his moral conduct was, his practice of corrupting the judges in the causes in which he was employed, a practice which must be, in a great measure, imputed to the effects of the judicial system at Rome; for, whatever might be the excellence of the Roman laws, nothing could be worse than the procedure under which they were administered.

Hortensius was first married to a daughter of Q. Catullus, the orator, who is one of the speakers in the dialogue De Oratore (Cicero, De Oratore, Lib. III. c. 61). He afterwards asked, and obtained from Cato, the loan of his wife Marcia; who, having succeeded to a great part of the wealth of Hortensius after his death, was then taken back by her former husband (Plutarch, In Catone). By his first wife Hortensius had a son and daughter. In his son, Quintus, he was not more fortunate than his rival, Cicero, in his son Marcus. Cicero, while pro-consul of Cilicia, mentions in one of his letters, the ruffian and scandalous appearance made by the younger Hortensius at Laodicea, during the shows of gladiators. I invited him once to supper, says he, on his father's account; and, on the same account, only once. (Epist. Ad Attic. Lib. VI. Epist. 3.) Such, indeed, was his unworthy conduct, that his father, at this time, entertained thoughts of disinheriting him, and making his nephew Messala his heir; but in this intention he did not persevere. (Valer. Maxim. Lib. IV. c. 9.) After his father's death, he joined the party of Cæsar (Cicero, Epist. Ad Attic. Lib. X. Epist. 16, 17, 18.), by whom he was appointed pro-consul of Macedonia; in which situation he espoused the side of the conspirators, after the assassination of Cæsar. (Cicero, Philipp. X. c. 5 and 6.) By order of Brutus, he slew Caius Antonius, brother to the Triumvir, who had fallen into his hands; and, being afterwards taken prisoner at the battle of Philippi, he was slain by Marc Antony, by way of reprisal, on the tomb of his brother. (Plutarch, In M. Bruto.) Hortensia, the daughter, inherited something of the spirit and eloquence of her father. A severe tribute having been imposed on the Roman matrons by the Triumvirs, Antony, Octavius, and Lepidus, she boldly pleaded their cause before these noted extortioners, and obtained some alleviation of the impost. (Valer. Maxim. Lib. VIII. c. 3.) Quintus, the son of the orator, left two children, Q. Hortensius Corbio, and M. Hortensius Hortalus. The former of these was a monster of debauchery, and is mentioned by Valerius Maximus among the most striking examples of those descendants who have degenerated from the honour of their ancestors. (Lib. III. c. 3.) This wretch, not being likely to become a father, and the wealth of the family having been partly settled on the wife of Cato, partly dissipated by extravagance, and partly confiscated in the civil wars, Augustus Cæsar, who was a great promoter of matrimony, gave Hortensius Hortalus a pecuniary allowance to enable him to marry, in order that so illustrious a family might not become extinct. He and his children, however, fell into want during the reign of his benefactor's successor. Tacitus has painted, with his usual power of striking delineation, that humiliating scene, in which he appeared with his four children to beg relief from the senate; and the historian has also recorded the hard answer which he received from the unrelenting Tiberius. Perceiving, however, that his severity was disliked by the senate, the Emperor said that, if they desired it, he would give a certain sum to each of Hortalus's male children. They returned thanks; but, Hortalus, either from terror or dignity of mind, said not a word; and from this time, Tiberius showing him no favour, his family sunk into the most abject poverty. (Tacit. Annal. Lib. II. c. 37 and 38.) And such were the descendants of the orator with the park, the plantations, the ponds, and the pictures!

PREJUDICE.

For the London Journal.

To hate a man, and look upon him with suspicion, for no other reason but that he belongs to or was born in some particular country, betrays a narrow and prejudiced mind; yet how often do we hear men who are accounted wise and learned avow an aversion to an individual, without being able to assign any reason for so doing, other than the one just mentioned. Though these gentlemen may be ever so prepossessed in favour of a stranger before he has spoken, let him but wag his tongue, and if his speech denotes him belonging to a country to which they have an antipathy, the charm is broken, and they immediately turn their backs upon him. This prejudice is generally very prevalent among those who have moved but in a limited sphere,—who have never by travelling and reflection been able to rub off the rust of illiberalism that is so apt to incrust the soul. The Scottish Lowlander turns up his nose and thinks himself superior to the Highlander; the Englishman fancies himself a cut above the Scotchman, whom he considers servile and mean; and the American is never tired of cracking his jokes upon John Bull, who in return holds the Yankee in utter contempt.

Two reasons may be assigned for this illiberal conduct in the family of man. These are past outrages and climate. By past outrages we mean the cruel wars that it was customary in bygone times for one nation to wage with another; and the consequent devastations and crimes which caused the posterity of each country to grow up with the idea that the other was its "natural enemy." Thank heaven! these stormy times are over; the sun of civilization is beaming upon the minds of men, but still their hearts are not yet sufficiently warmed towards each other—the prejudices of their forefathers still exist among them, and dwell in their bosoms like the waves of the ocean after a storm.

The second cause is climate. In a country which is favoured by nature with every luxury the earth produces, where the ground yields spontaneously all that the appetite requires, and where few necessities exist to act as stimulants upon the minds of the inhabitants, they are apt to become slothful and indolent. On the other hand, the natives of a cold climate and comparatively barren soil, who are continually compelled to exert their utmost ingenuity to raise a subsistence, become eventually so ingenious and artful, that even Nature herself is hardly a match for them. They are incessantly at war with the elements, and their minds are never allowed to remain inactive. Necessity is the grand sharpener of their wits, and the new discoveries they are ever making in the arts and sciences are numberless. From these countries there is always a considerable part of the population emigrating into those of their neighbours. They carry along with them their native ingenuity, their hardihood, their industry and their poverty. The better-informed part of the community, among whom they locate, encourage them for their useful qualities; but the others, seeing themselves supplanted by these new comers, grow jealous, and begin to hate them. There may be certain duties in the country which the natives are prejudiced against, and which they consider a disgrace to perform: the foreigners, not having the same feelings towards such offices, and viewing them only as roads to wealth, fill them, and if they should happen to be polite and civil in the performance of their duty, they are too often called mean and servile. The country to which they belong is then fastened upon, and not only it, but all that are in it, and all that ever left it, are branded with the epithets of beggarly, mean, and servile. The sentiments of the jealous natives quickly spread, and the foreigners, ere long, find that it has become quite fashionable to hold them in derision and contempt, without their knowing why or wherefore. If a war should at any time have raged between the two countries, the aversion is doubly strong: generation after generation will imbibe this prejudice; and if a few of these foreigners should turn out unprincipled persons, the

* As a proof of his astonishing memory, it is recorded by Seneca, that, for a trial of his powers of recollection, he remained a whole day at a public auction, and when it was concluded, he repeated in order what had been sold, to whom, and at what price. This recital was compared with the clerk's account, and his memory was found to have served him faithfully in every particular.—Senec. Pref. Lib. I. Centurio.

Titian's Portraits.—It may be said of them, that it is they who look at you, more than you who look at them.—Northcote.

hatred to the nation will become such as centuries of honourable dealing will scarcely cancel.

In a conversation which we lately had with an intelligent but prejudiced friend, he expressed himself strongly against the Scotch, whom he professed to dislike above all other nations. Upon asking his reasons for such dislike, he said, he had always found them so mean and selfish that he felt disgusted with them. Have you, we asked, never met with a straightforward, disinterested Scotchman?

Very seldom, answered he, with a significant shake of the head.

Then you have met with some such in your lifetime?

Why, said he, after a short pause, upon consideration, I have met with some exceptions to the rest of their countrymen, but I always suspected them, and have carefully avoided any sort of intimacy or intercourse with them, excepting what was accidental or absolutely necessary.—Our friend is only one out of thousands who express a dislike to a people without being aware that it is early prejudice that causes this dislike, and not their own experience.

But how often are foreigners themselves to blame for rousing and keeping alive this enmity and ill-will between them and the people with whom they sojourn! We were a short time since at a social party in London, where the majority were English, when a young Scotchman, being asked to contribute his share to the hilarity of the meeting, started one of those songs of his country which inveighs against the Southrons, and which seemed to have been composed when the two nations were at deadly variance. He sang with all the enthusiasm of a would-be patriot, darting his glances around him as if he was eyeing his foes, and striking the table with his fist, as though he fancied he was busily engaged with his broadsword in the battle field. In looking from him to the Southron part of the company, we observed a jolly good-natured old gentleman shrug up his shoulders, and look over to a friend on the other side of the room, who, in his turn, smiled, winked, and shrugged his shoulders also. A few of the youngsters looked fiercely and disdainfully at the Scotchman, while others seemed at a loss whether to construe this ill-timed song into an insult, or ascribe its introduction to the rawness and ignorance of the singer. The moment he had finished, an older Scotchman, and a man of the world, perceiving the spirit that his imprudent countryman had roused among the company, proposed, and almost immediately began, a favourite English drinking song, which he sung with so much glee and spirit, as completely restored the good humour, and banished the feeling which had a few minutes previous threatened to disturb the harmony of the evening.

How often, too, are the feelings of the natives hurt by foreigners drawing comparisons between the land they live in and the one in which they were born and bred. These comparisons are generally partial, especially if he who draws them left his country when young. It is the nature of man to look back upon the scenes of his infancy, when his heart was free from care, with an interest which is heightened by distance, present troubles, and imagination. He expatiates on the joys of his boyhood, and all the pleasurable sensations of his early days, as if the loss of them was intirely owing to his removal from the scenes where he enjoyed them. He does not reflect that he must again be young, and his heart as buoyant as ever, before he can again appreciate the charms of those scenes that possessed his heart and delighted his fancy in the bright morning of youth. If you believe him, his country, though it may be one of poverty and meanness, is a fairy-land to the one in which he now resides; and its government and institutions, though perhaps despotic and corrupt, are founded on principles of wisdom and liberalism, while the powers by which he is now governed are tyrannical and oppressive. But even allowing all this to be true, what right had he to hurt the self-love and patriotic feelings of those in whose country he shelters himself, by drawing such comparisons? If they are content with their laws and constitution, is it his business, who is but a stranger in the land, to sow the seeds of sedition and discontent? If he is disgusted with their form of government, why does he remain under it? Why does he not pack up his goods and return to his own "dear country?" No one will hinder him—unless it may be his poverty or his creditors. But if his interest tells him that he had better remain where he is, let him learn to respect the feelings of those by whom he exists, and bless the land he lives in, until he can afford to go back to his own countrymen and relations, who doubtless will be glad to receive him, especially if he takes along with him a well-lined purse and a liberal hand.

There are some branches of certain trades and professions in which the French completely outstrip the English. When one of these skilful monsieurs enters a town and divides a business with a native, who has monopolised it for years, what can be said? The feelings as well as the prospects of the Englishman have a severe blow; but is the Frenchman to blame? Certainly not. The law of the land allows foreigners to settle and trade in this country, and he has only done what any other person with the same ideas would have done, namely, taken up his abode where he had the greatest prospect of doing well. Is it the public, then, on whom the blame descends? Surely not. By employing this stranger they are enabled to get their work done in a more elegant manner and cheaper than they could when they employed their own countryman, and at the same time are treated with more politeness and civility. No one can reasonably blame them for studying their own interest. Who then is the supplanted artisan to storm against, if he cannot justifiably do so against his rival or the public? We answer, against no one; for no one is censurable. But if he must needs storm, let him do so against chance, or his own inability to keep his place in the public estimation. Instead, however, of grumbling about the caprice of the unpatriotic public, and cherishing and encouraging an inveterate hatred for all foreigners, and Frenchmen in particular, if he is a wise man he will pocket his gains, and thank his stars that he so long fattened uninterruptedly upon a business for which, he now finds, he was not so well qualified as others in the world. He will also reflect that his son—if he has one—is able to learn certain trades in this country, in which Frenchmen never attain any remarkable degree of excellence, who, when he pleases, has the same liberty to go over to France and supplant French artisans, as the aforesaid Frenchman had to come over to England and supplant his father. Supposing, however, that the rival had been an Englishman with the same tact and genius as the Frenchman, would he not have succeeded as well? There is not a doubt of it. The public do not patronize the Frenchman merely because he is a Frenchman; it is his superior workmanship and pleasing politeness that obtain for him their support and estimation.

Until the day arrives when man shall become more of a cosmopolitan, and allow his reasoning powers to act less shackled by pride and blind selfishness, prejudice must and will be one of his ruling passions. The sooner knowledge gains the ascendancy in the human mind, the sooner will prejudice cease to exist. Men, who now look upon each other as "natural enemies," because Providence ordained them to be born in certain climates, and nurtured under particular governments, will, we trust, ere long, recognise each other as brothers belonging to one family, and the earth which they inhabit as one country, in which each will be encouraged according to his talents and industry.

In the meantime let us make it an inviolable rule never to speak against nations or communities en masse. If an individual or individuals of any country have betrayed our confidence, and proved themselves unworthy members of society, it is our duty to expose them, for such exposure may put those on their guard whom they are now deceiving; but never let us be so uncharitable as to cast unpleasant reflections on the country which gave them birth, as though it was responsible or reprehensible for the delinquencies of its unprincipled sons. In our own lifetime we have met with honest Jews, disinterested Scotchmen, liberal Englishmen, sincere Irishmen, polite Americans, intelligent Indians, and good and noble of nearly every country. We have also met with their countrymen possessing the opposites to all these qualities: but are we to condemn the former and their countries because of the latter? Heaven forbid.

FAIRY SONG.

DEAR SIR,—I see by your number for the present week, that you have taken up my favourite subject of the Fairy People. In return for the gratification you have afforded me, I request your acceptance of the following poetical trifle, if you think it worth presenting to your readers.—I am, dear sir, your sincere well-wisher,

CHARLES COWDEN CLARKE.

October 2, 1834.

THE FIRST OF THE FAIRIES.

SET TO MUSIC BY VINCENT NOVELLO.

WHAT ho! ye minims of earth,
Enwomb'd in your cells,
The buttercup bells;
Come forth at my call—
Come forth one and all—
'Tis Oberon calls you to birth.
Whence we came, and what we were,
Let no one ask—let no one care,
Since here we are!—since here we are!
You, Brisk, and Frisk,
With Whip, and Nip,
Come forth in your ranks,
Come forth with your pranks,
And crown we our birth-night with mirth.
Come one, come two,
"With mop and mowe;"
Come twenty in order meet;
And as you pass
O'er the dewy grass,
In lightning glance
Of your whirling dance,
Make rainbows with your twinkling feet.
You, Mustard-seed, go tweak
With roguish freak
The nose of cramming priest;
While Cob-web there, and Nip,
Will pinch and grip
The snoring slattern in her nest.
And when the owl has wing'd his flight,
And the pearly drops of night
Hang thickest on the lime-tree flower,
You, Bean and Pea-blossom, go clamber
To the sleeping maiden's chamber,
And prank anew her window bower.
Now hey for a roundel!—So—so!
And now through the roundel we go;
My fairies keep time
To the cricket's chime,
And the laugh of our chorus—"Ho! ho!"

A Pretty Note of Acceptance.—Balzac sent to borrow four hundred crowns of Voiture. His brother wit cheerfully complied, and taking the promissory note which the servant put into his hands, wrote on it thus: "I, the undersigned, acknowledge myself debtor to M. Balzac in the sum of eight hundred crowns, for the pleasure he did me in borrowing four hundred of me." He then returned it to the servant, to carry back to his master. "What are all Voiture's finest letters (says a French author) in comparison of such a note!"

Correcting the Press.—The publishers of the French 'Dictionary of French Dictionaries' have adopted a plan somewhat similar to that followed by the Stephens and Elzivirs. The proof sheets of the work will be open to general examination for seven days previously to the operation of pulling off the copies; and a premium of 50 cents (5d.) is offered for every typographical error which may be detected. Twenty errors discovered in one or more numbers of the work will entitle the discoverer to a gratuitous copy of the whole Dictionary.—The Printing Machine.

THE VILLAGE ALEHOUSE.

A PICTURE IN DETAIL.

DEAR ramblers all—an Alehouse sign

You'll own as good a sight as greets ye;
When summer's long, long mornings shine,
Where leisure reigns, and "All hail" meets ye.

There rests the waggon in its track,—
A corn-bag round each horse's nose is;
There comes the miller and his sack;
And there at ease the beggar dozes.

There limps the oetler with his pails,
And there the landlord stalks inspector;
Two farmers there discuss their sales,
And drain by turns one goblet's nectar.

Hay-ricks are near, and orchard fruit;
The cock's shrill crow and flapping wing;
The low contented neigh of brute;
The pipe's perfume, and tankard's ding.

The fiddle's scrape,—the milking cows,—
The snapping cork,—the roaring joke;
The birds by thousands in the boughs;
The creaking wheel, and whip's loud stroke.

Sunshine strews all the kitchen floor,
Reposes on the home-field crop—
Blister's the Doctor's fine new door,
And kisses copse and chimney top.

Clouds fleecy dot the blue immense—
Farm-houses—cities—vales—and streams—
And seats, and parks, and forests dense,
Sleep, stretch'd afar, in floods of beams.

AFFECTING ACCOUNT OF MR
BAMPFYLDE.

[By Mr Southey. From the Autobiography of Sir Egerton Brydges. Samples of the poetry of this unfortunate gentleman are to be found in Sir Egerton's 'Censura Literaria,' and in Mr Southey's Specimens.]

Keswick, May 10, 1800.

SIR,—I hold myself greatly indebted to you, not only for the list of authors, but for the very gratifying manner in which you have introduced my name in the 'Censura Literaria.' That list, with another of equal length, for which the selections were prepared for the press, but omitted during the course of publication by the friend who undertook to superintend it, will enable me, in an additional volume, to supply the bibliographical defects of the work. It gives me great pleasure to hear that 'Bampfyld's Remains' are to be edited. The circumstances which I did not mention concerning him are these. They were related to me by Jackson of Exeter, and minuted down immediately afterwards, when the impression that they made upon me was warm.

He was the brother of Sir Charles, as you say.* At the time when Jackson became intimate with him he was just at his prime, and had no other wish than to live in solitude, and amuse himself with poetry and music. He lodged in a farm house near Chudleigh, and would oftentimes come to Exeter in a winter morning, ungloved and open-breasted, before Jackson was up (though he was an early riser), with a pocket-full of music or poems to know how he liked them. His relations thought this was a sad life for a man of family, and forced him to London. The tears ran down Jackson's cheeks when he told me the story. Poor fellow, said he, there did not live a purer creature, and, if they would have let him alone, he might have been alive now.

When he was in London, his feelings, having been forced out of their proper channel, took a wrong direction, and he soon began to suffer the punishment of debauchery. The Miss Palmer, to whom he dedicated his 'Sonnets' (afterwards, and perhaps still, Lady Inchiquin), was niece to Sir Joshua Reynolds. Whether Sir Joshua objected to his addresses on account of his irregularities in London, or on other grounds, I know not, but this was the commencement of his madness. He was refused admittance into the house; upon this, in a fit of half anger and half derangement, he broke the windows, and was (little to Sir Joshua's honour) sent to Newgate. Some weeks after this had happened, Jackson went to London, and one of his first inquiries was for Bampfyld. Lady Bampfyld, his mother, said that she knew little or nothing about him; that she got him out of Newgate, and he was now in some beggarly place. Where?—In King street, Holborn, she believed, but she did not know the number of the house. Away went Jackson, and knocked [at every door till he found the right. It was a truly miserable place: the woman of the house was one of the worst class of women in London. She knew that Bampfyld had no money, and that, at that time, he had been three days without food. When Jackson saw him there was all the levity of madness in his manners; his shirt was ragged and black as a coal-heaver's, and his beard of two months' growth. Jackson sent out for food, and said he was come to breakfast with him; and he turned aside to a harpsichord in the room, literally he said to let him gorge himself without being noticed. He removed him from hence, and, after giving his mother a severe lecture, obtained for him a decent allowance, and left him, when he himself quitted town, in decent lodgings, earnestly begging him to write.

But he never wrote: the next news was that he was in a private madhouse, and Jackson never saw him more. Almost the last time he met, he showed him several poems, among others, a 'Ballad on the Murder of David Rizzio.' Such a ballad! said he. He came that day to dine with Jackson and was asked for copies. I burned them, was the reply. I wrote them to please you; you did not seem to like them, so I threw them into the fire. After twenty years' confinement, he recovered his senses, but not till he was dying of consumption. The apothecary urged him to leave Sloane street (where he had always been as kindly treated as he could be), and go into his own country, saying that his friends in Devonshire would be very glad to see him. But he hid his face, and answered, No, sir, they who knew me what I was, shall never see me what I am.

THREE PLEASANTRIES,

OF WHICH THE READER MAY TAKE HIS CHOICE.

'Tis pleasant climbing the green hill's ascent,
Soaring in undulations from the sea,
To spy in fancy's mirror stream and tree,
Cottage and castle, beautifully blent—
'Tis pleasant from the lonely peak to gaze
On scenes above the wizard Fancy's power,
The sunset gleaming in a golden shower,
And maidens dancing in the rainbow's rays.—
And sweeter far, decrying in the vale
Her whom we love—to give the person scope,
Winged with joy, adown the glittering slope
To the fair creature in the echoing dale;
And while she smiles or laughs aloud, to hope
The tender mood may in its turn prevail.

TABLE TALK.

St Overseer and St Overall.—M. de Lannoi, from his strict inquiry into the merits of canonized saints, and his discovery of abuses, got the nick-name of the Unnestler of Saints; so that M. Godefroi, historiographer of France, meeting him on a new year's day, embraced him with a great deal of civility, and after wishing him a happy new year, "Pray, my good friend, what saints do you intend to unneastle this year?" said he. Lannoi, though a little startled at this question, after so much ceremony, readily answered, "Far be it from me to be wanting in reverence to those saints, whom God and their sanctity have placed in heaven; but no endeavour of mine shall be wanting to unneastle those whom the ignorance and superstition, or knavery of the world have surreptitiously conveyed in there, without the approbation of God or the learned." A great deal of this rubbish still remains, according to an ingenious Englishman (Middleton), who, in a letter from Rome, mentions some original papers which he found in the Barberine Library, giving a pleasant account between the Spaniards and Pope Urban VIII. in relation to saintship. The Spaniards, it seems, have a saint held in great reverence in some parts of Spain, called Viars; for the further encouragement of whose worship they solicited the Pope to grant some special indulgences to his altars; and upon the Pope's desiring to be better acquainted first with his character, and the proofs which they had of his saintship, they produced a stone with the antique letters, S V I A R, which the antiquaries readily saw to be a small fragment of some old Roman inscription in memory of one who had been Præfectus S V I A Rum, or, Overseer of the Highways. To this he adds, that in England they have a still more ridiculous instance of a fictitious saintship, in the case of a certain saint called Amphibolus (Fling-round, or Overall), who, according to the monkish historians, was Bishop of the Isle of Man, and fellow-martyr and disciple of St Alban; yet the learned Bishop Usher says he has produced irrefragable reasons to convince us that he owes the honour of his saintship to a mistaken passage in the old acts or legends of St Alban, where the Amphibolus mentioned, and still revered as a saint and a martyr, was nothing more than the cloak which Alban happened to have at the time of his execution.

An Honest Lover.—As D'Aubigné (Henry the Fourth's friend and rough monitor) was once relating his misfortunes to M. de Taley, the latter interrupted him, saying, "You have papers of the highest consequences to the late Chancellor, who is now retired to his seat, and quite worn out; if you will consent that I should send to acquaint him with what is in your custody, I'll engage you shall have 10,000 crowns, if not from him, from those who would make use of them to ruin him." Upon which, D'Aubigné fetched all these papers which were at once to ruin him, and threw them in the fire before M. Taley, who, beginning to reprimand him smartly for it, D'Aubigné answered, "I have burnt them, lest they might burn me, for the temptation might have overpowered me." The next day, the old gentleman taking him by the hand, said, "Though you have not made your thoughts known to me, I am too quick-sighted not to perceive that you have a love for my daughter: that she is courted by persons in better circumstances than yourself cannot be unknown to you; but your burning those papers yesterday is such a proof of integrity, that it has disposed me to signify to you, that I am willing you should be my son-in-law."

Address of Virtue.—Du Chattelet, a French statesman (he was one of the Scotch family of Hay), had such an unshaken integrity, that he was imprisoned for refusing to act in some unworthy measures. Being afterwards released, he went to the royal chapel: but the King (Louis XIII.) affected to look another way, that he might not meet the eyes of a person to whom he had lately done such flagrant injustice. Hereupon Du Chattelet whispered one of the noblemen, "Be so good as to tell the king, my Lord, that I freely forgive him, and beg the honour of one look." This set the king a-laughing, and all was well.

Excellent Advice to Poets.—The ordinary poet, like the ordinary man, is for ever seeking, in external circumstances, the help which can be found only in himself. In what is familiar or near at hand, he discerns no form or comeliness; home is not poetical, but prosaic; it is in some past, distant, conventional world, that poetry resides for him; were he there, and not here,—were he thus, and not so,—it would be well with him. Hence our innumerable host of rose-coloured novels and iron-nailed epics, with their locality not on the earth, but somewhat nearer the moon. Hence our Virgins of the Sun, and our Knights of the Cross, malicious Saracens in turbans, and copper-coloured chiefs in wampum, and so many other truculent figures from the heroic times or the heroic climates, who, on all hands, swarm in our poetry. Peace be with them! But yet, as a grand moralist proposed preaching to the men of this century, so would we fain preach to the poets a sermon on the duty of staying at home. Let them be sure that heroic ages and heroic climates can do little for them. That form of life has attraction for us, less because it is better and nobler than our own, than simply because it is different; and even this attraction must be of the most transient sort. For will not our own age one day be an ancient one, and have as quaint a costume as the rest, therefore, and be ranked along with them, in respect of quaintness? Does Homer interest us now because he wrote of what passed out of his native Greece, and two centuries before he was born? or because he wrote of what passed in God's world, and in the heart of man, which is the same after thirty centuries? Let our poets look to this: is their feeling really finer, truer, and their visions deeper than that of other men,—they have nothing to fear, even from the humblest subject; is it not so,—they have nothing to hope, but an ephemeral favour, even from the highest.—Thomas Carlyle.

TWILIGHT ACCUSED & DEFENDED.

A monstrous thing has happened. Here is a correspondent of ours, and a pleasant one too, and witty withal, aiming a blow at our gentle friend, Twilight! What possible mood could he have been in? Did he expect a friend who had disappointed him? or a new book? or a letter? Was his last bottle of wine out? Or did he want his tea? Or was he reading, and could not go on, the servant not being in the way to bring candles? Or was the evening rainy? Or had he said anything wrong to any one else, and so was out of temper? Or had he been reading something about twilight, badly written, a "twaddle," and so was disposed to go to an extreme the other way, and be perverse in his wit? His first verse looks like it. Or had he a tooth-ache? or a head-ache? or nothing to do? Or had his fire gone out?

We should almost as soon have expected a blow from him at gentleness itself, as at our gentle dusk friend, the mildest and most unassuming of the Hours, meek, yet genial withal, like some loving Mestizo or Quadroon, something between fair and dark, or dusk and dusker, who, by her sweet middle tone between merit and the want of pretension, and by having nothing to arrogate, and much to be prized, charms the amorous heart of some contemplative West Indian, who is tired out between the flare of his whiter favourites, and the undiscerning presumption of his black. Certain it is, that, vehemently howsoever he speaketh, we hold him not to be in earnest (the less so by reason of that enormity); but, in order to prevent the peril of any false conclusions, in minds accustomed not to such facetious perversity, and still more to take the opportunity of vindicating the character of our gentle friend, and make our correspondent remorseful the next time he sees her (for having even appeared to treat her ill), we have thought it incumbent upon us to follow up his hard words with others more sily soft and overwhelmingly balmy. Oh, there is nothing like defending a good easy cause, and a tender-hearted client! It makes one, somehow, so sure of triumph, so able to trample on one's enemy with the softest foot and the most generous reputation—so gifted (dare we say it?) with the pleasures of malignity by the very exercise of benevolence. Mark you, dear reader, with what a tender savageness we will set him down. Yet he rails in good set terms. There is no denying that. Far be it from us to deny it, who shall only gain the greater praise from our refutation. Hear him how he sets out with the ingenious impudence of his pun and his alliteration—

A TRIMMING FOR TWILIGHT.

How I despise the twaddle about twilight,
That most unserviceable sort of sky-light;
Weak wavering gleam, that, wandering on its way
Towards the night, still lingers with the day.

Twilight's a half-and-half affair, that would
With all its heart be moonlight if it could;
Dim, but not dark; you pause at the bell-handles,
'Tis scarce worth while to conquer it with candles.

Twilight is eve grown grey before its time,
Mystified mummer, ape-ing the sublime
Day with its eye half clos'd, and half a-peep;
The afternoon, making believe to sleep.

'Tis like that forming frown yet undefin'd
That you half-smiling female face has got,
As tho' it hadn't quite made up its mind
Whether it should look angrily or not.

Twilight's an interloper in the sky;
The face of nature painted with one eye:
Something between blank darkness and broad light,—
Like dotard day coquetting with young night.

A dame passé, who, growing old and wan,
Affects to veil the charms she feels are gone;
Knowing her day is o'er, the wily jade
Enwraps the ruin where the sunshine play'd.

Lovers love twilight, but I'm not a lover;
And why they love it I could ne'er discover;
For light is passion's parent: do ye deem Beauty no debtor to the radiant beam
That lamps its loveliness; say, can we know
That beauty lives, and one bright glance forego?
Or is't a fancy of love's selfish art,
To close the eyes, and see but with the heart.

Haply 'tis so: in love's delirious trance,
The raptur'd soul grown jealous of the glance
That has a joy beyond it, dims the light
To lend to young imagination sight.

Fancy that peoples darkness with bright rays,
And makes a darkness that it thus may gaze;
How is't that every feeling, fond, intense,
Tempt us to lose awhile our visual sense?

Is it superfluous? We drink love thro' it;
'Tis then in us; we can no longer view it
By gazing outwards; now, a glance to win,
Our eyelids close, and turn their sense within.

This is digressive, but enough for me;
Lovers, in fact, are no authority;
So, as I said at first, old twaddling twilight,
Be still the lover's gleam, you sha'n't be my light.

Thou'rt day declared a bankrupt, offering round
A dividend of ten-pence in the pound:
Plague take such compositions; I'll for one
Have twenty-shillings' worth of light, or none.

Not day-break, but day broken, light fades fast;
Do as thou wilt, thou'rt sure to fail at last.
"Come, sealing night," before thee twilight flies,
Put out the mocker with your starry eyes.
Dusky-hued coward! hast begun the race,
Darest thou not look dame Dian in the face?

Now flickering fainter, now more darkly dull,
"I that am cruel, am yet merciful;
I would not have thee linger in thy pain:"
Come, light the candles; struggle not,—'tis vain.

Is that thy shadow, lingering on the moor?
No matter; you shall never come in-door.
The stars come out at thee, pale day-diminisher;
Now the moon gleams at full,—ay, that's a finisher.

Beneath the hillock's shadow, cloak'd in grey,
Cautiously creep before the light away;
But when the morning moon grows sick and pale,
Then, stealthy stepper, come across the vale.

Child of the mist, isthmus 'twixt light and shade!
Shadow of chaos, from which earth was made!
Day, dying of decline! doubt-dreaming ray!
Thy presence saddens me—away—away!

"Away—away!" Our correspondent must have been in a great hurry, to speak thus to the poor gentle twilight, which has not a word to say for itself, unless it be the muffin-bell, the next thing in humbleness of sound to the sheep-bell. We take him to be a prodigiously active and eager spirit, with an ultra flow of health and life, and never easy but when occupied, perhaps not then, unless the occupation perfectly suits him. But he has a soul withal; you may know it even by what is implied in his style of abuse; and therefore it is not the twilight he hates, but the absence of something which he wanted instead of it. Yes; assuredly he has been "snubbing" the poor Quadroon, like some lordly planter, because somebody else has not brought him his sangaree.

He lets—we cannot say the "cat out of the bag"—but the dove out of the cage—in what he says about lovers. He tells us he is "no lover," merely in order to avoid what he knows to be conclusive against him; and, in fact, he runs into a digression about love, on purpose to disprove his own argument. Besides, if he happens to be so limited or so unlucky in his circle of acquaintances as to be in love with nobody, he must love all sorts of loveable things, otherwise how could he write so well about loving? and if a man loves anything at all, he must needs love so mild and loving a thing as the twilight. (Here are a great many repetitions of the word "love;" but it is a pleasant note, and will bear reiteration like the nightingale's.)

Furthermore, in this passage of our correspondent's about love, compared with certain letters which he has written to us privately, urging us to give an article on "Coleridge," we have detected him in the fact of his disingenuousness; for this very passage has manifestly been suggested by some stanzas of that favourite of his, in the poem intitled the "Day-Dream." It is a lover's picture of twilight in a room, and is so beautiful and true, that it might serve, alone, as an answer to all the stanzas of this pretending rogue:—

My eyes make pictures when they are shut:
I see a fountain, large and fair,
A willow, and a ruin'd hut,
And thee, and me, and Mary there.
O, Mary! make thy gentle lap our pillow!
Bend o'er us, like a bow'r, my beautiful green willow.

The shadows dance upon the wall,
By the still dancing fire-flames made;
And now they slumber, moveless all!
And now they melt to one deep shade!
But not from me shall this mild darkness steal thee;
I dream thee with mine eyes, and at my heart I feel thee!

Very beautiful, and spiritual, and truly loving. But lovers, the most honourable and delicate, have a trick of taking other advantages of the good-natured twilight; and the poet goes on to let us know as much:—

Thine eyelash on my cheek doth play.

Far be it from us to deny the merits of light and seeing. Beauty was surely meant to be seen as well as loved, or why is it so beautiful? But it is a maxim with us never to deny the merits of one good thing because there is another; and twilight, where love is, has its loveliness also, as well as lamp and daylight. One of the greatest tests of true love is the sense of joy imparted by the mere presence of the beloved object, apart from light, speech, or anything else; and twilight, somehow, rewards us for the sincerity and generosity of this feeling, by bringing us nearer to the object of our affection, in its abolition of intermediate objects, and a general sense of its mild embracement.

Come—let us consider what our correspondent would say further in behalf of the twilight, if he were in the humour for it. We wish we had time to say it in verse; but here we heave a great sigh (one of the sighs of our life); and as we always feel ashamed of sighing in the midst of this beautiful creation (of which to be able to discern a millionth part of the beauties, is to waken up as many consolatory angels, who lie in wait to become visible to loving eyes) we shall proceed to express ourselves in our accustomed prose, from which, at all events, the love of what is poetical cannot be excluded.

Twilight is the time between light and darkness, when the facility afforded for action by the daylight is over, and the aid of candle-light, for the renewal of action, awaits our pleasure to renew it or not. It is therefore the precise time, of all others, which seems designed by nature for meditation. We say, by nature; for though we hold it to be man's nature to be artificial as well as natural, yet it is natural for him, being a thinking being, to "take pause;" and nature in this gentlest and most intermediate hour seems to offer it him. The greatest part of his duty is over (we hold, that in a more civilized state of society it will all be over, except for purposes of entertainment); he cannot see to work; he cannot see, very actively, to travel; his very book begins to fail him, unless he has determined to keep up the train of his reading, and goes nearer and nearer to the window, and at last he must give it up. He is therefore thrown upon his meditations.

Now "think a little."

Not of your cares, dear reader, if you can help it; not of your work; not of other people's faults; not of your own. There is time enough to attend to those, when we have more light—unless indeed you do it in great charity, first towards the faults of others, and then towards yourself (having earned the right), and always provided you end, as indeed you must if true charity meditates with you, in resolutions befitting the mildness and considerateness of the hour. We would not even have you think of the sufferings of others, provided you think of them at any other time, and do what you can to help them. Twilight is a placid hour, and you must entertain it with placidity or not at all. You must have so acted, or so wished to act, at other times, as to be able to give gentle welcome to gentle guest. You must be worthy of the twilight.

(Here our correspondent gives a great wince; and begins to inquire of his conscience, whether he has ever cracked any one's skull, or written any impiety except the above.)

Now let us think of all mild and loving things,—of our childhood, of the fields, of our best friends, of twilight itself and its shadows, of the quiet of our fireside, and the fanciful things we see in the glowing coals, of the poets who have spoken of evening, of the beauty of stillness, of scenes of rural comfort, of the travels of the winds and clouds, of stories of good angels, nay, of dear friends whom we have lost, provided we have lost them long enough or loved them well enough to consider them with reference to the beauty of their own spirit, rather than to their absence from ourselves. Perhaps they are commissioned to be good angels over us:—perhaps they are now this minute in the room, smiling in the certainty of their own lovingness, and the knowledge of our future good; ay, and (as far as their sympathy with our present struggles will permit) smiling to think even how startled we should be to see them, if it were within heaven's knowledge of what is best for us that we should do so. For God is the author of mirth as well as seriousness, and considering what security of belief in good there must be in celestial natures, we may conceive some little stooping to it even for the happiness of heavenly cheeks.

"Let us think" of that, and of all other possibilities beyond the regions of mere earthly utility, not excepting it nevertheless. It is the privilege of the imaginative, that they include everything which is good, besides seeing a germ of it at the core of the thorniest evil.

We put these words, "let us think," within marks of quotation for a reason very proper to mention in this place; for we scarcely ever begin meditating at twilight without calling them to mind as uttered to us by the beloved parent to whom we are indebted for most of our aspirations after anything useful or beautiful. She would say to us sometimes at this hour, when our spirits appeared to her to be a little too incessant, "Come—let us think a little." And then we used to sit down on a stool at her side, and look at the fire, and be led into a sedate mood by some story she would tell us of her own mother, or of the sea, or of some great and good people of old.

So now this is good hushing time, is it not, reader? and fit for keeping a little from the candles; and not what our ultra-lively friend (now growing remorseful) would make of it. You and we are sitting on each side of the fire-place, one of us with a knee between his hands, the other with a child between his knees, and there is a fair friend with us, and we are all as quiet as mice, our faces lit up by the fire, and our shadows shifting on the wall. When we speak, it is in a low voice; for twilight has this also in common with the sweetest of its friends:—

Its voice is ever soft, gentle and low,—
An excellent thing in "Twilight."

W. L. R. shall come in among us, if he is "very good."

W. L. R. You see before you, sir, a penitent.

Ed. I see before me a suspicious quoter of impudent plays.

W. L. R. I appeal to the lady's face, sir.

Ed. Oh, you're a very cunning appellant, sir, and the lady's face will get you a pardon for anything.—There—Don't tumble over the little boy. But with what face you can come in, after saying you are "no lover"—

W. L. R. Excuse me. Whatever I might have said before, real or pretended, and whatever new presumption I may be guilty of now, nobody can look on this lady's face, without—

Ed. Hush, hush, not so very loud and enthusiastic. (All laugh.) You see how little he was in earnest. The moment he hears of a comfortable party and a charming woman, he is for being in the midst of it, twilight and all.—Come, as we are Christian people, we will give him, by way of penance, what shall be no penance at all. He shall recite to us Coleridge's poem, intitled 'Frost at Midnight.' There is mention in it of a fireside and of the little fluttering film on the bars before us; and the spirit of the whole piece is suited to the occasion, quiet, reflective, and universal. The last line is the perfection of ideal sympathy.

W. L. R. (suppressing the vehemence of his enthusiasm in order to recite with a gentleness fitted to the lines, and gradually growing softer and more reasonable, till nothing can be better given)—

FROST AT MIDNIGHT.

The frost performs its secret ministry
Unhelped by any wind. The owl's cry
Came loud—and hark, again! loud as before.
The inmates of my cottage, all at rest,
Have left me to that solitude, which suits
Abstruser musings: save that at my side,
My cradled infant slumbers peacefully.
'Tis calm indeed! so calm, that it disturbs
And vexes meditation with its strange
And extreme silentness. Sea, hill, and wood,
This populous village! Sea, hill, and wood,
With all the numberless goings-on of life,
Inaudible as dreams! the thin blue flame
Lies on my low-burnt fire, and quivers not;
Only that film, which fluttered on the grate,
Still flutters there, the sole unquiet thing.
Methinks, its motion in this hush of nature
Gives it dim sympathies with me who live,
Making it a companionable form

Whose puffy flaps and freaks, the idling spirit
Hides among woods interprets, everywhere
Echo or mirror seeking of itself,
And makes a toy of thought.

But O! how oft,
How oft, at school, with most believing mind
Presagful, have I gazed upon the bars
To watch that fluttering stranger! and as oft
With unclosed lids, already had I dreamt
Of my sweet birth-place, and the old church tower,
Whose bells, the poor man's only music, rang
From morn to evening, all the hot Fair-day
So sweetly, that they stirred and haunted me
With a wild pleasure, falling on mine ear
Most like articulate sounds of things to come.
So gazed I, till the soothing things I dreamt
Lull'd me to sleep, and sleep prolonged my dreams,
And so I brooded all the following morn,
Awd by the stern preceptor's face, mine eye
Fixed with mock study on my swimming book,
Save if the door half open'd, and I snatch'd
A hasty glance, and still my heart leap'd up,
For still I hop'd to see the stranger's face—
Townsmen, or aunt, or sister more beloved,
My play-mate when we both were clothed alike.

Dear babe, that sleepest cradled by my side,
Whose gentle breathings, heard in this deep calm,
Fill up the interspersed vacancies
And momentary pauses of the thought,—
My babe so beautiful! it thrills my heart
With tender gladness thus to look at thee,
And think that thou shalt learn far other lore
And in far other scenes! for I was reared
In the great city, pent 'mid cloisters dim,
And nought—nought lovely but the sky and stars;
But thou, my babe, shalt wander like a breeze
By lakes and sandy shores, beneath the crags
Of ancient mountains, and beneath the clouds
Which image in their bulk both lakes and shores
And mountain crags: so shalt thou see and hear
The lovely shapes and sounds intelligible
Of that eternal language, which thy God
Utters, who from eternity doth teach,
Himself in all, and all things in himself.
Great universal Teacher! he shall mould
Thy spirit, and by giving make it ask.

Therefore all seasons shall be sweet to thee,
Whether the summer clothe the general earth
With greenness, or the redbreast sit and sing
Betwixt the tufts of snow on the bare branch
Of mossy apple-tree, while the white thatch
Smokes in the sun-thaw; whether the eve-drops fall,
Heard only in the trances of the blast,
Or if the secret ministry of frost
Shall hang them up in silent icicles,
Quietly shining to the quiet moon.

HINTS FOR TABLE TALK.

No. II.

'Tis night—all is silent—the dwellers in the habitations round are hushed in slumber, or else weeping sleep;—recumbent they ponder on the transactions of the past day, or take thought for those of the morrow. 'Tis October, and the winds sigh round the gable end of the house and o'er its roof,—the last of the flies buzzes drearily through the room. I am in my chamber—a garret,—according to Bacon, the best place for light and poetic study, and, therefore, authors should descend in proportion to the character of their studies, to the second floor, first floor, parlour, kitchen, cellar, and to the very vaults of Somerset House, for heavy, profound metaphysics; because in proportion as they are high in the air, their spirits and thoughts are exhilarating and ebullient, and the nearer they approach the centre of gravity, their minds are constrained into a deeper and more sombre train of thought. But sombre is not the character of writing at which I am at present engaged—neither do I claim the poetic strain—light writing for light reading is my present aim. Light,—said I? I faith my lamp burns dim, and must be trimmed. Lamp,—said I? No—'tis an unpoetic candle. I cannot, as is the manner of some, persuade myself into the belief that there is some of Shakespeare's fat, or Milton's marrow burning in it, to give light, or to shed a lustre on my poor lucubrations.—No—'Tis as genuine a mutton fat as ever burned in socket—some of it, mayhap, supplying combustion, for a second or third time, to illuminate the deeds of a mortal.

"Out, out, brief candle!" said the poet, to the last inch of life, flickering in the socket of time. "Hide not thy light under a bushel," said a greater than he—therefore, no doubt, was it, dear Journalist, that you have edified our minds and illuminated our imaginations with your weekly collection of daily literature. But I must trim my lamp, or, rather, snuff my candle, or, as the sailors say—"top the glim."—The superfluous carbon is now removed, and the flame, on whose nature there has been so many speculations, burns brighter, and entices me to write, while my coach—bed, I should say, but I am tainted with the affected phraseology of the present magazine age of literature—my bed looks tempting, and, with sheets turned down, wooes me to its embrace. But I must seize the present opportunity—not "carpe diem," but "carpe noctem,"—the night is the time to study and to write, whether in a garret, or in a cellar. Day is too light, bright, and attractive to be able to withdraw your thoughts from it, and fix them on the paper. The subdued light of human invention is more congenial;—we gaze upon it, and behold the emblem of the soul—a spark of light chipped off from the great all-supplying luminary—and, as we know not the nature of flame, neither know we the nature of the soul. The day is too busy with the bustle and business of life, which, though we partake not of it ourselves, yet the noise from without distracts and withdraws the mind and prevents it from turning in upon itself. The dark stillness of night falls like dew upon the field of contemplation, and thoughts germinate and spring up under its influence. The light of the day is too dazzling,—and, "as imagination bodies forth the forms of things unseen," it is apt to dispel the visions, and, leave the "airy nothings" without "a habitation or a name."

It has been said that morning is the more favourable time for study, inasmuch as the mind is then refreshed with the night's repose, free from any incumbrances with which it might be loaded by past affairs, at the close of the day;—that it is then vigorous, like a bow that has remained for sometime unstrung—and, not being prepossessed by any particular subject, is more ductile, and may be led to the consideration of any required subject. To this I can only answer, from my own experience, that the mind, instead of being fresh and vigorous, upon awaking in the morning, is confused and bewildered with a mixture of dreams and recollections, which it is impossible for a time to dispel; the body, too, requires some time to resume its wonted elasticity; and there is too intimate a connection between the two, to allow of an exhilaration of the one and a depression of the other to exist together. In the morning, too, if it be summer, one would be tempted by the beauties of a sunrise to wander in the verdant fields, or stroll on the banks of a stream, and watch the ruddy luminary chase the dewy fogs from its surface, which fly at his approach, as a lover from the bosom of his mistress at the approach of a crabbed guardian, with face red with rage—(excuse the intrusion of the simile, it is an odd one, but, as it entered my brain, I allowed it to flow from the point of my pen, and I leave it with you, Mr. Editor, to erase it, should you think fit)—or if it be winter, it is not in human nature to brave sharp frost in a cold room. The imagination shivers as well as the body, and the thoughts freeze in abortive masses in the brain. Then, one says, he can do nothing until he gets his breakfast to warm him, and by that time the morning, properly speaking, is over, and the day arrives with its engraving cares.

There is a peculiar advantage in the night over the morning as a time for literary composition, which is far from being unimportant; it is, that if one gets into a good train of ideas, he can keep from his bed as long as he pleases, and so take advantage of the felicitous moments; whereas, if one catches a good clue in the morning, before he has time to unravel it, or follow it to its source, some business interrupts,—breakfast is announced,—or some other fate clips the thread, and it is lost, perhaps, for ever. I know not whether D'Israeli has a chapter on this point or not, in his 'Curiosities of Literature,' but I am convinced that by far the greater number of authors would be found, as have composed at night, were the subject examined. Sir Walter Scott, certainly, was an exception to this, in my opinion, general fact.

It is as much from necessity as choice that I write at night. Business occupies the day with me, and at night I take up the pen with my mind charged with ideas, which have arisen from the observation of the day, and I either write till sleep overpowers me, or my light burns out. Thus am I brought to the lamp again—and drowsiness tempts me to extinguish the "flaming minister." This reminds me of the lamp in the title page of Richard Taylor's edition of the classics, with its motto "Alere flammam." I bought at a book-stall, some time since, one of these books which, as appeared, from the inscription on the title page, had once been the property of a Cantab. In it, the metaphoric emblem was altered from a hand pouring oil into the lamp, to a hand with an extinguisher about to put out the light; and to the hand was appended an arm, and to the arm a body very elegantly attired in a night-shirt—and a head covered with a night-cap—and a mouth most luxuriously stretched in a hearty yawn—the very ultimatum of the "ore rotundo." The motto was also very appropriately altered to "extinguere flammam." The limner has left us in the dark as to whether he intended the elegant figure as one drowsy after a night's revelry or a night's study;—there are neither books and paper, nor bottles and glasses—nothing to tell the tale—we must therefore give it in the subject's favour, and decide that he is fatigued with a night's intense study; and therefore I shall enlist him on my side as one who is of opinion that night is the best and most appropriate time for study. In the words of an old Scotch song—

To sit up a' nicht, I'd sooner agree
Than rise in the morning early.

Old books and book-stalls are fast going out of season; new and cheap editions of all the standard works, in cloth coats, are displacing their respectable forefathers of the leathern doublet. Instead of a dark row of dusky brown backs on the shelves of the shops, we see modern issues glittering in all the colours of the rainbow. The poor penniless student cannot now resort to the book-stall to refer to a book which he cannot afford to buy. What a feast one might have gathered by dipping into a book or two at every stall in an hour's walk, a few years ago! The modern books will not bear such exposure to the weather, and the impenetrable glass excludes their contents from the gazer's view. He of the thread-bare coat is a character of the last century—or at all events of the last generation; we do not now see him hovering about the old book-shops and stalls, sipping learning from each, as a bee sips honey from every flower: no, the flowers are all covered in glass-cases now-a-days. We do not now see him haggling with the bookseller to get a worn-out copy of one of the Greek or Latin classics for a sixpence—mayhap the full extent of his exchequer—or searching for some odd volume to complete a set of the 'Spectator,' 'Rollin's Ancient History,' or some other favourite work. I speak feelingly upon this subject, as I have been quite a haunter of book-stalls from my boyhood upwards. I remember reading a whole book at one standing at a stall; I have a faint recollection of the contents—it was the history of some wild fellow who runs away from his apprenticeship—goes on board a ship, suffers shipwreck and much tossing about by land and by sea—gets rich in India, and comes home to relieve and enrich his parents and brothers and sisters, whom he finds about to be turned into the street by a cruel creditor—makes everybody about him happy—lives respected, and dies lamented. This is the only instance in which I recollect reading a whole work at one time at a book-stall. I always like to dip into the boxes of books ticketed "Sixpence each," or "Threepence each." I am always in expectation of picking up some rare 'Caxton,' or invaluable 'Wynkyn de Worde,' but the bibliopoles have always as yet been too knowing for me, except once, when I got a 'Breeches Bible' (so called from Genesis iii, 7, where it is translated that our first parents sewed fig-leaves together, and made themselves breeches, instead of aprons) without any boards, for sixpence.

At another time, I bought a well-read copy of Burns's Songs. It seemed to have been possessed by some admiring countryman of the Bard's, who had taken up his satirical strain, and in the blank-leaf penned the following address "TO THE READER:"

Afore ye tak in hand this beuk,
To these few lines jist gie a leuk:

Be sure that baith ye'r hands are clean,
Sic as are fitten to be seen,
Free fra a' dirt, an' black coal soom;
Fra ash-hole dust, an' chimbley bloom;
O' creesh fra candle or fra lamp,
Upon it leave nae filthy stamp.
I'd rather gie a siller croon,
Than see a butter'd finger'd loon,
Wi' parritch, reemin fra his chaps,
Fast fa'in down in slav'rin draps
Upon the beuk. Hech! for each sowp,
I'd wish a nettle at his doup;
For every creeshie drap transparent,
I'd wish his neck wi' a sair hair in't:
Sic plague spots on ilk bonnie page,
Wad mak a sant e'en stamp wi' rage.
Reader, ye'll no tak amiss,
Sic an impertinence as this:
Ye'r no the aye that e'er wad do't—
An use a beuk like an old clot;
Ye wadna wi' ye'r fingers soil it—
Nor creesh, nor blot, nor rend, nor spoil it.

The possessor of this book cannot have belonged to the very best of Scottish society, as some of the cautions given in the effusion would have been unnecessary—mayhap some farm servant or weaver lad may have been its possessor;—we may imagine the hungry ploughman at his morning repast of "Scotia's hamely fare" in the lines

Wi' parritch, reemin fra his chaps,
Fast fa'in down in slav'rin draps
Upon the beuk.

I should prefer to have the preceding caution printed and pasted in the inside of all my books rather than the namby-pamby verses beginning, 'This book belongs to——,' which are sold for the purpose of cautioning the reader against soiling, dog's-eating, or lending again a borrowed book. What an elegant stanza that is, which the lower classes of the English write in their books—beginning,

Steal not this book for fear of shame,
For in it is the owner's name;

and ending—

And God will ask in the last day,
Where is that book you took away?

The lower classes among the Scotch, too, have a rhyme somewhat similar, beginning—

O ye thief! how daur ye steal!

and so on.

I think I may claim congeniality with you, Mr Editor, in my love for old book-stalls, from what you lately let fall in the article "'Tis But." Many a sixpence, ay, and shilling too, have I spent, and eked to every one of them a "'tis but,"—yet I never regretted such expenditure. I must be excused if I behave as rudely as Mr Burchell, and to the bottom of all such ultra-economists' speculations write "Fudge."

BOOKWORM.

Table Hydrophobia.—Peirese, dining at London with several persons of literature, could not be exempted from drinking a health (proposed by Dr Thorius, a German) in a glass of frightful opacities. Peirese alleged freedom, civility, decency, health, and a thousand other reasons, but to no purpose; the glass must be drank off to that health; but, before he consented to it, he required a promise that this Bacchanalian docter should also drink his toast; then having with much ado finished such a copious draught, he drank a health in the same glass filled with water. Thorius appeared quite thunderstruck, and, after many a heavy sigh, put the glass to his mouth, but quickly drew it back; and though he fortified himself with all the Greek and Latin apophthegms on thwarting the senses, he was an hour before he emptied his glass, to the great diversion of the company, and his own advantage; for afterwards he never broke in upon any one's temperance.

—It raises my spleen (says Madame de Sevigné) to hear an old creature say, "I am too old to mend." This would sound better in a young person: youth is so lovely, the body is then so perfect, that were the mind equally such, the passion would be too vehement which such an assemblage must excite; but, when the graces of youth begin to wither, then, surely it is high time to labour after the moral and intellectual qualities, and endeavour to compensate the loss of beauty by the acquirement of merit.

MADRIGAL.

IMITATED FROM THE FRENCH OF MELLIN DE ST
GELAIS, AND ONE OF THE EPIGRAMS OF CLEMENT MAROT.

FAIR, lovely, beautiful thou art
Whene'er thy smiles my passion bless;
But when thou lowerest on my heart,
Whene'er thy frowns my soul depress,
Thy beauty wanes, thy charms grow less.
Then ever smile upon my duty:
Not to reward its faithfulness,
But merely to preserve thy beauty.

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 19th to Tuesday the 25th
November.

ST CECILIA'S DAY.

SATURDAY next, the 22nd, is St Cecilia's day, an anniversary which survived the Roman Catholic ascendancy in this country till a late period, in consequence of the fair Saint's being the patroness of music. It is a pity her festival ever went out. Perhaps the new animation which has been given to the study of music by the works of Mozart and others, by the foundation of Academies, and the getting up of performances in Abbeys and Halls, will revive it; and musicians and poets too be inspired by a love of the art, as well as the recollections of the Drydens and Puroells, to give it welcome.

The following is Sir Walter Scott's account of the Saint, and of one of Dryden's odes in celebration of her, which we have transferred to our pages; for, though the production of an author so well-known, its fame has been obscured, even with persons otherwise not ignorant of him, by the lustre of the 'Alexander's Feast;' and in addition to what Sir Walter has said respecting the fineness of the first stanza, the second may be instanced as one equally fine, if not finer; certainly with less mixture of what is weak. The remainder of the poem is unfortunately disfigured with conceits; one of which is associated in our memory with a similar puerility into which it tempted Handel. In the music to the line,

Depth of pains and height of passion,

he has put deep notes to the word depth, and high notes to the word height, as if there were analogy to depth or height in either case, and the terms might not have been convertible,—depth of passion and height of pain. But we wish to speak of these slips of great men without irreverence.

St Cecilia (Sir Walter Scott tells us) was, according to her legend, a Roman virgin of rank, who flourished during the reign of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. She was a Christian, and by her purity of life, and constant employment in the praises of her Maker, while yet on earth, obtained intercourse with an angel. Being married to Valerianus, a Pagan, she not only prevailed upon him to abstain from using any familiarity with her person, but converted him and his brother to Christianity. They were all martyrs for the faith in the reign of Septimius Severus. Chaucer has celebrated this legend in 'The Second Nonne's Tale,' which is almost a literal translation from the 'Golden Legend' of Jacobus Januensis. As all professions and fraternities, in ancient times, made choice of a tutelar saint, Cecilia was elected the protectress of music and musicians. It was even believed that she had invented the organ, although no good authority can be discovered for such an assertion. Her festival was celebrated from an early period by those of the profession over whom she presided.

The revival of letters with the Restoration was attended with a similar resurrection of the musical art; but the formation of a Musical Society for the annual commemoration of St Cecilia's day did not take place till 1680. An ode, written for the occasion, was set to music by the most able professor, and rehearsed before the society and their stewards upon the 22d November, the day dedicated to the patroness. The first effusions of this kind are miserable enough. Mr Malone has preserved a few verses of an ode, by an anonymous author, in 1683; that of 1684 was furnished by Oldham, whom our author has commemorated by an elegy; that of 1685 was written by Nahum Tate, and is given by Mr Malone, vol. i. p. 274. There was no performance in 1686; and, in 1687, Dryden furnished the following ode, which was set to music by Draghi, an eminent Italian composer. Of the annual festival, Motteux gives the following account:—

"The 22d of November, being St Cecilia's day, is observed throughout all Europe by the lovers of music. In Italy, Germany, France, and other countries, prizes are distributed on that day, in some of the most considerable towns, to such as make the best anthem in her praise. On that day, or the next (when it falls on a Sunday), most of the lovers of music, whereof many are persons of the first rank, meet at Stationers' Hall, in London, not through a principle of superstition, but to propagate the advancement of that divine science. A splendid entertainment is provided, and before it there is always a performance of music, by the best voices and hands in town; the words, which are always in the patroness's praise, are set by some of the greatest masters. This year (1691) Dr John Blow, that famous musician, composed the music; and Mr D'Urfey, whose skill in things of that nature is well known, made the words. Six stewards are chosen for each ensuing year, four of which are either persons of quality or gentlemen of note, and the two last either gentlemen of his Majesty's music, or some of the chief masters in town. This feast is one of the genteelst in the world; there are no formalities nor gatherings as at others, and the appearance there is always very splendid. Whilst the company is at table, the haut boys and trumpets play successively."

The merit of the following ode has been so completely lost in 'Alexander's Feast,' that few readers give themselves even the trouble of attending to it. Yet the first stanza has exquisite merit; and although the power of music is announced in those which follow, in a manner more abstracted and general, and therefore less striking than when its influence upon Alexander and his chiefs is placed before our eyes, it is perhaps only our intimate acquaintance with the second ode that leads us to undervalue the first, although containing the original ideas so exquisitely brought out and embodied in 'Alexander's Feast.'

A SONG FOR ST CECILIA'S DAY, 1637.

I.

From harmony, from heav'nly harmony,
This universal frame began.
When nature underneath a heap
Of jarring atoms lay,
And could not heave her head,
The tuneful voice was heard from high,
Arise, ye more than dead!
Then cold and hot, and moist and dry,
In order to their stations leap,
And Music's pow'r obey.
From harmony, from heav'nly harmony,
This universal frame began:
From harmony to harmony,
Through all the compass of the notes it ran,
The diapason* closing full in man.

II.

What passion cannot music raise and quell!
When Jubal struck the chorded shell,
His listening brethren stood around,
And, wond'ring, on their faces fell
To worship that celestial sound.
Less than a god they thought there could not dwell!
Within the hollow of that shell
That spoke so sweetly and so well.
What passion cannot Music raise and quell!

III.

The trumpet's loud clangour
Excites us to arms,
With shrill notes of anger
And mortal alarms;
The double, double, double beat
Of the thund'ring drum
Cries, Hark! the foes come;
Charge, charge! 'tis too late to retreat.

IV.

The soft complaining flute
In dying notes discovers
The woes of hopeless lovers,
Whose dirge is whisper'd by the warbling lute.

V.

Sharp violins proclaim
Their jealous pangs and desperation,
Fury, frantic indignation,
Depth of pains, and height of passion,
For the fair disdainful dame.

* The diapason, with musicians, is a chord including all notes. Perhaps Dryden remembered Spenser's allegorical description of the human figure and faculties:—

"The frame thereof seem'd partly circular,
And part triangular; O, work divine!
These two, the first and last, propitious are;
The one imperfect, mortal feminine,
The other immortal, perfect masculine;
And 'twixt them both a quadrato was the base,
Proportion'd equally by seven and nine;
Nine was the circle set in heaven's place;
All which compacted made a goodly diapason."
Fairy Queen, book II, canto ix. stanza 22.

VI.

But, oh! what art can teach,
What human voice can reach,
The sacred organ's praise?
Notes inspiring holy love,
Notes that wing their heav'nly ways
To mend the choirs above.

VII.

Orpheus could lead the savage race,
And trees uprooted left their place,
Sequacious of the lyre;
But bright Cecilia raised the wonder higher,
When to her organ vocal breath was giv'n;
An angel heard, and straight appear'd,
Mistaking earth for heav'n.

GRAND CHORUS.

As from the pow'r of sacred lays
The spheres began to move,
And sung the great Creator's praise
To all the bless'd above;
So when the last and dreadful hour
This crumbling pageant should devour,
The trumpet shall be heard on high,
The dead shall live, the living die,
And Music shall untune the sky.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. XLV.—HISTORY OF THE MARCHIONESS DE GANGES.

WE take this from the Ladies' Pocket Magazine for the year 1825, a neat little publication with good things in it. We seem as if we had read the story twenty times over elsewhere; but it is one of those, whose frightful truth must always bring it into collections of stories like the present. The offending parties, by the outrageous violence of their passions, and the desperate defiance of daylight and witnesses by one of them, were most likely madmen; at least, had an unhealthy or exaggerated organization amounting to madness. The author has attributed something of coquetry to the Marchioness, and added that it was "no doubt innocent." But any coquetry, however pardonable to the vanity of youth and beauty, is a very dangerous thing, and likely to bring heavy sorrows on the light shoulders that think it an ornament, especially if the heart be good, and capable of ultimate reflection. The poor Marchioness, by her affecting endeavours to secure her husband's life, appears to have been a woman of great natural tenderness and conscientiousness, and probably thought the endeavours incumbent upon her, out of remorse for that very coquetry.

This lady, whose misfortunes have served the subject of romances, poems, and melodramas, was born at Avignon, in the year 1636. Nature and fortune seemed to have united to load her with their favours in her early life, only that she might feel more acutely the horrors of her subsequent fate. When she was little more than thirteen she was married to the Marquis de Castellane, a grandson of the Duke of Villars. On her being introduced at Versailles, Louis XIV, who was then very young, distinguished her amidst the crowd of beauties which embellished the most brilliant court in Europe. The exquisite loveliness of the Marchioness, the illustrious family of her husband, the immense fortune which she had brought him, and the kind attention with which she had been honoured by the King, all conspired to render her the fashion, and she was soon known in Paris by no other appellation than that of the beautiful Provençal. Her first ties were soon broken. The Marquis de Castellane, who was in the naval service, perished by shipwreck on the coast of Sicily. The Marchioness, a blooming widow, rich, and without children, quickly saw all the most splendid youths of the court flocking around her, and suing for her hand. Her unpropitious star destined her to give the preference to the youthful Lanède, Marquis de Ganges. She was united to him in the month of July, 1658. Two months after the celebration of the marriage, the Marquis took his wife to Avignon. Their bliss during the first year of their union was uninterrupted. The Marquis de Ganges had two brothers, the Abbé and the Chevalier de Ganges. Both were so deeply smitten with the charms of their sister-in-law, that

+ St Cecilia is said to have invented the organ, though it is not known when or how she came by this credit. Chaucer introduces her as performing upon that instrument:—

"And while that the organes maden melodie,
To God alone thus in her heart sung she."

The descent of the angel we have already mentioned. She thus announces this celestial attendant to her husband:—

"I have an angel which that loveth me;
That with great love, when so I wake or sleep,
Is ready eye my body for to kepe."
The Second Nonne's Tale.

they instantly became enamoured of her. At the expiration of two or three years, some differences arose between the married couple: on the one side, too strong a tendency to dissipation, and on the other, a little coquetry, which, no doubt, was entirely innocent, occasioned this slight disagreement. The Abbé, who was naturally of an intriguing disposition, exasperated and reconciled the husband and wife, just as it suited his purposes. As his sister-in-law made him her confidant, he hoped that he should ultimately render her favourable to his passion; but, as soon as he disclosed it, his love was disdainfully rejected. With the same pretensions, the Chevalier made the same attempt, and was just as badly received. Not being able to succeed, the two brothers mutually confided to each other their criminal wishes, and, blending together both their resentments, they agreed to take joint vengeance. From that period they sought the means of getting rid of their sister-in-law. Poison was administered to the Marchioness in milk-chocolate; but, whether it was the poison, being put in with a trembling hand, was not sufficient in quantity, or that the milk blunted the effect of it, she sustained but little injury from it. The crime, however, did not pass undiscovered. To put a stop to the rumours on this subject, which were current in the city, the Marquis proposed to his wife to spend the autumn on his estate of Ganges. The Marchioness consented, which seems rather extraordinary; but in human events there are always some circumstances which are inexplicable. It appears that the Marchioness had forebodings of her fate; for in a letter to her mother, dated from the castle of Ganges, she declared that she could not traverse the gloomy avenues of that melancholy residence without a feeling of terror. Her husband, who had accompanied her thither, left her with his two brothers, and returned to Avignon. Not long before her quitting that city, the Marchioness had come into possession of a considerable inheritance; and it is a fact that proves that she suspected the family into which she had entered, and perhaps even her husband, that she made a will at Avignon, by which, in case of her death, she confided her property, till her children were of age, to Madame de Rossan, her mother. This will became the pretext of an inveterate persecution of the Marchioness by her brothers-in-law. They so strongly and perseveringly pressed her to revoke it, that she was at last weak enough to consent. They had no sooner carried their point, than they made a second attempt to poison her, but with no better success than before. The monsters had, however, gone too far to allow of their receding. Being one day obliged to keep her bed by indisposition, the marchioness saw her brothers-in-law enter the room. In one hand the Abbé had a pistol, and in the other a glass of poison: the Chevalier had a drawn sword under his arm. You must die, madam, said the Abbé; choose whether by pistol, sword, or poison. The marchioness, in a state bordering on distraction, could not believe her senses: she sprang out of bed, threw herself at the feet of her brothers, and asked what crime she had committed. Choose! was the only answer which the assassins made. Seeing that there was no hope of assistance, the unfortunate lady took the glass which the Abbé presented to her, and swallowed the contents, while he held the pistol to her breast. This horrible scene being finished, the monsters retired, and locked the victim into the room, promising to send to her a confessor, the spiritual aid of whom she had requested as a last favour. She was now alone; her first thought was to escape; her next was to try various means of removing from her stomach the poison which she had been forced to take: in the latter she partly succeeded by putting one of the locks of her hair down her throat. Then, half-naked, she threw herself into the court-yard, though the window was nearly eight yards from the ground. But how was she to escape from her murderers, who would speedily be aware of her flight, and were masters of all the outlets from the castle? The unfortunate marchioness implored the compassion of one of the servants, who let her out into the fields through a stable door. She was quickly pursued by the Abbé and Chevalier, who represented her as a mad woman to a farmer, in whose house she had taken refuge. It was here that the crime was to be consummated. The Chevalier, who hitherto had appeared less ferocious than his brother, followed her from room to room, and having come up with her in a remote apartment, the villain gave her two stabs in the breast, and five in the back, at the moment that she was trying to get away. The blows were so violent that the sword was broken, and part of it remained in the shoulder. The cries of the miserable lady brought the neighbours to the place, and the Abbé, who had staid at the door to prevent any help from coming to her, entered the house with the crowd. Enraged to see that the marchioness was not yet dead, he presented his pistol to her breast, but it missed fire. The spectators, who had hitherto been terrified, now rushed to seize the Abbé; but by dint of hard struggles he effected his escape. Madame de Ganges lived nineteen days after this event, and did not expire till she had publicly implored the divine mercy for her assassins. On her body being opened, the bowels were found to be corroded by the effect of the poison. Her husband was present during her last moments. There were very strong presumptions against him; but the marchioness, still compassionate amidst the severest sufferings, did all that lay in her power to clear him from suspicion. The parliament of Toulouse lost no time in instituting judicial proceedings against the criminals, and by a decree which was issued on the 21st of August, 1667, the Abbé and the Chevalier de Ganges were outlawed, and sentenced to be broken on the wheel. After having had his property confiscated, and been degraded from the rank of nobility, the marquis was condemned to perpetual banishment by the same decree. The Chevalier found shelter in Malta, and was subsequently killed in an engagement with the Turks. As to the Abbé, he sought an asylum in Holland, and there, under a fictitious name, he passed through a variety of adventures, which might furnish the subject of a romance. It is much to be regretted that two such execrable wretches should have escaped the punishment which was so justly awarded to them by the parliament of Toulouse.

SPECIMENS OF CELEBRATED AUTHORS.

BALZAC.

IN selecting, from our best storehouse, the Romance of Real Life in our last number, we met with the following entertaining account of Balzac, who, as a brother wit and dandy of the writer whom we gave some specimens of in No. 32, we thought would fitly come after him. Balzac was given to more real solemnity in his pomp than Voiture; but, like him, had real talents, and occasionally exhibits considerable grace and pleasantry. He partook with him the afflicting consequences of celebrity as a letter-writer, having at last such a load of correspondence, in answering which he felt himself bound to be witty, that he laboured, in a double sense, under the fatigue of his agreeableness. It was the fashion, at one time, for every gentleman in France, who aspired to be thought a man of taste, to write a letter to Balzac on purpose to get an answer, which he might show about. Notwithstanding the cruel turn of his bigotry, the result of bad breeding in matters of religion, our author was an honest man; and directed himself, in his will, to be buried "at the feet of the poor" in Angoulême, to the hospital and Capuchin convent of which city he was a generous benefactor.

Balzac (says the authority before-mentioned) was a French writer in the early part of the seventeenth century, the friend of Voiture, the favourite and correspondent of Cardinal Richieu, the Duke d'Espéron, and Cardinal de la Villette: as a public agent of the last, he resided at Rome in 1621, and part of the following year.

After making allowances for constitutional vanity, extravagance, and the faux-brillant, it cannot be denied that his letters contain many fine turns and witty passages; but, notwithstanding the assertions of his preface writer, Motte-Aignon (Troyes, 1634, 12mo. excellent type), the idea of publication was evidently uppermost in the mind of Balzac, at the moment he wrote; he is perpetually on the look-out for good things, and exhibits in every page strong proofs of literary labour, and the toil of invention.

It is to be lamented that so agreeable a writer, and so pleasant a man, should have imbibed the religious prejudices of the times and the intolerant spirit of his patrons; he joins heartily in the cry of persecution, and echoes the court cants against the Hugonots. In his fifteenth letter to the Duke d'Espéron, there occurs on this subject a piece of Jesuitism unworthy of a literary character and an honest man.

"The fall of heresy is decreed by heaven as certain as the day of judgment, and to oppose its suppression is to resist the will of God. It cannot be very difficult for a great Prince to find or to make them guilty; indeed, every species of deception is justifiable if it ultimately tends to the everlasting happiness of those we deceive."

"Do we ask a madman whether he chooses a straight-waistcoat? Would a father, who saw his son sinking in a rapid stream, suffer him to be drowned, rather than drag him out by the hair of his head?"

A sentiment of Balzac's, which follows this curious doctrine in the same letter, will be its best refutation: "No consideration can alter the nature of things; no circumstance or situation can make proper that which is of itself base and unjust."

In his twentieth letter, written from Rome to the Cardinal de la Villette, he acknowledges the receipt of a remittance, and proceeds to inform his Eminence of the manner in which he means to spend it. On this subject he writes as if he understood and valued the luxuries he describes; but the lively Frenchman cannot suppress extravagant hyperbole.

"In this broiling month (July) I use every method in my power to guard against the heat; four servants constantly fan my apartments; they raise wind enough to make a tempestuous sea."

"My wine is plunged into snow and ice till the moment I drink it; I pass half my time in the cold bath, and divide the other half between an orange grove, cooled by a refreshing fountain, and my sofa; I do not venture to cross the street, but in a coach."

"Other people are content with scenting flowers, I have hit on the method of eating and drinking them; I protest that my chamber smells stronger of perfumes than Arabia Felix, and I am so lavish of rose water and essence of jessamine, that I actually swim in it. While my neighbours, at this sultry season, are overloading their stomachs with solid food, I subsist almost entirely on birds fed with sugar: these, with jellies and fruit, are the whole of my diet."

He concludes with an acknowledgment, which is, in fact, though undesignedly, a severe satire on himself, or his patron, for paying his man so extravagantly for being idle; "these are the whole of the services I perform; such are the duties of my office."

His twenty-first letter, written in the following December, may be considered as a practical sermon on the passage I have recited; it was written during a severe fit of the gout, probably produced by his luxurious indolence.

After comparing this cruel disease to the wild beasts of Africa and the monsters of the deep, he proceeds to describe, with his usual vivacity, the weak state it had reduced him to:—"I am now become so valiant and courageous, that if a troop of horse pursued me, I would not run away; and so proud, that if his Holiness the Pope made me a visit, I should not wait on him to the door."

Persons better acquainted with the history of that period than the editor of this collection, will probably discover who it is that Balzac describes in the following words: "The loveliest Princess in Italy is married, is doomed to pass her days, and, alas, her nights, with a brute! Judge only of his person: he has a bull's neck, a face so overcharged with blood, that you expect him to sink down every moment in an apoplexy; teeth so black, that it would be as easy to whiten an Ethiopian; a nose and a stomach of so enormous a projection, &c. &c. In short, his supposing it possible for a pretty woman to love him, is a sin against nature and common sense."

The following is a brief but well drawn sketch of some eminent Italian personage, I suspect of the Pope himself.

"There has not been since the death of Nero, a Prince who has made a better buffoon; he composes verses and sets them to music, with the dexterity and skill of a master, he recites Ariosto with impressive correctness, and possesses a just taste in painting, sculpture, and vertù; in a word, he excels in every art, science, and trade, except his own: a thousand crowns a year has lately been given to an author who presented a learned and elaborate dissertation, in which he endeavours to prove that his generous patron is lineally descended from Julius Cæsar."

Balzac then proceeds, with the entertaining prolixity of a Frenchman, to describe the house in which he resides. "It is neither so elegant nor so costly as Fontainebleau, but it has a charming wood behind it, which the solar rays cannot penetrate, and is admirably calculated for an invalid with weak eyes, or to make an ordinary woman appear tolerably handsome."

"The trees, covered with foliage to their very roots, are crowded with turtle doves and pheasants; wherever I walk, I tread upon tulips and anemones, which I have ordered my gardener to plant among the other flowers, to prove that the French strangers do not suffer in a comparison with their Italian friends."

A truce at that time signed with the Hugonots, occasioned the loyal and religious zeal of Balzac again to burst forth. "I will not take the liberty," he observes, "to anticipate his Majesty's gracious intentions, but he may rest assured that nothing can ever soften the heart, or change the disposition of an heretic; however he may be flattered or soothed, and whatever he may say or swear, a Hugonot will always be rebellious against a Catholic sovereign."

"From the first rise of the heterodox opinions, to the present hour, they have always more or less defied the constituted authorities of every country in which they have resided; the cautionary towns are the focus of sedition and rebellion. Let us only suppose for the sake of argument that the king's subjects of the true religion were in a similar way to demand fortresses and towns, and, in proportion to their numbers?—little more would remain for our master to reign over, than his palaces, and royal demesnes."

In his forty-second letter, written at Rome, during the disturbance and intrigues which agitated the College of Cardinals previous to the election of Alexander Ludovirio, who afterwards assumed the Papal title of Gregory the Fifteenth, our author is satirical, lively, and pleasant;—these are his words.

"Listen, and I will relate strange things; one of the candidates for the triple crown keeps in constant pay six astrologers to consult the stars on the probability of his success; another takes money of two parties and coolly votes for a third; others are suddenly afflicted with the most dangerous complaints; and can scarcely rise from their chairs in the hope of being chosen, on the probability of another election speedily taking place; it is often found, that a cardinal of a puny constitution, sinking under age and infirmity, makes a robust and long-lived Pope; in short, I see on every sidesimony, fraud, simulation and dissimulation; good faith, moral purity, disinterestedness, and simplicity of heart, are altogether banished from the conclave."

The forty-ninth letter is written to his mistress, during a severe indisposition, and under the irritating impressions of jealousy. On this occasion, he gives utterance to the violence of his rage till he fancies his rant is sublime. "If my hand wielded but for one hour the thunderbolt of Jove," says the outrageous lover, "not a palace or a tower should stand intire on the surface of the globe."

THE DRAWING ROOM SCRAP-BOOK FOR 1835.

We take shame to ourselves for not having given a more instant notice of this Christmas and New Year periodical (a handsome present for the season), full of Miss Landon's poetry and of beautiful plates; but we hoped to write a longer article in reference to some feelings which have been touchingly expressed by the fair contributor of the letter-press; and as we cannot do this forthwith, we must delay our notice no longer. We rejoice to see, in this year's book, that Miss Landon has given signs of a resolution to turn her poetical faculty to its best and most poetical account,—that of seeing happiness wherever she can, instead of lamenting where it is not to be found. Poetry is angelical, and should strike pleasure wherever it comes. Indeed it cannot help doing so in some measure, even when it laments that there is no pleasure. Its very tones and pleasurable images refute it. But if it is content to repeat the common-places of regret, as the ground-work of its song, instead of animating hope and endeavour, it does but the more dangerously tend to keep up the useless delusions of despondency; whereas, like the sweetness of perfect womanhood itself, it should be incapable of doing us anything but service, and making us full of gratitude for joy doubled, or patience irresistible.

Among the plates are some specimens of oriental architecture (the most beautiful union of richness and grace in building), English landscapes by Mr Allen, likenesses of the two Miss Porters, Sir James Macintosh, &c., but above all, a portrait of Raphael, exquisite, and we have no doubt the genuine thing,—refined to the last degree, truly noble and self-possessed, serious, but with a world of pleasurable implied in the features and expression. We shall not be easy till we have it hanging up in our study. In the following passages from Miss Landon's poetry, we have kept some verses on it till the last. The latter part of them is supposed to be addressed to the painter by his mistress, the celebrated Fornarina. These three extracts contain three excellent lessons,—on the treatment of children, on the tasks of manhood, and on the enjoyments to be derived from imagination and affection when their tasks have succeeded in refining the world.

CHILDREN.

A word will fill the little heart
With pleasure and with pride;
It is a harsh, a cruel thing,
That such can be denied.

And yet how many weary hours
Those joyous creatures know;
How much of sorrow and restraint
They to their elders owe!

How much they suffer from our faults!
How much from our mistakes!
How often, too, mistaken zeal
An infant's misery makes.

We over-rule and over-teach,
We curb and we confine,
And put the heart to school too soon,
To learn our narrow line.

No: only taught by love to love,
Seems childhood's natural task;
Affection, gentleness, and hope,
Are all its brief years ask.

AMELIORATION AND THE FUTURE, MAN'S NOBLE TASKS.

Fall, fall, ye mighty temples to the ground:
Not in your sculptur'd rise
Is the real exercise
Of human nature's brightest power found.

'Tis in the lofty hope, the daily toil,
'Tis in the gifted line,
In each far thought divine
That brings down heaven to light our common soil.

'Tis in the great, the lovely, and the true,
'Tis in the generous thought,
Of all that man has wrought,
Of all that yet remains for man to do.

RAPHAEL.

Ah! not for him the dull and measur'd eye,
Which colours nothing in the common sky,
Which sees but night upon the starry cope,
And animates with no mysterious hope.
Which looks upon a quiet face, nor dreams
If it be ever tranquil as it seems;
Which reads no histories in a passing look,
Nor on the cheek which is the heart's own book,
Whereon it writes in rosy characters
Whate'er emotion in its silence stirs.

Such are the common people of the soul,
Of whom the stars write not in their bright scroll.
These, when the sunshine at the noontide makes
Golden confusion in the forest brakes,
See no sweet shadows gliding o'er the grass,
Which seems to fill with wild flowers as they pass;
These from the twilight music of the fount,
Ask not its secret and its sweet account:
These never seek to read the chronicle
Which hides within the hyacinth's dim-lit bell:
They know not of the poetry which lies
Upon the summer rose's languid eyes;
They have no spiritual visitings elysian,
They dream no dreamings, and they see no vision.

The young Italian was not of the clay,
That doth to dust one long allegiance pay.
No; he was tempered with that finer flame,
Which ancient fables say from heaven came;
The sunshine of the soul, which fills the earth
With beauty borrow'd from its place of birth.
Hence has the lute its song, the scroll its line;
Hence stands the statue glorious as its shrine;
Hence the fair picture, kings are fain to win,
The mind's creation from the world within.

THE FORNARINA TO RAPHAEL.

Not without me!—alone, thy hand
Forgot its art awhile;
Thy pencil lost its high command
Uncherish'd by my smile.
It was too dull a task for thee
To paint remember'd rays;
Thou, who wert want to gaze on me,
And colour from that gaze.

I know that I am very fair,
I would I were divine
To realize the shapes that share
Those midnight hours of thine.
Thou sometimes tell'st me, how in sleep
What lovely phantoms seem;
I hear thee name them, and I weep,
Too jealous of a dream.

But thou did'st pine for me, my love,
Aside thy colours thrown;
'Twas sad to raise thine eyes above
Unanswer'd by my own:
Thou who art wont to lift those eyes,
And gather from my face
The warmth of life's impression'd dyes,
Its colour and its grace.

Ah! let me linger at thy side,
And sing some sweet old song,
That tells of hearts as true and tried,
As to ourselves belong.
The love whose light thy colours give,
Is kindled at the heart,
And who shall bid its influence live,
My Raphael, if we part?

Cloth of Silver.—La Calprenede having got a good sun by a romance, bought a very rich suit of clothes; and an acquaintance asking him of what stuff his clothes were? he replied, "They are Silver;" which was the title of the piece which had procured him the money.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR CHOOSING A DWELLING-HOUSE

BY L. J. KENT, ESQ. ARCHITECT.

[From the 'Architectural Magazine,' a new monthly publication, discussing everything connected with house and homestead, and conducted with his usual industry, precision, and ability, by Mr London.]

SIR,—There are few persons, whatever may be their rank in society, who have not occasion, at some period or other of their lives, to make choice of a house. Perhaps I should not be far wrong were I to say that this duty has to be performed by most men several times. How much of health, comfort, economy in living, and respectability of appearance depends on the choice made, few people, I believe, are aware; and still fewer have an idea of the seemingly trifling, and, I may almost say, invisible circumstances, on which the comfort of a house sometimes depends. Before entering on the details of my subject, I shall just mention one of the seemingly trifling circumstances alluded to.

Suppose a new house, most substantially built, and in every apparent circumstance eligible either for purchase or occupation, and that the intended occupier or purchaser has completed his bargain, without examining the subsoil, and the manner in which the foundation walls are built. On the supposition that the subsoil is dry, all will be very well, and the house will turn out what it appears to be. But supposing, on the other hand, that the subsoil should be a clay, or a stratum of moist gravel, or moist soil of any kind, and that the foundation walls should have been built with spongy bricks and bad mortar, and met with good hard brick or Roman cement; the consequence of this will be, that the kitchen and other apartments on the ground floor will appear dry and comfortable for a year, or perhaps longer; but after this, from the bottoms of the walls acting like sponges in absorbing moisture from the soil, the damp will rise up through them more and more every year, till, at last, it will reach 6 ft. or 8 ft. above the exterior surface of the ground. I could refer to a house, in all other respects most substantially and judiciously built, and surrounded by dry areas as deep as the footing of the walls, but on a clayey soil, and without cement being used in the foundations, in which the damp, in the course of eight years, has risen as high as the parlour floor; and the family occupying the house are now quite surprised at finding their furniture becoming mouldy there, after having been for years without experiencing anything of the kind. This, I think, will show the importance of using cement in the foundations of all houses placed on damp soils, and of examining the foundations under the lowest floors before taking a house, to see if this has been done. I shall now proceed to my subject.

The choice of a house will in some respects depend on the size and character of the house required, the purpose for which it is to be used, and the station in life of the party intending to occupy it. There are some things, however, common to all houses, which should be especially attended to, whether in a building intended solely for business, or in a private residence. The first points to be considered are, the nature and character of the soil on which the house is erected, and whether it is effectually drained, or is capable of being drained so as to be kept perfectly dry; for no advantages in other respects can compensate for a damp situation, both as regards health and property. A house built in a damp situation, even though the greatest care has been taken in making an artificial foundation of concrete (which has lately been done in many places), is still unwholesome; and should the materials of the foundation be of inferior quality, such as plaster (that is, soft half-burnt) bricks, and soft pine timber (also a common case), it will speedily decay, and be a constant and unavoidable expense. A gravelly soil is the best to build on, provided care be taken to keep out the land springs, by drains below the level of the bottom of the walls; or hard sand, if gravel cannot be found: but soft sand or clay is to be avoided if possible.

The construction of the house is a matter of serious importance to any person about to take a lease; as, by doing this, he will probably render himself liable to reinstate dilapidations, many of which may be in an incipient state when he takes possession. It is therefore quite advisable, and, indeed, is imperative on every person who is unacquainted with the nature of building, to employ a respectable architect, surveyor, or builder, to examine the strength and durability of the house he is about to engage, in order to ascertain whether it is likely to remain strong and firm for a number of years. The intended tenant should also try to discover the nature of the soil, by which he will also ascertain that of the air which he will have to breathe. In low damp situations, it is well known that the air is at all times charged with a greater degree of moisture than is the case in dry open situations. A moist air suits very few constitutions, even in our humid climate, and seldom fails to bring on rheumatism, more especially in those who cannot afford to live well and take abundance of exercise.

Another important matter to be attended to, is the thorough ventilation of houses; for should the air become stagnant from want of a free ventilation, particularly in houses that have a story underground, it is highly injurious to the persons living, and particularly sleeping, in them. There should, therefore, be windows both in the back and front, and, when possible, at the sides also. From rooms in the basement story, and cellars that have neither fire-places nor windows, there should be air-flues carried up to the open air. Care should likewise be taken that the floor in the basement story is raised above the soil, and that air is freely admitted to circulate between the soil and the floor, whether that floor is of wood or stone. Where this is properly attended to, these low rooms may be used as sleeping-rooms; but where it is not, they are by no means fit or proper for any human being to sleep in.

Stability, light and air are three grand desiderata in every house, and should be particularly attended to in the choice of one. The roof is a part of a house which should be carefully examined; for if it be badly constructed (too common a case with the houses built on speculation, both in London and the country), with narrow gutters, and those difficult of access, you may generally expect the wet to penetrate to the upper rooms after any heavy fall of snow or rain. Many of the best houses built in London are covered with lead; this is the best of covering. The next is slate, if of good quality, and with wide lead gutters, with lead flushings (strips of leads covering joints) to them, and to these parts of the walls which are carried up higher than the slating. Zinc-covered roofs seldom keep out the wet many years; and tiles in London are now rarely used, except in very inferior houses.

In your choice of a house, having satisfied yourself that the site on which it is built is healthy; the drainage good; the roof properly constructed, and free of access, not merely for the purpose of keeping out the wet, but as a safeguard and means of escape in case of fire; the next portion of the building to examine is the substance of the walls, with the materials of which they are composed. The soft, half-burnt bricks, called plaster-bricks by the builders, ought never to be employed in the walls of any building which it is desirable to keep dry. Whenever these bricks are found in the foundation of the party walls, the house should be rejected; and if they are seen in the outside of any of the external walls, you may expect every beating rain which falls to penetrate into them. Such walls suck in the water like a sponge, and give it out to all the interior fittings-up and finishings. Sound, hard, well-burnt bricks, called stocks, are the strongest, most durable, and best calculated to resist the weather, and keep the inside of a house dry, provided the mortar used with them is composed of fresh-burnt stone lime and sharp road grit or sand, and is well mixed. The stock bricks absorb but little moisture, and that little is soon evaporated; whereas the plaster or soft bricks absorb a large quantity of moisture, and allowing that to pass through them into the middle of the wall, are a long time wet; because the centre of a wall retains the moisture long after the surface is dry. It is particularly desirable, as I have before stated, for the walls of houses built on clay, or on any moist soil, to have a few courses of the brick-work above the ground laid in Roman cement.

The timber used in any building should be timber of slow growth, such as the fir of cold climates (Norway or Sweden, for example), or oak. If for work under or near the ground, the oak should be of English growth; but the American oak may be used with propriety above ground. Oak is the only timber fit for joists and sleepers (joists laid on the tops of dwarf walls) next the ground, unless the soil is particularly dry, and the floor well ventilated.

The strength of the joists and other timbers, of which the several floors are composed, is another subject of importance to every one about to take a lease of a house. If these are weak, they will necessarily shake, if the tenant allows his friends to enjoy the delightful recreation of dancing on them; and though the floors may not absolutely give way, yet I have known the ceiling and cornices of many modern houses from this cause, amongst others, very unceremoniously desert their posts, and pay their respects to the floor of the room they were intended to crown. This is an accident much to be deprecated, especially as it is very likely to happen (as it did at the house of a friend of mine) at a time of all others the most annoying, viz.: when you have friends with you, and are in the highest spirits, little anticipating such an event. The floors in houses of the first and second class of buildings, are usually pugged (filled in between the floor of one room and the ceiling of that below it, with mortar, &c.) to destroy sound, and as a security against fire. When this is not done, it is an unpardonable omission on the part of the builder, as the expence is small, and the benefit great. All the partitions of a house should, if possible, be brick walls. At all events, no timber partitions ought to be admitted in the basement or lower story of any house, nor any of the upper stories, except where, from the arrangement of the rooms, the partitions on the upper floors cannot be placed perpendicularly over the lower partitions; even in this case, the timber partitions ought to be trussed up, so as to rest their weight upon the side walls. All timber partitions should be filled in with brick nogging. If this were universally done, and the party and other walls and partitions plastered, so as to prevent all draughts of air, it would tend more to check the progress of fire, than any other mode of construction: indeed, I think, if you were to make a fire on the floor of a room so constructed, it would burn itself out, without communicating with the timber partition; or, at all events, so little would be the tendency of the fire to spread (for want of a current of air), that a very moderate application of water would put it out. But where the floors are pugged with mortar, care must be taken that the timbers are well seasoned and dried, and not taken, as is customary, even in some of our largest buildings, wet out of the Thames, sawed, and fixed, and closed up in the building in a few weeks, reeking with wet, and exuding moisture at their extremities after the weight of the superincumbent walls is put on them. The dry rot and premature decay are the frequent consequences of this careless and ignorant mode of building.

The particular character of houses in towns is, that they are many stories high, having generally one story in the basement, wholly or partially below the surface of the ground; over this is a ground or parlour floor, a one-pair or drawing-room floor, a two-pair or best bed-room floor, and an attic floor. This is the general arrangement; but many houses have other attics, or garrets above these, in the roof. This arises from the high price of the ground in towns, and may be excusable in great thoroughfares, where shops let at a high rate; for even if the landlord were desirous of giving his tenant a wide frontage to enable him to have two rooms in front, and some space behind, it would most likely be divided by the tenant, and underlet. A serious evil, however, arises from the great landed proprietors round London allowing the ground to be divided and subdivided by speculating builders or agents, so that there is now scarcely a house built with a yard large enough to dry a few clothes in; a garden is out of the question, except in some few instances, and those are far between. This is a subject worthy of the attention of the legislature; and some restraints should be imposed on landlords, particularly as to drainage and roads. If, before a landlord could dispose of his land for building purposes, he were compelled to engage to form the roads and footpaths next to his intended houses to the satisfaction of the parish or some other authority, the sewers to the satisfaction of the commissioners of sewers, and to see that good and sufficient drains from every house were built, a penalty being incurred if any house on his estate should be inhabited before an effectual drainage were formed, it would tend very much to the health and the comfort of the middle class of society, and the poor especially.

The restraint imposed by the Building Act has, in the neighbourhood of London, tended much to produce a kind of house called a fourth-rate house; and the smallest of these are built principally for the occupation of the poor, in the suburbs of London, in inferior situations. These houses consist of two rooms; they have generally from 12 ft. to 14 ft. frontage, and are from 12 ft. to 14 ft. deep, having an access on the ground floor in front into the lower room, and steps outside at the back leading into the upper room. Three, four, or more have a yard and other conveniences in common. Dwellings of this description are rarely properly drained or ventilated, and therefore form nurseries for the cholera and all other diseases. They are usually let at from three shillings to four shillings per week each room.

There are some houses of this class presenting a very decent appearance, and occupied by respectable tradesmen and mechanics, having about 15 ft. wide in front by 23 feet deep, with a basement story, cellars and wash-house, a parlour floor of two small rooms, a drawing-room floor over, and two bed-rooms over that, which generally let for, from 25s. to 40s. a-year rent, according to the number of rooms they contain, and the conveniences they afford. The back room on the two pair floor of a house of this description is obliged, by the Building Act, to be curbed (contracted by being carried up into the roof) which spoils the room; and the gutters are frequently so narrow at the bottom of the curb, and they convey the water into, rather than off, the house.

The next class of town house, according to the Building Act, is the third-rate house, which is from about 17 ft. to 18 ft. wide in front, and from 28 ft. to 29 ft. deep. Houses of this class generally contain the same number of rooms as the largest size fourth-rate, with an attic story over, in addition; this story is sometimes partly in the roof, but more generally the walls are carried up to allow the rooms to be square. At the back of the parlour floor there is frequently built a small room, used as a dressing room or store room. These houses have generally two windows in the width of their front.

The next class of house, the second-rate, is of a better and larger description, and frequently possesses conveniences that cause it to be occupied by the wealthy tradesman and gentleman of good fortune. It is usually 20 ft. or 30 ft. wide in front, by 30 ft. to 40 ft. deep, with additional rooms at the back. It can, and does in many instances, contain all the apartments required by a family keeping their carriage, footman, housekeeper, &c.; and has attached to it, or in some mews in the immediate neighbourhood, a coach-house and stable. These houses are usually built with two windows in the width of the front, but many of them have three windows in this width. The rooms are higher and better finished than in the houses of the third and fourth classes.

The first-rate class of buildings embraces all houses containing more than 900 superficial feet on the ground floor, and includes the residences of the nobility and gentry and the wealthiest class of professional men and merchants. Houses of this class may be said to be unrestricted as to size, either in height or width; the other classes are by the Building Act restricted as to dimensions in their plan, their height, and expence; though the height and expence of a house are not now taken into consideration in deciding the rate or class to which it belongs.

A new Building Act is drawn up, and approved, which, it is expected, will pass into a law next year; and it is greatly to be hoped that in this new law the absurdities of the present act will be avoided.

BURNS.

He was often advised to write a tragedy: time and means were not lent him for this; but through life he enacted a tragedy, and one of the deepest. We question whether the world has since witnessed so utterly and so scene; whether Napoleon himself, left to brawl with Sir Hudson Lowe, and perish on his rock, "amid the melancholy main," presented to the mind such "a spectacle of pity and fear," as did this intrinsically nobler, gentler, and perhaps greater soul, wasting itself away in a hopeless struggle with base entanglements, which coiled closer and closer round him, till only death opened him an outlet. Conquerors are a race with whom the world could well dispense; nor can the hard intellect, the unsympathising loftiness, and high but selfish enthusiasm of such persons inspire us in general with any affection; at best, it may excite amazement; and their fall, like that of a pyramid, will be beheld with a certain sadness and awe. But a true poet, a man in whose heart resides some effluence of wisdom, some tone of the "eternal melodies," is the most precious gift that can be bestowed on a generation; we see in him a freer, purer development of whatever is noblest in ourselves; his life is a rich lesson to us; and we mourn his death as that of a benefactor who loved and taught us.

Such a gift had nature in her bounty bestowed on us in Robert Burns; but with queen-like indifference she cast it from her hand, like a thing of no moment; and it was defaced and torn asunder, as an idle bauble, before we recognised it. To the ill-starred Burns was given the power of making man's life more venerable; but that of wisely guiding his own was not given. Destiny—for so in our ignorance we must speak, his faults, the faults of others, proved too hard for him; and that spirit which might have soared, could it have but walked, soon sunk to the dust; its glorious faculties trodden under foot in the blossom, and died, we may almost say, without ever having lived. And so kind and warm a soul, so full of inborn riches, of love to all living and lifeless things! How his heart flows out in sympathy over universal nature, and, in her bleakest provinces, discerns a beauty and a meaning! The daisy falls not unheeded under his ploughshare, nor the ruined nest of that "wee, cowering, timorous beastie," cast forth, after all its provident pains, to "thole the sleety drizzle, and cranreuch cauld." The "hoar visage," of winter delights him: he dwells with a sad and oft-returning fondness on these scenes of solemn desolation; but the voice of the tempest becomes an anthem to his ears; he loves to walk in the sounding woods, for it raises his thoughts to Him "that walketh on the wings of the wind." A true poet-soul, for it needs but to be struck, and the sound it yields will be music! But observe him chiefly as he mingles with his brother-men. What warm, all-comprehending fellow-feeling! What trustful, boundless love! What generous exaggeration of the object loved! His rustic friend, his nut-brown maiden, are no longer mean and homely, but a hero and queen, whom he prizes as the paragons of earth. The rough scenes of Scottish life, not seen by him in any Arcadian illusion, but in the rude contradiction, in the smoke and soil of a too harsh reality, are still lovely to him. Poverty is indeed his companion; but love also, and courage; the simple feelings, the worth, the nobleness, that dwell under the straw roof, are dear and venerable to his heart; and thus over the lowest providences of man's existence he pours the glory of his own soul, and they rise, in shadow and sunshine, softly brightened into a beauty which other eyes discern not in the highest. He has a just self-consciousness which too often degenerates into pride; yet it is a noble pride, for defiance, not for offence; no cold suspicious feeling, but a frank and social one. The peasant poet bears himself, we might say, like a king in exile: he is cast among the low, and feels himself equal to the highest; yet he claims no rank, that none may be disputed to him. The forward he can repel; the supercilious he can subdue; pretensions of wealth or ancestry are of no avail with him; there is a fire in that dark eye under which the "insolence of condescension" cannot thrive. In his abasement, in his extreme need, he forgets not for a moment the majesty of poetry and manhood. And yet, far as he feels himself above common men, he wanders not apart from them, but mixes warmly in their interests; nay throws himself into their arms, and, as it were, entreats them to love him. It is moving to see how, in his darkest dependency, this proud being still seeks relief from friendship; unbores himself even to the unworthy; and, amid tears, strains to his glowing heart a heart that knows only the name of friendship. And yet he was quick to learn; a man of keen vision; "before whom common disguises afforded no concealment. His understanding saw through the hollowness even of accomplished deceivers; but there was a generous credulity in his heart. And so did our peasant show himself among us; a soul like an Æolian harp, in whose strings the vulgar wind, as it passed through them, changed itself into articulate melody." And this was he for whom the world found no sadder business than quarrelling with smugglers and vintners, computing excise dues upon tallow, and gauging ale barrels! In such toils was that mighty spirit sorrowfully wasted; and a hundred years may pass on before another such is given us to waste.

A Scottish peasant's life was the meanest and rudest of all-lives, till Burns became a poet in it, and a poet of it, found it a man's life, and therefore significant to men. A thousand battle-fields remain unsung; but the wounded here has not perished without its memorial; a balm of mercy yet breathes on us from its dumb agonies, because a poet was there. Our Halloween had passed and repassed in a rude awe and laughter, since the era of the Druids; but no Theocritus, till Burns, discerned in it the materials of a Scottish Idyl: neither was the Holy Fair any Council of Trent, or Roman Jubilee; but, nevertheless, superstition, and hypocrisy, and fraud having been propitious to him, in this man's hand it became a poem, instinct with satire and genuine comic life. Let but the true poet be given us, we repeat it, place him where and how you will, and true poetry will not be wanting.

There is a true old saying, that "love furthers knowledge," but, above all, it is the living essence of that knowledge which makes poets; the first principle of its existence, increase, activity. Of Burns's fervid affection, his generous all-embracing love, we have spoken already as of the grand distinction of his nature, seem equally, in word and deed, in his Life and in his Writings. It were easy to multiply examples. Not man only, but all that environs man in the material and moral universe is lovely in his sight; the "hoary hawthorn," the "troop of grey plover," the "solitary curlew," all are dear to him; all live in this earth along with him, and to all he is knit as in mysterious brotherhood. How touching is it, for instance, that amidst the gloom of personal misery, brooding over the wintry desolation without him and within him, he thinks of the "ourie cattle," and "silly sheep," and their sufferings in the pitiless storm!

I thought me on the ourie cattle,
Or silly sheep, wha bide this brattle
O' wintry war;
Or through the drift, deep-lairing, sprattle,
Beneath a scaur.

Ilk hopping bird, wee helpless thing,
That in the merry months o' spring,
Delighted me to hear thee sing,
What comes o' thee?
Where wilt thou cow'r thy chattering wing,
And close thy ee?

The tenant of the mean hut with its "ragged roof and chinky wall," has a heart to pity even these. This is worth several homilies on mercy; for it is the voice of mercy herself. Burns, indeed, lives in sympathy; his soul rushes forth into all realms of being; nothing that has existence can be indifferent to him. The very devil he cannot hate with right orthodoxy!

But fare ye weel, auld nickie-ben;
O wad ye tak a thought and men!
Ye aiblins might—I dinna ken—
Still hae a stake;
I'm wae to think upo' your den,
Even for your sake!

He did not know, probably, that Sterne had been beforehand with him. "He is the father of curses and lies," said Dr Slop; "and is cursed and damned already;" "I am sorry for it," quoth my uncle Toby. "A poet without love, were a physical and metaphysical impossibility."—(From a masterly article in the Edinburgh Review, by Thomas Carlyle.)

THE SQUIRREL.

[The signature at bottom of these verses made us call to mind, with repentance, something which we fear we insinuated on a former occasion respecting a want of sentiment on the part of our respected correspondent, the author of the Letter on English and French Ladies.—Ed.]

STANZAS ON SEEING A DEAD SQUIRREL LYING IN THE STREETS, JULY 13, 1884.

I.

I SPIED A Squirrel in a passage lone,
Her once fair polished coat besmeared with mire;
Her head was pillowed on a filthy stone,
And quench'd the full black eye's quick sparkling fire,
And fled the spirit that could never tire,
But brisk from morn till twilight-gathering night,
Bounded from brake to oak-branch, mounting higher,
And then aye deftly played her gambols light,
High rocked among the leaves and safe from man's despite.

II.

And there, perchance, thou hadst a little nest
Scooped in the trunk, and lined with mosses dry,
Where all thy young ones lay in quiet rest,
Till summer's heat or pelting storm was by.
Oft has the stranger marked thy cautious eye
Peering from out the hole; and being come
The wished-for hour when no rude step was nigh,
Thou'dst lead thy silky little ones from home,
And teach them gamesome pranks, and 'mong the woods to roam.

III.

Thou hadst thy little sorrows, joys, and pains,
Thy hopes in sunshine and thy fears in night:
The falcon, hovering o'er thy wooded plains,
Has wrung full oft thy bosom with affright,
And caused thee downward spring in headlong flight,
And hid thy young in some impervious bush,
Where, snugly hid from the fell harpy's sight,
They all, unconscious, harboured with the thrush,
For dangers mingle castes and common scruples hush.

IV.

And when the tyrant of the upper air
Winged slowly on and dissipated fear,
How gay ye climbed the forest branches fair,
To where the chestnuts 'tween the foliage peer—
Bounding aloft—now farther—and now near—
While the friend thrush, companion in your woe,
Joins in the gen'ral joy with notes full clear,
And modest perched upon a lowly bough—
Thus all is mirth above, and harmony below.

V.

Mischance that mars us all, spared not e'en thee,
Thou loving atom of bright Nature's world!
Rude clambering hands invaded thy tall tree,
And ruin on thy habitation hurld.
Ah me! the stream still flows as then it purld,
And birds yet sing, as in thy merrier time
They sang on mossy branch that downward curld;
But gone art thou in summer's balmy prime,
Unmourned, unheeded all, save in my lowly rhyme.

VI.

In wired cage wast thou hereafter kept,
Which turned about, aye restless, round and round;
And not one gentle eye thy sorrows wept,
For few think Squirrels feel a mental stound,
But love their prisons as the forest ground.
Thy little ones thou ne'er didst see again,
Some died, some lived in loathsome prison bound;
And thou, their parent, languished on in pain,
Till death in mercy came, and snapp'd life's tedious chain.

VII.

And there thou art—the beautiful, the gay,
No more. "Where be thy gambols now?"—the prank
Fantastic?—all the merriment of play
Which charmed the woodman, as on daisied bank
He wiped the toil-drops, gathering cold and dank,
And rested on his axe? The iron wheel
Of cars has crushed thee,—street-curs, thin and lank,
Have mumbled with their jaws, in search of meal—
There art thou—scorned of all—and spurned by every heel!

VIII.

Farewell, poor Squirrel! thou hast lived thy day,
And though no greenwood trees beheld thee die,
Nor balmy breezes bore thy breath away—
Well hast thou lived, and eke right joyously,
In this mixt world of mirth and misery.
Humble my theme, and of no ancient date—
Yet, Reader! view it not with scornful eye,—
Tasks more ungrateful fall in man's estate
Than singing Squirrel's spring, or mourning her sad fate.

TABLE TALK.

Good Logic.—In the dedication of a piece of his, Scarron speaks in this manner to the king: "I shall endeavour to convince your majesty, that to do me a little good would be doing yourself no hurt: if you did me a little good, I should be more cheerful than I am; if I was more cheerful than I am, my comedies would be merrier; if my comedies were merrier, your majesty would be more diverted; if you were the more diverted, your money could not be said to be thrown away. All these conclusions hang together so naturally, that, methinks, I could not hold out against them were I a great monarch, instead of being a miserable indigent creature."

SELF-AID AGAINST PERTURBATION.

—When our diseas'd affections
Harmful to human freedom, and storm-like
Inferring darkness to th' infected mind
Oppress our comforts, 'tis but letting in
The light of reason, and a purer spirit
Take in another way; like rooms that fight
With windows 'gainst the wind, yet let in light."

CHAPMAN.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

WE have had thoughts of doing what SCHOLASTICUS wishes.

T. F. T. appears to have an honourable and earnest nature, and no mean feeling of the tone of poetry; but two of his sonnets are not admissible in this journal on account of their polemical and political tendencies, and we are doubtful whether the third would sufficiently interest the general reader.

We will look into the book mentioned by W. D. who writes to us under a new and venerable signature.

J. A. has been merely kept out, not at all willingly, by a press of matter; and while we are writing this notice, we must express a fear that we shall be forced to omit paying our debts to other writers, J. and M. S. included, till next week. THE CAT BY THE FIRE.

A BLAZING fire, a warm rug, candles lit and curtains drawn, the kettle on for tea (if rich, you may have a silver kettle, and so partake the pleasures of the poor), and finally, the cat before you, attracting your attention,—it is a scene which every body likes unless he has a morbid aversion to cats; which is not common. There are some nice inquirers, it is true, who are apt to make uneasy comparisons of cats with dogs,—to say they are not so loving, that they prefer the house to the man, &c. But agreeably to the good old maxim, that “comparisons are odious,” our readers, we hope, will continue to like what is likeable in anything, for its own sake, without trying to render it unlikeable from its inferiority to something else,—a process by which we might ingeniously contrive to put soot into every dish that is set before us, and to reject one thing after another, till we were pleased with nothing. Here is a good fireside, and a cat to it; and it would be our own fault, if, in removing to another house and another fireside, we did not take care that the cat removed with us. Cats cannot look to the moving of goods, as men do. If we would have creatures considerate towards us, we must be so towards them. It is not to be expected of everybody, quadruped or biped, that they should stick to us in spite of our want of merit, like a dog or a benevolent sage. Besides, stories have been told of cats very much to the credit of their benignity; such as their following a master about like a dog, waiting at a gentleman's door to thank him for some obligation over night, &c. And our readers may remember the history of the famous Godolphin Arabian, upon whose grave a cat that had lived with him in the stable, went and stretched itself, and died.

The cat purrs, as if it applauded our consideration,—and gently moves its tail. What an odd expression of the power to be irritable and the will to be pleased there is in its face, as it looks up at us. We must own, that we do not prefer a cat in the act of purring, or of looking in that manner. It reminds us of the sort of smile, or simper (simper is too weak and fleeting a word) that is apt to be in the faces of irritable people, when they are pleased to be in a state of satisfaction. We prefer, for a general expression, the cat in a quiet unpretending state, and the human countenance with a look indicative of habitual grace and composure, as if it were not necessary to take any violent steps to prove its amiability,—the “smile without a smile,” as the poet beautifully calls it.*

Furthermore, (in order to get rid at once of all that may be objected to poor Pussy, as boys at school get down their bad dumpling as fast as possible, before the meat comes) we own we have an objection to the way in which a cat sports with a mouse before she kills it, tossing and jerking it about like a ball, and letting it go, in order to pounce upon it with the greater relish. And yet what right have we to apply human measures of cruelty to the inferior reflectability of a cat? Perhaps she has no idea of the mouse's being alive, in the sense that we have,—most likely she looks upon it as a pleasant moveable toy, made to be eaten,—a sort of lively pudding, that oddly jumps hither and thither. It would be hard to beat into the head of a country squire, of the old class, that there is any cruelty in hunting a hare; and most assuredly it would be still harder to beat mouse-sparing into the head of a cat. You might read the most pungent essay on the subject into her ear, and she would only sneeze at it.

As to the unnatural cruelties, which we sometimes read of, committed by cats upon their offspring, they are exceptions to the common and beautiful rules of nature, and accordingly we have nothing to do with them. They are traceable to some unnatural circumstances of breeding or position. Enormities as monstrous are to be found among human beings, and argue nothing against the general character of the species. Even dogs are not always immaculate; and sages have made slips. Dr Franklin cut off his son with a shilling, for differing with him in politics.

But cats resemble tigers? They are tigers in miniature? Well,—and very pretty miniatures they are. And what has the tiger himself done, that he has not a right to his dinner, as well as Jones? A tiger treats a man much as a cat does a mouse;—granted; but we have no reason to suppose that he is aware of the man's sufferings, or means anything but to satisfy his hunger; and what have the butcher and poulterer been about, meanwhile? The tiger, it is true, lays about him a little superfluously sometimes, when he gets into a sheepfold, and kills more than he eats; but does not the Squire or the Marquis do pretty much like him in the month of September? Nay, do we not hear of venerable judges, that would not hurt a fly, going about in that refreshing month, seeking whom they may lame? See the effect of habit and education! And you can educate the tiger in no other way than by attending to his stomach. Fill that, and he will want no men to eat, probably not even to lame. On the other hand, deprive Jones of his dinner for a day or two, and see what a state he will be in, especially if he is by nature irascible. Nay, keep him from it for half an hour, and observe the tiger propensities of his stomach and fingers,—how worthy of killing he thinks the cook, and what boxes of the ear he feels inclined to give the footboy.

Animals, by the nature of things, in their present state, dispose of one another into their respective stomachs, without ill-will on any side. They keep down the several populations of their neighbours, till time may come when superfluous population of any kind need not exist, and predatory appearances may vanish from the earth, as the wolves have done from England. But whether they may or not, is not a question by a hundred times so important to moral inquirers as into the possibilities of human education and the nonsense of ill-will. Show the nonentity of that, and we may all get our dinners as jovially as we can, sure of these three undoubted facts,—that life is long, death short, and the world beautiful. And so we bring our thoughts back again to the fireside, and look at the cat.

Poor Pussy! she looks up at us again, as if she thanked us for those vindications of dinner; and symbolically gives a twist of a yawn, and a lick to her whiskers. Now she proceeds to clean herself all over, having a just sense of the demands of her elegant person,—beginning judiciously with her paws, and fetching amazing tongues at her hind-hips. Anon, she scratches her neck with a foot of rapid delight, leaning her head towards it, and shutting her eyes, half to accommodate the action of the skin, and half to enjoy the luxury. She then rewards her paws with a few more touches;—look at the action of her head and neck, how pleasing it is, the ears pointed forward, and the neck gently arching to and fro. Finally, she gives a sneeze, and another twist of mouth and whiskers, and then, curling her tail towards her front claws, settles herself on her hind quarters, in an attitude of bland meditation.

What does she think of?—Of her saucer of milk at breakfast? or of the thump she got yesterday in the kitchen, for stealing the meat? or of her own meat, the Tartar's dish, noble horse-flesh? or of her friend the cat next door, the most impassioned of serenaders? or of her little ones, some of whom are now large, and all of them gone? Is that among her recollections when she looks pensive? Does she taste of the noble prerogative-sorrows of man?

She is a sprightly cat, hardly past her youth; so happening to move the fringe of the rug a little with our foot, she darts out a paw, and begins plucking it and inquiring into the matter, as if it were a challenge to play, or something lively enough to be eaten. What a graceful action of that foot of hers, between delicacy and petulance,—combining something of a thrust out, a beat, and a scratch. There seems even something of a little bit of fear in it, as if just enough to provoke her courage, and give her the excitement of a sense of hazard. We remember being much amused with seeing a kitten manifestly making a series of experiments upon the patience of its mother,—trying how far the latter would put up with positive bites and thumps. The kitten ran at her every moment, gave her a knock or a bite of the tail; and then ran back again, to recommence the assault. The mother sat looking at her, as if betwixt tolerance and admiration, to see how far the spirit of the family was inherited or improved by her sprightly offspring. At length, however, the “little Pickle” presumed too far, and the mother, lifting up her paw, and meeting her at the very nick of the moment, gave her one of the most unsophisticated boxes of the ear we ever beheld. It sent her rolling half over the room, and made her come to a most ludicrous pause, with the oddest little look of premature and wincing meditation.

That lapping of the milk out of the saucer is what one's human thirst cannot sympathize with. It seems as if there could be no satisfaction in such a series of atoms of drink. Yet the saucer is soon emptied; and there is a refreshment to one's ears in that sound of plashing with which the action is accompanied, and which seems indicative of a like comfort to Pussy's mouth. Her tongue is thin, and can make a spoon of itself. This, however, is common to other quadrupeds with the cat, and does not, therefore, more particularly belong to our feline consideration. Not so the electricity of its coat, which gives out sparks under the hand; its passion for the herb valerian (did the reader ever see one roll in it? it is a mad sight) and other singular delicacies of nature, among which perhaps is to be reckoned its taste for fish, a creature with whose element it has so little to do, that it is supposed even to abhor it; though lately we read somewhere of a swimming cat, that used to fish for itself. And this reminds us of an exquisite anecdote of dear, dogmatic, diseased, thoughtful, surly, charitable Johnson, who would go cern not in the highest. He has a just self-consciousness which too often degenerates into pride; yet it is a noble pride, for defence, not for offence; no cold suspicious feeling, but a frank and social one. The peasant poet bears himself, we might say, like a king in exile: he is cast among the low, and feels himself equal to the highest; yet he claims no rank, that none may be disputed to him. The forward he can repel; the supercilious he can subdue; pretensions of wealth or ancestry are of no avail with him; there is a fire in that dark eye under which the "insolence of condescension" cannot thrive. In his abasement, in his extreme need, he forgets not for a moment the majesty of poetry and manhood. And yet, far as he feels himself above common men, he wanders not apart from them, but mixes warmly in their interests; nay throws himself into their arms, and, as it were, entreats them to love him. It is moving to see how, in his darkest despondency, this proud being still seeks relief from friendship; unbores himself even to the unworthy; and, amid tears, strains to his glowing heart a heart that knows only the name of friendship. And yet he was quick to learn; a man of keen vision; "before whom common disguises afforded no concealment. His understanding saw through the hollowness even of accomplished deceivers; but there was a generous credulity in his heart. And so did our peasant show himself among us; a soul like an Æolian harp, in whose strings the vulgar wind, as it passed through them, changed itself into articulate melody." And this was he for whom the world found no sadder business than quarrelling with smugglers and vintners, computing excise dues upon tallow, and gauging ale barrels! In such toils was that mighty spirit sorrowfully wasted; and a hundred years may pass on before another such is given us to waste.

* Knowles, in the ‘Beggars of Bethnal Green.’

A Scottish peasant's life was the meanest and rudest of all lives, till Burns became a poet in it, and a poet of it, found it a man's life, and therefore significant to men. A thousand battle-fields remain unsung; but the wounded hare has not perished without its memorial; a balm of mercy yet breathes on us from its dumb agonies, because a poet was there. Our Halloween had passed and repassed in a rude awe and laughter, since the era of the Druids; but no Theocritus, till Burns, discerned in the materials of a Scottish Idyl: neither was the Holy Fair any Council of Trent, or Roman Jubilee; but, nevertheless, superstition, and hypocrisy, and sin having been propitious to him, in this man's hand it became a poem, instinct with satire and genuine comic life. Let but the true poet be given us, we repeat it, place him where and how you will, and true poetry will not be wanting.

There is a true old saying, that "love furthers knowledge," but, above all, it is the living essence of that knowledge which makes poets; the first principle of its existence, increase, activity. Of Burns's fervid affection, his generous all-embracing love, we have spoken already as of the grand distinction of his nature, seem equally, in word and deed, in his Life and in his Writings. It were easy to multiply examples. Not man only, but all that environs man in the material and moral universe is lovely in his sight; the "hoary hawthorn," the "troop of grey plover," the "solitary curlew," all are dear to him; all live in this earth along with him, and to all he is knit as in mysterious brotherhood. How touching is it, for instance, that amidst the gloom of personal misery, brooding over the wintry desolation without him and within him, he thinks of the "ourie cattle," and "silly sheep," and their sufferings in the pitiless storm!

I thought me on the ourie cattle,
Or silly sheep, wha bide this brattle
O' wintry war;
Or through the drift, deep-lairing, sprattle,
Beneath a scaur.

Ilk hopping bird, wee helpless thing,
That in the merry months o' spring,
Delighted me to hear thee sing,
What comes o' thee?
Where wilt thou cow'r thy chattering wing,
And close thy ee?

The tenant of the mean hut with its "ragged roof and chinky wall," has a heart to pity even these. This is worth several homilies on mercy; for it is the voice of mercy herself. Burns, indeed, lives in sympathy; his soul rushes forth into all realms of being; nothing that has existence can be indifferent to him. The very devil he cannot hate with right orthodoxy!

But fare ye weel, auld nickie-ben;
O wad ye tak a thought and men!
Ye aiblins might—I dinna ken—
Still hae a stake;
I'm wae to think upo' your den,
Even for your sake!

He did not know, probably, that Sterne had been beforehand with him. "He is the father of curses and lies," said Dr Slop; "and is cursed and damned already." "I am sorry for it," quoth my uncle Toby. "A poet without love, were a physical and metaphysical impossibility."—(From a masterly article in the Edinburgh Review, by Thomas Carlyle.)

THE SQUIRREL.

[THE signature at bottom of these verses made us call to mind, with repentance, something which we fear we insinuated on a former occasion respecting a want of sentiment on the part of our respected correspondent, the author of the Letter on English and French Ladies.—ED.]

STANZAS ON SEEING A DEAD SQUIRREL LYING IN THE STREETS, JULY 13, 1884.

I.

I SPIED A Squirrel in a passage lone,
Her once fair polished coat besmeared with mire;
Her head was pillowed on a filthy stone,
And quench'd the full black eye's quick sparkling fire,
And fled the spirit that could never tire,
But brisk from morn till twilight-gathering night,
Bounded from brake to oak-branch, mounting higher,
And then aye deftly played her gambols light,
High rocked among the leaves and safe from man's despite.

II.

And there, perchance, thou hadst a little nest
Scooped in the trunk, and lined with mosses dry,
Where all thy young ones lay in quiet rest,
Till summer's heat or pelting storm was by.
Oft has the stranger marked thy cautious eye
Peering from out the hole; and being come
The wished-for hour when no rude step was nigh,
Thou'dst lead thy silky little ones from home,
And teach them gamesome pranks, and 'mong the
woods to roam.

III.

Thou hadst thy little sorrows, joys, and pains,
Thy hopes in sunshine and thy fears in night:
The falcon, hovering o'er thy wooded plains,
Has wrung full oft thy bosom with affright,
And caused thee downward spring in headlong flight,
And hide thy young in some impervious bush,
Where, snugly hid from the fell harpy's sight,
They all, unconscious, harboured with the thrush,
For dangers mingle castes and common scruples hush.

IV.

And when the tyrant of the upper air
Winged slowly on and dissipated fear,
How gay ye climbed the forest branches fair,
To where the chestnuts 'tween the foliage peer—
Bounding aloft—now farther—and now near—
While the friend thrush, companion in your woe,
Joins in the gen'ral joy with notes full clear,
And modest perched upon a lowly bough—
Thus all is mirth above, and harmony below.

V.

Mischance that mars us all, spared not e'en thee,
Thou loving atom of bright Nature's world!
Rude clambering hands invaded thy tall tree,
And ruin on thy habitation hurl'd.
Ah me! the stream still flows as then it purld,
And birds yet sing, as in thy merrier time
They sang on mossy branch that downward curl'd;
But gone art thou in summer's balmy prime,
Unmourned, unheeded all, save in my lowly rhyme.

VI.

In wired cage wast thou hereafter kept,
Which turned about, aye restless, round and round;
And not one gentle eye thy sorrows wept,
For few think Squirrels feel a mental stound,
But love their prisons as the forest ground.
Thy little ones thou ne'er didst see again,
Some died, some lived in loathsome prison bound;
And thou, their parent, languished on in pain,
Till death in mercy came, and snapp'd life's tedious
chain.

VII.

And there thou art—the beautiful, the gay,
No more. "Where be thy gambols now?"—the prank
Fantastic?—all the merriment of play
Which charmed the woodman, as on daisied bank
He wiped the toil-drops, gathering cold and dank,
And rested on his axe? The iron wheel
Of cars has crushed thee,—street-curs, thin and lank,
Have mumbled with their jaws, in search of meal—
There art thou—scorned of all—and spurned by every heel!

VIII.

Farewell, poor Squirrel! thou hast lived thy day,
And though no greenwood tree beheld thee die,
Nor balmy breezes bore thy breath away—
Well hast thou lived, and eke right joyously,
In this mixt world of mirth and misery.
Humble my theme, and of no ancient date—
Yet, Reader! view it not with scornful eye,—
Tasks more ungrateful fall in man's estate
Than singing Squirrel's spring, or mourning her sad
fate.

TABLE TALK.

Good Logic.—In the dedication of a piece of his, Scarron speaks in this manner to the king: "I shall endeavour to convince your majesty, that to do me a little good would be doing yourself no hurt: if you did me a little good, I should be more cheerful than I am; if I was more cheerful than I am, my comedies would be merrier; if my comedies were merrier, your majesty would be more diverted; if you were the more diverted, your money could not be said to be thrown away. All these conclusions hang together so naturally, that, methinks, I could not hold out against them were I a great monarch, instead of being a miserable indigent creature."

SELF-AID AGAINST PERTURBATION.

—When our disease'd affections
Harmful to human freedom, and storm-like
Inferring darkness to th' infected mind
Oppress our comforts, 'tis but letting in
The light of reason, and a purer spirit
Take in another way; like rooms that fight
With windows 'gainst the wind, yet let in light."

CHAPMAN.

—The man who shrinks from investigation, lest he should mistake false for true, can have no reason for supposing himself free from that delusion in his actual opinions.—Bailey.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Wx have had thoughts of doing what SCHOLASTICUS wishes.

T. F. T. appears to have an honourable and earnest nature, and no mean feeling of the tone of poetry; but two of his sonnets are not admissible in this journal on account of their polemical and political tendencies, and we are doubtful whether the third would sufficiently interest the general reader.

We will look into the book mentioned by W. D. who writes to us under a new and venerable signature.

Her tongue is thin, and can make a spoon of itself. This, however, is common to other quadrupeds with the cat, and does not, therefore, more particularly belong to our feline consideration. Not so the electricity of its coat, which gives out sparks under the hand; its passion for the herb valerian (did the reader ever see one roll in it? it is a mad sight) and other singular delicacies of nature, among which perhaps is to be reckoned its taste for fish, a creature with whose element it has so little to do, that it is supposed even to abhor it; though lately we read somewhere of a swimming cat, that used to fish for itself. And this reminds us of an exquisite anecdote of dear, dogmatic, diseased, thoughtful, surly, charitable Johnson, who would go out of doors himself, and buy oysters for his cat, because his black servant was too proud to do it! Not that we condemn the black, in those enslaving, unliberating days. He had a right to the mistake, though we should have thought better of him had he seen farther, and subjected his pride to affliction for such a master. But Johnson's true practical delicacy in the matter is beautiful. Be assured that he thought nothing of "condescension" in it, or of being eccentric. He was singular in some things, because he could not help it. But he hated eccentricity. No: in his best moments he felt himself simply to be a man, and a good man too, though a frail,—one that in virtue as well as humility, and in a knowledge of his ignorance as well as his wisdom, was desirous of being a Christian philosopher; and accordingly he went out, and bought food for his hungry cat, because his poor negro was too proud to do it, and there was nobody else in the way whom he had a right to ask. What must anybody that saw him have thought, as he turned up Bolt court! But doubtless he went as secretly as possible,—that is to say, if he considered the thing at all. His friend Garrick could not have done as much! He was too grand, and on the great "stage" of life. Goldsmith could; but he would hardly have thought of it. Beauclerc might; but he would have thought it necessary to excuse it with a jest or a wager, or some such thing. Sir Joshua Reynolds, with his fashionable, fine-lady-painting hand, would certainly have shrunk from it. Burke would have reasoned himself into its propriety, but he would have reasoned himself out again. Gibbon! Imagine its being put into the head of Gibbon!! He and his bag-wig would have started with all the horror of a gentleman-usher; and he would have rung the bell for the cook's-deputy's-under-assistant-errand-boy.

Cats at firesides live luxuriously, and are the picture of comfort; but lest they should not bear their portion of trouble in this world, they have the drawbacks of being liable to be shut out of doors on cold nights, beatings from the "aggravated" cooks, overpettings of children (how should we like to be squeezed and pulled about in that manner by some great patronizing giants?) and last, not least, horrible, merciless tramples of unconscious human feet and unfeeling legs of chairs. Elegance, comfort, and security seem the order of the day on all sides, and you are going to sit down to dinner, or to music, or to take tea, when all of a sudden the cat gives a squall as if she was mashed; and you are not sure that the fact is otherwise. Yet she gets in the way again, as before; and dars all the feet and mahogany in the room. Beautiful present sufficiency of a cat's imagination! Confined to the snug circle of her own sides, and the two next inches of rug or carpet.

ABODES OF MEN OF GENIUS.

(From the new edition of 'D'Israeli's Curiosities of Literature'.)

Men of genius have usually been condemned to compose their finest works, which are usually their earliest ones, under the roof of a garret; and few literary characters have lived, like Pliny or Voltaire, in a villa or château of their own. It has not, therefore, often happened that a man of genius could raise local emotions by his own intellectual suggestion. Ariosto, who built a palace in his verse, lodged himself in a small house, and found that stanzas and stanzas were not put together at the same rate; old Montaigne has left a description of his library,—“over the entrance of my house, where I view my courtyards and garden, and at once survey all the operations of my family.”

There is, however, a feeling among literary men, of building up their own elegant fancies, and giving a permanency to their own tastes; we dwell on their favourite scenes as a sort of portraits, and we eagerly collect those few prints which are their only vestiges. A collection might be formed of such literary residences, chosen for their amenity and retirement, and adorned by the objects of their studies, from that of the younger Pliny, who called his villa of literary leisure by the endearing title of villula, to that of Cassiodorus, the prime minister of Theodoric, who has left so magnificent a description of his literary retreat, where all the elegancies of life were at hand;

where the gardeners and agriculturists laboured on scientific principles; and where, amidst gardens and parks, stood his extensive library, with scrives to multiply his manuscripts;—from Tycho Brahe's, who built a magnificent astronomical house on an island, which he named, after the sole object of his musings, Uraniburg, or the Castle of the Heavens;—to that of Evelyn, who first began to adorn Wotton, by building a little study, till many years after he dedicated the ancient house to contemplation, among the delicious streams and venerable woods, the gardens, the fountains, and the groves, most tempting for a grave person and a wanton purse; and, indeed, gave one of the first examples to that elegance so much in vogue;—from Pope, whose little garden seemed to multiply its scenes by a glorious union of nobility and literary men conversing in groups, down to rural Shenstone, whose 'Rural Elegance,' as he intitles one of his odes, compelled him to mourn over his hard fate, when

EXPERIENCE

Had lavish'd thousand ornaments, and taught
CONVENIENCE to perplex him, ART to fall,
POWER to deject, and BEAUTY to displease.

We have all by heart the true and delightful reflexions of Johnson on literary associations. When the scene we read suggests to us the men or the deeds, which have left their celebrity to the spot, we are in the presence of their fame, and feel its influence!

A literary friend, whom a hint of mine had induced to visit the old tower in the garden of Buffon, where the sage retired every morning to compose, passed so long a time in that lonely apartment, as to have raised some solicitude among the honest folks of Montbar, who having seen the Englishman enter, but not return, during a heavy thunder-storm which had occurred in the interval, informed the good mayor, who came in due form, to notify the ambiguous state of the stranger. My friend is, as is well known, a genius of that caste who could pass two hours in the Tower of Buffon, without being aware that he had been all that time occupied by suggestions of ideas and reveries, which in some minds such a locality may excite. He was also busied with his pencil; for he has favoured me with two drawings of the interior and the exterior of the old tower in the garden, the nakedness within can only be compared to the solitude without. Such was the studying-room of Buffon, where his eye, resting on no object, never interrupted the unity of his meditations of Nature.

“In return for my friend's kindness, it has cost me two hours, I think, in attempting to translate the beautiful picture of this literary retreat, which Vicq. d'Azyr has finished with all the warmth of a votary. At Montbar, in the midst of an ornamented garden is seen an antique tower, it was there that Buffon wrote the history of Nature, and from that spot his fame spread through the universe. There he came at sunrise, and no one, however importunate, was suffered to trouble him. The calm of the morning hour, the first warbling of the birds, the varied aspect of the country, all at that moment which touched the senses, recalled him to his model. Free, independent, he wandered in his walks; there was he seen with quickened or with slow steps, or standing rapt in thought, oftentimes with his eyes fixed on the heavens in a moment of inspiration, as if satisfied with the thought that so profoundly occupied his soul, sometimes, collected within himself, he sought what could not always be found; or at the moment of producing, he effaced, and re-wrote, to produce once more; then he harmonized, in silence, all the parts of his composition, which he frequently repeated to himself, till, satisfied with the corrections, he seemed to repay himself for the pains of his beautiful prose, by the pleasure he found in declaiming it aloud. Thus he engraved it in his memory and would recite it to his friends, or induce some to read it to him. At those moments, he was himself a severe judge, and would again re-compose it, desirous of attaining to that perfection which is denied to the impatient writer.”

A curious circumstance connected with local associations, occurred to that extraordinary oriental student, Fourmont. Originally he belonged to a religious community, and never failed in performing his offices; but he was expelled by the Superior for an irregularity of conduct, not likely to have become contagious through the brotherhood—he frequently prolonged his studies far into the night, and it was possible that the house might be burned by such superfluity of learning. Fourmont retreated to the college of Montaigne, where he occupied the few chambers which had been formerly those of Erasmus; a circumstance which contributed to excite his emulation and to hasten his studies. He who smiles at the force of such emotions, only proves that he has not experienced what are real and substantial as the scene itself—for those who are concerned in them. Pope, who had far more enthusiasm in his poetical disposition than is generally understood, was extremely susceptible of the literary associations with localities; one of the volumes of his Homer was begun and finished in an old tower over the chapel at Stanton Harcourt; and he has perpetuated the event, if not consecrated the place, by scratching with a diamond on a pane of stained glass, this inscription:—

In the year 1718,
Alexander Pope
Finished Here

The Fifth Volume of Homer.

It was the same feeling which induced him one day, when taking his usual walk with Harte in the Haymarket, to desire Harte to enter a little shop, where going up three pair of stairs into a small room, Pope said, “In this garret Addison wrote his Campaign.” Nothing less than a strong feeling impelled the poet to ascend the garret—it was a consecrated spot to his eye, and certainly a curious instance of the power of genius contrasted with its miserable locality! Addison, whose mind had fought through “a campaign” in a garret, could he have called about him “the pleasures of imagination,” had probably planned a house of literary repose, where all parts would have been in harmony with his mind.

Such residences of men of genius have been enjoyed by some; and the vivid descriptions which they have left us convey something of the delightfulness which charmed their studious repose.

The Italian, Paul Jovius, has composed more than three hundred concise eulogies of statesmen, warriors, and literary men of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries: but the occasion which induced him to compose them is perhaps more interesting than the compositions.

Jovius had a villa, situated on a peninsula, bordered by the lake of Como. It was built on the ruins of the villa of Pliny, and in his time the foundations were still visible. When the surrounding lake was calm, the sculptured marbles, the trunks of columns, and the fragments of those pyramids which had once adorned the residence of the friend of Trajan, were still viewed in its lucid bosom. Jovius was the enthusiast of literature, and the leisure which it loves. He was an historian, with the imagination of a poet; and though a Christian prelate, almost a worshipper of the sweet fictions of Pagan mythology: and when his pen was kept pure from satire or adulation, to which it was too much accustomed, it becomes a pencil. He paints with rapture his gardens bathed by the waters of the lake; the shade and freshness of his woods; his green slopes; his sparkling fountains; the deep silence and calm of his solitude. A statue was raised in his gardens to Nature! In his hall stood a fine statue of Apollo, and the Muses around, with their attributes. His library was guarded by a Mercury, and there was an apartment adorned with Doric columns and with pictures of the most pleasing subjects, dedicated to the Graces! Such was the interior. Without, the transparent lake here spread its broad mirror, and there was seen luminously winding by banks covered with olives and laurels; in the distance, towns, promontories, hills rising in an amphitheatre, blushing with vines, and the first elevation of the Alps, covered with woods and pasture, and sprinkled with herds and flocks.

It was in a central spot of this enchanting habitation that a cabinet or gallery was erected, where Jovius had collected, with prodigal cost, the portraits of celebrated men; and it was to explain and to describe the characteristics of these illustrious names that he had composed his eulogies. The collection became so remarkable, that the great men his contemporaries presented our literary collector with their own portraits, among whom the renowned Fernandez Cortes sent Jovius his before he died, and probably others who were less intitled to enlarge the collection, but it is equally probable, that our eulogist Jovius would throw them aside. Our historian had often to describe men more famous than virtuous; sovereigns, politicians, poets, and philosophers, men of all ranks, countries, and ages, formed a crowded scene of men of genius or of celebrity: sometimes a few lines compress their character, and sometimes a few pages excite his fondness. If he sometimes adulates the living, we may pardon the illusions of a contemporary; but he has the honour of satirizing some by the honest freedom of a pen which occasionally broke out into premature truths.

Such was the inspiration of leisure and literature which had embellished the abode of Jovius, and had raised in the midst of the lake of Como a cabinet of portraits; a noble tribute to those who are the salt of the earth!

We possess prints of Rubens's house at Antwerp. That princely artist, perhaps, first contrived for his studio the circular apartment with a dome, like the rotunda of the Pantheon, where the light, descending from an aperture or window at the top, sent down a single equal light,—that perfection of light which distributes its magical effects on the objects beneath. Bellori describes it, una stanza rotunda con un solo oculo in cima; the solo oculo is what the French term œil de bœuf; we ourselves want this single eye in our technical language of art. This was his precious museum where he had collected a vast number of books which were intermixed with his marbles, statues, cameos, intaglios, and all that variety of the riches of art which he had drawn from Rome: but the walls did not yield in value, for they were covered by pictures of his own composition, or copies by his own hand, made at Venice and Madrid, of Titian and Paul Veronese. No foreigners, men of letters, or lovers of the arts, or even princes, would pass through Antwerp, without visiting the house of Rubens, to witness the animated residence of genius, and the great man who had conceived the idea. Yet great as was his mind, and splendid as were the habits of his life, he could not resist the intreaties of the hundred thousand florins of our Duke of Buckingham, to dispose of the studio. The great artist could not, however abandon the delightful contemplations he was depriving himself of; and as substitutes for the miracles of art he had lost, he solicited and obtained leave to replace them by casts, which were scrupulously deposited in the places where the originals had stood.

* On a late inquiry it appears that this consecrated pane has been removed, and the relic is said to be preserved at Nuneham.

Of this feeling of the local residences of genius, the Italians appear to have been, not perhaps more susceptible than any other people, but more energetic in their enthusiasm. Florence exhibits many monuments of this sort. In the neighbourhood of Santa Maria Novella, Zimmerman has noticed a house of the celebrated Viviani, which is a singular monument of gratitude to his illustrious master, Galileo. The front is adorned with the bust of this father of science, and between the windows are engraven accounts of the discoveries of Galileo: it is the most beautiful biography of genius! Yet another still more eloquently excites our emotions—the house of Michael Angelo: his pupils, in perpetual testimony of their admiration and gratitude, have ornamented it with all the leading features of his life, the very soul of this vast genius put in action: this is more than biography!—it is living as with a contemporary!

CASTLE-BUILDING.

To the Editor of the London Journal.

DEAR SIR,—I am one of that large class of unfortunates called castle-builders,—one of those who thriftlessly mis-spend hours upon hours of their valuable time in the profitless debauchery of “building new nothings wonderful to see;” till my mind has, I fear, materially suffered from long indulgence in the harmful habit.

Often and often have I gone to bed an hour sooner to talk to myself about my airy plans, until sleep has come upon me in the midst of a flaming oration, wherein I turned the whole universe round my little finger by the overpowering effect of my rhetoric;—at another time astonishing a listening senate, or leading on an invincible army to victory, or astounding my countrymen in the still small voice of poetry. All these visions are pleasing enough at the time; but they are like

The snow that falls upon a river,
A moment white, then gone for ever;

and when I come to the dull realities of earth, and find how poor and weak I am, compared with what I have fancied myself to be, I feel humiliated more than I can express.

But, notwithstanding this feeling of self-abasement, I persevere in my misdeeds, and am unable intirely (though I have done so partially) to break through this pernicious habit.

Many of your readers, doubtless, have given way to the same course of fancy with myself, and must have experienced its dangerous tendency. You, yourself, dear Sir, when young in years, as still you are in imagination, may have taken pleasure in the same delinquency. If I am right in my conjecture, you will be doing a good both to them and to myself by acquiescing in my request, which is that you should suggest some method for breaking the habit of which I complain.

Of the numerous plans that I have tried, all have in a great measure failed, and I appeal to you, as to a father, to suggest to me some plan of escape.

Yours, faithfully,

H. B.

[To those who are suffering under the somewhat rare embarrassment of too much fancy, we would recommend, imprimis, an invigoration of their health (the great secret of overcoming involuntary ideas); and, secondly, Mr Bentham's recipe of thinking what they can do, in less ambitious ways than those of our correspondent, towards being useful to their friends, or promoting some beneficial public measure. For our parts, the poetry of life is the pleasantest alternation we know with the prose of it; and castle-building (short of that of Bishop Williams' friend, the Duchess, who built solely for her own aggrandizement) is an agreeable architectural refreshment after performing one's daily duties to households less romantic.]

ADAM FLEMING AND FAIR HELEN.

[We avail ourselves with pleasure of the following communications from a Correspondent, which “flush up” the roses of poor Helen's grave, to the confusion of the memory of the ‘Lounger.’]

SIR,—In the last number of your ‘London Journal,’ I see the affecting story of ‘Fair Helen of Kirkconnel’ related. The author of the ‘Lounger's Common-place Book’ really seems not acquainted with the songs written on the subject, or else he would not have called them indifferent. Mr Allan Cunningham's version of Fleming's lament over the grave of Helen to which you allude, I here copy:—

FAIR HELEN OF KIRCONNEL.

I wish I were where Helen lies—
Night and day on me she cries;
O, that I were where Helen lies,
On fair Kirkconnel lea.
O Helen fair beyond compare,
I'll make a garland of thy hair,
Shall bind my heart for evermair
Until the day I die.

O think nae ye my heart was sair
When my love dropt and spoke nae mair!
She sank and swoon'd wi' meikle care
On fair Kirkconnel lea.

Curs'd be the heart that thought the thought,
And curs'd the hand that fir'd the shot,
When in my arms burd* Helen dropt,
And died to succour me.

As I went down the water wide,
None but my foe to be my guide,
With sword in hand and side by side,
On fair Kirkconnel lea,—
The small bird ceas'd its song with awe,
When our bright swords it heard and saw,
And I hew'd him in pieces sma'
For her that died for me.†

O that I were where Helen lies!
Night and day on me she cries,
Out of my bed she bids me rise,
“O come, my love, to me.”
O Helen fair! O Helen chaste!
If I were with thee I were blest,
Where thou lies low and takes thy rest,
On fair Kirkconnel lea.

I wish my grave were growing green,
A winding sheet drawn o'er my een,
And I in Helen's arms lying
On fair Kirkconnel lea.

I wish I were where Helen lies,
Night and day on me she cries;
I'm sick of all beneath the skies
Since my love died for me!

Sir Walter Scott, in his ‘Border Minstrelsy,’ has also printed an address from one of the lovers to fair Helen, but which he considers to be the composition of a different bard:—

FAIR HELEN.

O! sweetest sweet, and fairest fair,
Of birth and worth beyond compare,
Thou art the cause of my care,
Since first I loved thee.

* Maid.

† This verse I never saw in any other copy than Mr Cunningham's.

Yet God hath given to me a mind,
The which to thee shalt prove as kind
As any one that thou shalt find,
Of high or low degree.

The shallowest water makes most din,
The deadliest pool the deepest linn;
The richest man least truth within,
Though he preferred be.

Yet, ne'ertheless, I am content,
And ne'er a whit my love repent,
But think the time was a' weel spent,
Though I disdained be.

O, Helen sweet, and maist complete,
My captive spirit's at thy feet!
Thinks thou still fit thus for to treat
Thy captive cruelly?

O, Helen brave! but this I crave,
On thy poor slave some pity have,
And do him save that's near his grave,
And dies for love of thee.

In addition to the facts related by the writer of the article in your ‘Journal,’ it may be mentioned that the despised lover and murdering villain was a Bell of Blacket-house. Some accounts make Fleming pursue Bell into Spain and slay him in the streets of Madrid,* returning whence he died on her grave, breathing her name in his last sigh. Scott writes, “The grave of the lovers is yet shown in the churchyard of Kirkconnel, near Sprinkell. Upon the tomb-stone can still be read—Hic jacet Adamus Fleming; a cross and a sword are sculptured on the stone. The former is called by the country people the gun with which Helen was murdered; and the latter the avenging sword of her lover. Sit illis terra levis! A heap of stones is raised on the spot where the murder was committed,—a token of abhorrence common to most nations.”—Border Minstrelsy, edition, 1833, vol. 2. p. 10.

Mr Robert Chambers tells us that, “besides being the subject of many songs, the story of ‘Fair Helen’ was some years ago wrought up in the shape of a poem as long as the ‘Lady of the Lake,’ and it is the foundation of at least one novel of the ordinary size.”—Chambers's Scottish Songs, vol. 1, p. 145.

For other information about ‘Fair Helen,’ your readers are referred to ‘Pennant's Tour in Scotland,’ to some verses in the ‘Gentleman's Magazine for July, 1783,’ written in an old copy of ‘Drummond of Hawthornden's History of Scotland,’ where “burd Helen's” heart was “transpierced” by an “arrow;” to ‘Sinclair's Statistical Account of Scotland,’ vol. xiii. p. 275; ‘Ritson's Scottish Songs,’ vol. i. p. 145; ‘Pinkerton's Tragic Ballads,’ p. 109, where the editor has given a poem of his own composition referring to it; and ‘Jamieson's Popular Ballads,’ vol. i. p. 200, where is the old song, and an imitation by the editor.

The subject cannot be concluded better, than with Mr Wordsworth's

ELLEN IRWIN, OR THE BRAES OF KIRTLE.

Fair Ellen Irwin, when she sate
Upon the braes of Kirtle,
Was lovely as a Grecian maid
Adorn'd with wreaths of rayrtle.
Young Adam Bruce beside her lay,
And there did they beguile the day
With love and gentle speeches,
Beneath the budding beeches.

From many knights and many squires,
The Bruce had been selected;
And Gordon, fairest of them all,
By Ellen was rejected.
Sad tidings to that noble youth!
For it may be proclaimed with truth,
If Bruce hath loved sincerely,
That Gordon loves as dearly.

* Another version of the Song alludes to this;—
To foreign climes the traitor fled,
But quickly after him I sped,
Ere long beneath my glaive he bled,
For her that died for me.

But what is Gordon's beauteous face,
And what are Gordon's crosses,
To them who sit by Kirtle's brass
Upon the verdant mosses?
Alas! that ever he was born!
That Gordon couch'd behind a thorn,
Saw them and their caressing;
Beholds them blest and blessing.

Proud Gordon cannot bear the thoughts
That through his brain are travelling,—
And, starting up, to Bruce's heart
He launched a deadly javelin!
Fair Ellen saw it when it came,
And stepping forth to meet the same,
Did with her body cover
The youth, her chosen lover.

And falling into Bruce's arms,
Thus died the beauteous Ellen;
Thus, from the heart of her true-love,
The mortal spear repelling.
And Bruce, as soon as he had slain
The Gordon, sail'd away to Spain;
And fought with rage incessant
Against the Moorish Crescent.

But many days, and many months,
And many years ensuing,
This wretched Knight did vainly seek
The death that he was wooing:
So coming his last help to crave,
Heart-broken upon Ellen's grave
His body he extended,
And there his sorrow ended.

Now ye, who willingly have heard
The tale I have been telling,
May in Kirconnel church-yard view
The grave of lovely Ellen:
By Ellen's side the Bruce is laid;
And for the stone upon his head,
May no rude hand deface it,
And its forlorn—Hic Jacet!

Your obedient servant, A. M.

THE MEETING OF THE AMICI.*

Close the window-shutters tight,
We will have a feast to-night,
"Feast of reason—flow of soul,"
Sparkling glass, and brimming bowl;
Toast the girl our fancy loves,
Sing the song our heart approves;
Feel how different we are
From the common sons of care,—
Men who cannot, after toil,
Love the lone lamp's midnight oil,
Bright'ning, as we feel it does,
All our joys and all our woes,—
Men who will not see the flowers
Blooming in this world of ours;
But who merely sow and reap,
Eat and drink, and wake and sleep.

Who would change his pow'r of mind
With the dull untutor'd hind?
Who would be an idiot lord?
Who would wield a hero's sword?
Who would wish the miser's chest?
Who with baubles think him blest?
None of us—oh no, not one,
If he could not, when the sun
Leaves the west for other lands,
Thus, around the bowl shake hands;
Thus commingle heart with heart,
Soul with soul—man's better part;
Thus evince to one another,
How mankind can make a brother!

* A Society, consisting of ten members, at Maidstone, thus truly characterised in the first number of the 'London Journal,' as a "knot of spirits, generally young men, who are known above others, for their love of books, for the liberality of their sentiments, and their desire to be acquainted with all that is going forward in connexion with the graces of poetry and the fine arts." They meet every Saturday evening at each others' houses in rotation, when original papers are read, and friendship and harmony prevail.

Or, if absent, who can tell,
How the pregnant heart will swell?
How the gladdened eye will glisten
At the thought that friends will listen
With a kindred heart and eye
To our rudest minstrelsy;
Conscious that 'tis only meant
With this motive, this intent—
Just to speed the time awhile,
Just to raise the jocund smile,
Just to show the goblet's juice
Has with us a double use;
Teaching us to sing and rhyme
In the teeth of Father Time:
Keeping us sometimes till Sunday,
Only to be nearer Monday;
Thus each seventh night to sit
'Mid a galaxy of wit,
And retire to rest—to pray
For the coming Saturday!

THE LARVS IRONICAL, OR FIRE-IRONS AND HEARTH-BRUSH.

To the Editor of the London Journal.

WHILST you have been sunning your imagination in Fairy-land, I, who am but too proud to follow in your wake, have been prosecuting my researches in the Pantheon. Not in that "tricked and frowned" bifrontal Temple of Oxford cum Marlborough street, but that wherein the gods abide. The summer, that like a loved and loving friend, lingers long, yet must depart, has at length disappeared; and the autumnal fire now flames and sparkles, not in cheerfulness, but as performing the funeral obsequies of that season. By this fire, in this mood of mind, I found myself seated, and, like Prince Rasselas, continued to grieve and muse. The long vista of winter lay stretched before my mental view, a sealed book, into whose pages I would fain penetrate, yet was unable. Some ingenious persons have maintained that the pleasures of winter surpass even those of summer. To those, whose happy temperaments "make a sunshine in a shady place," I consign the solution of this problem, regretting that I am not of them. To me, winter appears ever an ugly phantom, whose chill contact paralyses the mind, rendering it incapable of reciprocating pleasures. Could those divinities, thought I, of whose attributes my late researches had but imperfectly instructed me, be propitiated, their friendly aid might interpose some mitigation of the rigours incident to a six months' residence by the—fireside.

I suspect that about this stage of my cogitations, I must have fallen into a dose, for I imagined something brushed by me with a rustling noise, and, on turning round to ascertain its cause, methought I beheld a diminutive creature, with a huge bristly head, around whose dark slender body a seeming gilded serpent was coiled! Observing my consternation, he exclaimed, "Be under no alarm, and pardon the interruption which my appearance has occasioned to the chain of your reflections. I have the desire, as well as the ability, to assist your inquiries. I am well aware that the objects of your present solicitude are certain divinities, who are said to preside over the hearths of mortals, and their favours,—the boon which you are at this time occupied with the desire of imploring. Their friendly powers have been too highly extolled, for divinities have their foibles as mortals have. I have been long their attendant, and my length of service has enabled me to observe that in them, which their suppliants reckon not. In the course of a long bondage, I have acquired many particulars of their secret history. As, among mortals, the difficulty to support dignity with those of the antichamber is sometimes felt, so with us, divinities also are sometimes shorn of their beams. I counsel you, therefore, not to build your hopes too highly on their co-operation. There is much disunion among them. They who lack harmony in themselves, it is unwise to select as the dispensers of that boon to others; and it is a fact well known in our spheres, that those very divinities are often the cause of discord, and are generally opposed to each other in the stations they assume. Should they approach, a conflict often succeeds their conjunction, and they are sometimes known to fall together by the ears, 'with most admired disorder.' On these occasions I am generally summoned to arrange matters, which having achieved successfully, I retire modestly to some obscure corner, where I may hang, for any sympathy my suit and service would ever receive from them. One of them in particular, is of a busy stirring restlessness, which 'breeds me great annoy;' and should the others interpose, they often make matters worse, though it may be with good intent. So I would hope against hope, the real fact being, that they are all a set of incendiaries, notwithstanding their outward polish, and even disturbers of sacred ashes! They all go under feigned names, but I hope you will discover their real appellations. In conclusion, I beseech you to believe that I speak not as a malevolent spirit, but to guard you from the error into which you appear to be falling. Have as little to do with them as may be. Moreover, they are themselves often under the surveillance of some one individual in most families, who would monopolize their joint offices to himself, and through whose jealous prerogative, even my insignificance does not protect me from the performance of much unnecessary labour, whereby my hair becomes prematurely thin, and my powers gradually weakened. That you may acquit me of all ill design in this exposé, I must add that they are all very well in their places. I would that they kept them! Even now I hear great strife and commotion, like that of a discordant trio, who would extract music from a marble stone.

I remain your disinterested adviser,
and humble servant,

Nov. 14, 1834.

HEARTH-BRUSH.

CHARMING SPECIMEN OF FRENCH MANNERS.

(From 'Six Weeks on the Loire.')

THE chateau de Clermont was built by the order of the Great Conde, who, after the war of the Fronde, fancying in a moment of disgust that he wished to retire from the world, directed one of his intendants to select some spot in a desirable military position on the borders of Bretagne and Poitou, where he might spend the remainder of his days. The chateau was accordingly erected on this site, which contains everything that could be desired. Conde however never inhabited it, probably finding out, before it was finished, that he was not so weary of the world as he had imagined. It stands on the brow of a lofty eminence, commanding from its proud height the full sweep of the Loire, with its winding shores and many islands, and the whole of the surrounding country from Ancenis to Nantes. Delightful winding walks, shaded with the birch, the fir, and the mountain-ash, and diversified sometimes with fragments of rock, sometimes with flowering shrubs, tempted us to the summit. It was impossible not to proceed when every step showed us new attractions; we heard the sound of music from the open windows of the chateau, it seemed as if the strains awoke some kindly sympathies that told us that refinement, benevolence, and courtesy, dwelt within: nevertheless, as sympathies and suppositions do not justify intrusions and impertinences, we were turning away at the sight of a lady coming across a lawn, in the front of the chateau, with a little basket of flowers in her hand. It was Madame la Baronne des J——s herself, and advancing with an expression that heralded to us a welcome, she begged we would walk round the gardens, if agreeable to us, adding, that as we might find ourselves fatigued by the ascent, she hoped we would come into the saloon afterwards and take a cup of coffee, or a little fruit. It was singular enough that I, who have a dislike absolutely amounting to folly, of presenting myself among strangers, or taxing in any way their time or kindness, in this instance felt immediately desirous of availing myself of the politeness offered. We accordingly walked round the gardens and the grounds, and then presenting ourselves in the saloon, found coffee prepared for us. We were introduced to M. le Baron de J——s, to a son and daughter, and two or three visitors; we in return introduced ourselves, which, as Sterne justly observes, is always "pour le moment quelque chose d'embarrassante" (somewhat embarrassing at the moment), but never could it be less so than in the present instance, with a family full of ease, vivacity, and good breeding. The conversation immediately became general, and two hours flew away unperceived. At length I recollected poor Jean, who would,

I thought, fancy that we had either tumbled over the rocks or fallen into the hands of the Chouans. I rose, but, on offering to pay my parting compliments, I was overpowered by many voices, all joining in the friendly entreaty that we would stay and dine, and proceed to Nantes in the cool of the evening. I read in the countenances of my companions a wish for my compliance, and too happy in the conversation of a party at once so accomplished and unaffected, I willingly yielded to the entreaty which afforded me a little more time to profit by it. Accordingly it was settled that the gentlemen should stroll through the woods whilst I remained with Madame des J——s and her lovely daughter.

The bill of fare for dinner was discussed in my presence, and settled, sans façon, with that delightful frankness and gaiety which, in the French character, gives a charm to the most trifling occurrence. Mademoiselle Louise then begged me to excuse her for half an hour, as she was going to make some creams and some pastilles. I requested I might accompany her, and also render myself useful. We accordingly went together into the dairy, and I made tarts à l'Angloise, when she made confections and bon bons and all manner of pretty things, with as much ease as if she had never done anything else, and as much grace as she displayed in the saloon. I could not help thinking as I looked at her with her servants about her, all cheerful, respectful, and anxious to attend upon her, how much better it would be for the young ladies in England if they would occasionally return to the habits of their grandmothers, and mingle the animated and endearing occupations of domestic life, and the modest manners and social amusements of home, with the perpetual practising on harps and pianos, and the incessant efforts at display and search after gaiety, which in the present day render them anything but what an amiable man of a reflecting mind and delicate sentiments would desire in the woman he might wish to select as his companion for life.

But it was not only in the more trifling affairs of the menage that this young lady acquitted herself so agreeably; in the household, the garden, the farm, among the labourers, their wives, and children, with the poor in the neighbourhood and the casual wanderer, everywhere she was superintending, directing, kind, amiable, the comfort of all around, and the delight of her family; her cheerfulness was in proportion to — that sweet peace which goodness bosoms ever :

she flew up and down the rocks with the lightness of a mountain roe, she sprang into a boat like the Lady of the Lake, and could manage an oar with as much grace and skill. With all this her mind was thoroughly cultivated. She had an elegant taste in the authors of her own language, understood Latin, Italian, and English, and charmed me with her conversation, whilst she employed her fingers in the fancy-work with which French ladies occupy the moments some call idle, but which with them are always sociably and generally usefully employed. After a day spent in all the agreeableness of country-life, under its most engaging aspects, evening came, and, with mutual adieus, we parted; but scarcely had we proceeded half a league upon our way, when we saw a little boat in full speed after us, and as it had the advantage of a sail, it soon gained upon ours enough to allow us to perceive that it was the Baroness and her son and daughter. We rested on our oars until they came up to us; they then told us that, after parting with us, they considered that it would be so late before we could reach Nantes, that they resolved to bring us back again:—it was impossible to resist so friendly an invitation; we accordingly put about and all returned together, our oars keeping time to the song of our party; and flutes and guitars making up the remainder of our evening concert. In this hospitable manner we were kept four days voluntary prisoners, for it was indeed the talent of this amiable family Librarians and Lord Treasurers.—Bautru being sent to Spain on political business and, attending the Court of the Escorial, took the opportunity to visit the library, promising himself great satisfaction in an acquaintance with the librarian; but a little discourse let him see that the man scarce knew what books were under his care, much less the contents and best editions, or the character of their authors. Discoursing afterwards with the King about the decorations of that magnificent palace, his Majesty happened to say, "Foreigners of learning have expressed great approbation of my library here." "Nor can it be too much admired," answered Bautru; "but your Majesty's librarian is quite misplaced there: he'd make an excellent Lord Treasurer!" "A Lord Treasurer!" replied the King; "how so?" "Why, he never fingers what is committed to his care."

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 26th November to Tuesday December 2nd.

(From Mr Howitt's 'Book of the Seasons'.)

GAWAIN DOUGLAS, the celebrated Bishop of Dunkeld, has given the following most excellent sketch of Winter, which Warton has rendered from antiquated Scotch verse into good modern English prose:—The fern withered on the miry fallows, the brown moors assumed a barren mossy hue; banks, sides of hills, and hollows grey, white, and bare; the cattle looked hoary from the dank weather; the wind made the red reed waver on the dyke. From the crags, and the foreheads of the yellow rocks, hung great icicles, in length like a spear. The soil was dusky and grey, bereft of flowers, herbs, and grass. In every hold and forest the woods were stripped of their array. Boreas blew his bugle horn so loud, that the solitary deer withdrew to the dales; the small birds flocked to the thick briars, shunning the tempestuous blast, and changing their loud notes to chirping; the cataracts roared, and every linden tree whistled and brayed to the sounding of the wind. The poor labourers, wet and weary, dragged in the fen. The sheep and shepherds lurked under the hanging banks, or wild broom. Warm from the chimney side, and refreshed with generous cheer, I stole to my bed, and laid down to sleep, when I saw the moon shed through the window her wintry glances, and wintry light; I heard the horned bird, the night-owl, shrieking horribly, with crooked bill, from her cavern. I heard the wild geese, with screaming cries, fly over the city through the silent night. I was soon lulled to sleep, till the cock, clapping his wings, crowed thrice, and the day peeped. I waked, and saw the moon disappear, and heard the jackdaws cackle on the roof of the house. The cranes, prognosticating a tempest, in a firm phalanx, pierced the air with voices sounding like a trumpet. The kite, perched on an old tree, fast by my chamber, cried lamentably,—a sign of the dawning day. I rose, and half opening my window, perceived the morning, livid, wan, and hoary; the air overwhelmed with vapour and cloud; the ground stiff, grey, and rough; the branches rattling; the sides of the hill looking black and hard with the driving blasts; the dew-drops congealed on the stubble and rind of trees; the sharp hailstones, deadly cold, hopping on the thatch and neighbouring causeway.

We are now placed in the midst of such wintry scenes as this. Nature is stripped of all her summer drapery. Her verdure, her foliage, her flowers have all vanished. The sky is filled with clouds and gloom, or sparkles only with a frosty radiance. The earth is spongy with wet, rigid with frost, or buried in snow. The winds that in summer breathed gently over nodding blooms, and undulating grass, swaying the leafy boughs with a pleasant murmur, and wafting perfumes all over the world, now hiss like serpents, or howl like wild beasts of the desert; cold, piercing, and cruel. Everything has drawn as near as possible to the centre of warmth and comfort. The farmer has driven his flocks and cattle into sheltered home-enclosures, where they may receive from his provident care that food which the earth now denies them; or in the farm-yard itself, where some honest Gilles piles their cratches plentifully with fodder. The labourer has fled from the field to the barn, and the measured strokes of his flail are heard daily from morn to eve. It amazes us, as we walk abroad, to conceive where can have concealed themselves the infinite variety of creatures that sported through the air, earth, and waters of summer.

Birds, insects, reptiles, whither are they all gone? The birds that filled the air with their music, the rich blackbird, the loud and cheerful thrush, the linnet, lark, and goldfinch, whither have they crept? The squirrel that played his antics on the forest tree; and all the showy varied tribes of butterflies, moths, dragonflies, beetles, wasps, and warrior hornets, bees and cock-chafers, whither have they fled? Some, no doubt, have lived out their little term of being, and their little bodies, lately so splendid, active and alive to a thousand instincts, feelings, and propensities, are become part and parcel of the dull and wintry soil; but the greater portion have shrunk into the hollows of trees and rocks, and into the bosom of their mother earth itself, where, with millions of seeds and roots, and buds, they live in the great treasury of Nature, ready, at the call of a more auspicious season, to people the world once more with beauty and delight.

As in the inferior world of creatures, so it is with man. The wealthy have vacated their country-houses, and congregated in the great Babylon of pleasure and dissipation; families are collected round the social hearth, where Christmas brings his annual store of frolic and festivities; and the author, like the bee, withdrawn to his hive, revels amid the sweets of his summer gathering.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. XLVI.—ADVENTURES OF RIPERDA.

THIS account of Riperda, may, to some, look too much like a page out of history; yet surely a Dutchman who becomes a Spanish Catholic minister, and dies a bashaw, may be considered a curiosity, in the more fantastic sense of the word. Riperda was truly what is called an adventurer; that is to say, a man formed only to go on from one adventure to another, without obtaining any settled and noble success. He was of a class of men, whose brains, very clever in all the rest, appear to want a portion common to the rest of mankind, and necessary to keep them in equilibrium. A bit of it seems broken off, or omitted; and so the poor creature keeps turning about from project to project, and creed to creed, like the convert described by Butler:—

A convert's but a fly, that turns about,
After his head's pulled off, to find it out.

Riperda was a native of Groningen, towards the close of the seventeenth century, for the materials of whose singular life and adventures we are indebted to the late Dr Campbell, and for many new facts to the ingenious rector of Bemerton (Archdeacon Cox).

The last writer, admitted to sources of information which few private men can have any access to, has, in his Apology for Sir Robert Walpole, performed the task committed to his care in a dexterous and pleasing manner.

It must be confessed, that when the transactions of ministers and statesmen are to be delineated and laid before the public, a writer is placed in a situation peculiar and delicate; more particularly when those individuals to whom he is indebted for important papers, are immediate descendants from the illustrious persons whose history he writes.

To investigate characters, and decide on measures when party zeal, inflamed resentments, and family prejudice, have not had time to cool, has been aptly compared by Horace, to treading on ashes, beneath which unextinguished fire is concealed. In such cases, an author has a difficult part to act; to avoid the bias of gratitude and private interest; to speak not only truth, but the whole truth; to avoid exciting the malignity of powerful enemies, but at the same time to preserve unblemished his integrity and literary reputation with the public.

Riperda, the subject of my present page, inheriting from nature, activity, and acuteness, and uniting to a warm imagination a more than moderate confidence in his own abilities, applied with indefatigable industry to literature and science.

After a well-planned and well-executed education, under the superintendence of his father, who was descended from a good family, in the province where he resided, the young man passed the earlier part of his life in the army, in which he deserved and obtained promotion.

His military progress added a general knowledge of the world and agreeable manners to his more solid acquisitions; but he suffered no pursuit, either of business or of pleasure, to interrupt the cultivation of his mind. His morning hours were sacred; and while his associates in winter quarters were lost in the stupifying indolence of superfluous sleep, or in recovering from a nocturnal debauch, the more diligent Dutchman was trimming his early lamp.

He exerted himself more peculiarly in procuring information on every subject directly or remotely connected with manufactures and trade; he made himself acquainted with the population and the wants of the different powers in Europe; with the natural produce and raw materials each country yielded, and the various commodities they were under the necessity of providing from their neighbours.

Having formed himself precisely for managing the concerns of a mercantile country, soon after the peace of Utrecht, he was appointed envoy from the United Provinces to the court of Madrid, for the purpose of negotiating a commercial treaty with the King of Spain.

This complicated business he conducted with so much address, and turned his book knowledge, which men of business are so apt to think so lightly of, to so much account, that he attracted the favour of Cardinal Alberoni, who, from being a curate in the Duchy of Parma, had, by fortunate and well-improved incident, gained the patronage of the Princess Ursini, and was, at the moment, prime minister of Spain.

At Madrid, he found Mr Doddington, who was sent on a similar business, by his master, the King of England.

The English envoy, better skilled in borough arrangements than the intricacies of foreign politics, derived so much benefit from the correct official statements and the authentic documents of Riperda, that he received many warm acknowledgments from Lord Townshend, at that time a cabinet minister at the court of London.

These flattering circumstances first occasioned the subject of our present article to meditate establishing himself in Spain; he was induced to this project by remembering that it required no very consummate abilities to pass for a deep politician at Madrid, where many foreigners had been advanced to high honours and confidential trusts, who had no other recommendation than a good voice, a dexterous finger, a pleasing countenance, or a handsome leg.

Finding the Protestant religion a considerable impediment to his advancement, he publicly abjured the faith in which he had been educated, and was eagerly admitted into the Catholic church.

This change of opinion, or of profession, so favourable to his political career, does not appear to have improved his morals; for, in a pecuniary transaction, Riparda was accused of imposing on Mr Doddington. This ill-timed incident lost him Alberoni's favour, and he was soon after dismissed from the lucrative post of superintendent of a royal manufactory, to which he had been appointed.

The Dutchman always repelled this degrading accusation with spirit, insisting that the money received, ten thousand pistoles, was no more than a moderate reward for the important diplomatic benefits he had conferred, by advice and communication, on the infant statesman, that being the appellation he bestowed,—alluding, I apprehend, rather to his want of experience than of years. He asserted that part of the cash had been actually expended in obtaining secret intelligence for the Englishman. Who shall decide when statesmen disagree? Sometimes, in these collusions, a spark of truth, useful to honest men, is struck out.

Riparda observed that, on this occasion, he had acted towards the unfledged envoy as a prudent physician would treat an illiberal and parsimonious patient, who insidiously picked out his opinions and advice during accidental conversations, without offering a fee: he had paid himself.

It is not easy now to decide on the positive criminality or relative equity of this transaction; it must, however, be confessed that internal evidence, deduced from the subsequent conduct of Riparda, and the left-handed, characteristic cunning of his countrymen, who generally over-reach themselves, tell rather against him.

But this obliquity of conduct does not appear to have retarded his political progress: he joined the enemies of Alberoni, and, in the place from which he had been dismissed, having been kindly noticed by the royal family, was frequently consulted by the principal secretary, Grimaldo; and, what in Spain is an object of the greatest importance, Riparda became a favourite with the King's confessor.

In this advantageous position, he intrigued and caballed against the cardinal; contributed powerfully towards his dismission; and, dazzled by the bright prospect which opened before him, confiding in superior abilities, or his personal influence with the King, he was ambitious of succeeding the ex-minister.

But, when his appointment was proposed in council, strong representations were made against the placing at the head of his Majesty's government an alien and a new convert from heresy, whose integrity was already suspected.

A further discussion was delayed by Phillip's abdicating the Spanish throne; but when the royal seceder resumed his crown, Riparda was still his confidential favourite, and ingratiated himself more particularly with the Queen, by promoting a marriage between Don Carlos and an Archduchess of the House of Austria.

On this occasion, he was sent ambassador to the Emperor of Germany, and during his mission to Vienna, acquired considerable popularity, as well by the unqualified warmth of his declarations in favour of German connections, as by the hospitality of his table, the splendour of his retinue, and the punctuality of his payments.

A new system of politics, different views, and probably the pecuniary embarrass with Mr Doddington, gradually estranged him from his former attachment to England, and he poured forth a foul stream of virulent invective against this country for hesitating to fulfil her engagements, one of which he positively insisted was an immediate and unqualified cessation of the important fortress of Gibraltar.

In reply, it was acknowledged that the subject had been pressed by the Spanish minister, and a promise made to take it into consideration; but when the outrageous statesman was informed that, in Great Britain, the will of a sovereign, or the wishes of his minister, are impotent and ineffectual without parliamentary concurrence, he burst into passionate, vehement, and unbecoming expressions; threatened that he would land twenty thousand men in Scotland, send home the Elector of Hanover, and place the lawful sovereign, a legitimate descendant of King James II, on the English throne.

Having concluded with the Emperor a treaty, by which the King and Queen of Spain were highly gratified, he hastened to Madrid, where he was received with rapturous acknowledgments, but he treated his friend Grimaldo with ungrateful coldness, and the day after his arrival was appointed to succeed him as principal secretary of state; he transacted business at the council board and with foreign ambassadors, thus enjoying the uncontrolled authority of Alberoni, without the name of prime minister.

But it was soon found, with all his predominating address and eminent talents, that he was unfit for the high office he filled; that he was vain, turbulent, and insolent; without regularity, prudence, moderation, or consistency of conduct; in a word, that he possessed great powers and attainments, but wanted prudence and common sense.

The King, by more frequent intercourse, soon saw the deficiency of Riparda in these indispensable requisites, and in a short time he ceased to be a favourite.

It is not improbable that the minister became giddy from the height to which he was elevated; being hated by the officers of state who were obliged to attend him, and detested by the people, his situation was awkward and perilous: yet at a crowded levee he had the folly or the assurance to exclaim, "I know that the whole kingdom is irritated against me, but their malice I defy; safe under the protection of God, the blessed virgin, and the goodness of my intentions."

The general aversion every day increasing, and Riparda's imprudence keeping pace with his unpopularity, it was found necessary to remove him. His dismission, according to the usual court etiquette, being called a resignation, and his temper smoothed by a liberal pension.

But this pacific treatment had no effect in quieting the exasperated Dutchman; his angry passions raged with unabated fury, and he vowed eternal vengeance against a country so blind to his merits.

Being possessed of secrets which the English ministry were anxious to become acquainted with, he opened a clandestine intercourse with the English ambassador, Stanhope; his former friend, Doddington, having been recalled.

The curses of the people, artfully fomented by his enemies, were by this time not only deep, but loud; he was fearful of an attack on his person, and he fled to that gentleman's house.

His intrigues with England, and other hostile designs being now discovered, he was dragged from his retreat, taken into custody, and imprisoned in the castle of Segovia.

Taking advantage of the infirmity or neglect of his keepers, and assisted by a female domestic, who first pitying had then loved him, he bribed a nocturnal sentinel, and by means of a rope ladder effected his escape.

With these companions, and after a long, anxious, and fatiguing journey, he reached Oporto, and embarked without delay for England, where he was received with respect and attention by the King's ministers.

But when Sir Robert Walpole had gained from the fugitive every necessary information, he was gradually neglected, and, as is the case with all betrayers of their trust, at last despised, even by those who had derived advantage from his treachery.

A man like Riparda, who had directed national councils and had been listened to by kings, who abounded in pride, and swelled with indignation, could not but feel this degraded situation most acutely. After two years passed in the English metropolis, in unavailing impatience, passion and regret, but with undiminished hatred against everything Spanish, he withdrew to Holland.

In that republic he found an agent from Barbary, who being acquainted with his story, conceived that his thirst for vengeance might be productive of important advantages to the sovereign by whom he was employed.

This person was an envoy from that barbarian whom we condescend to call the Emperor of Morocco. He assured Riparda that all his efforts in Europe would be ineffectual, in consequence of the important changes which had recently taken place in continental politics; but that on the borders of his master's territories in Africa, he might annoy his enemies and gratify his revenge most effectually; that he would there possess the advantage of a geographical position, in which, to defeat the Spaniards would be to exterminate them, and that he would receive ample rewards from a grateful ally stimulated by the hereditary impulse of eternal hatred and national antipathy.

Riparda heard and was convinced: revenge, the most infernal, but the most seducing of all our crimes, quickening all his measures and smoothing every difficulty, with the two companions of his flight he sailed for Africa, and after a prosperous voyage, announced his arrival and the object of his views to Muly Abdallah, who eagerly accepted his services.

The Dutchman, who, like his countrymen, for a productive cargo would have trod on the cross at Japan, embraced the Mahometan faith, adopted the dress, conformed to the manners, and gained the esteem of that African chief.

In less than two months he was advanced to the post of prime minister, and shortly after appointed commander-in-chief of his forces, with unusual discretionary power.

The new general, animated by the spur of the occasion, lost no time in improving the army placed under his guidance, by every means in his power.

He represented to Abdallah the insufficiency of the desultory and irregular modes of attack generally practised by the Moors, by which, although at their first onset they sometimes break down all before them, are, if they fail, generally productive of irrecoverable confusion, slaughter, and defeat.

With the Emperor's permission, Riparda, for so I continue to call him, although the renegade had assumed another name, with the Emperor's permission, he rigidly enforced the severe maxims of European tactics, silent and prompt obedience, irresistible energy, patient and cool dexterity, which, at the mouth of a cannon, the mounting a breach, or the springing of a mine, convert an otherwise unmanageable mob into a compact magic machine, various in form, but of tremendous power: a widely spread line, a hollow square, a wedge, a column, or a platoon.

Thus improved and thus directed, the barbarians attacked the Spaniards, and irrecoverably defeated them: their leader was created a bashaw, and died at Tetuan, in extreme old age, some time in the year 1787.

Such was Riparda; with a strong mind, and talents improved by assiduous cultivation, placed on elevated ground, and possessing a considerable share of book learning, and no small portion of general and local information, he missed the high road to happiness: all his parts and all his acquisitions did not guard him against obliquity and crooked policy, which in this, as in most instances, generally defeat their own purpose. He has added to the many instances which pointedly prove, after all the contrivances of cunning, and the deep stratagems of finesse, that honesty is the best policy; that her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace.

LIFE & CHARACTER OF MÆCENAS.

We gave the other day an interesting account of a splendid and luxurious Roman orator, from Mr Dymlop's 'History of Roman Literature.' We follow it up from the same work, with a portrait of an effeminate statesman, who wielded the empire with rings on his little finger.

A Mæcenas, all over Christendom, means a patron of genius. It is curious, even to scholars, to contemplate a summary of the life and character of the singular personage whose name has become thus generously immortal. He deserves his immortality; and yet he was a dandy of the most luxurious description amidst the iron and marble of old Rome, —the most effeminate of the effeminate, as Ney was "bravest of the brave." The probable secret of this weakness in a great man (for great he was both as a statesman and a discerner of greatness in others) was to be found in excessive weakness of constitution.

At the commencement of the reign of Augustus, the old Cæsarians, Balbus, Matius, and Appius, men who were highly accomplished and had been the chief personal friends of the great Julius, still survived, and led the way in every species of learning and elegance. Their correspondence with Cicero, in his Familiar Epistles, exhibits much refinement in the individuals, and in general a highly polished state of society. They had a taste for gardening, planting, and architecture, and all those various arts which contribute to the embellishment of life. They rewarded the verses of poets, listened to their productions and courted their society. When Augustus landed in Italy from Apollonia, Balbus was the first person who came to offer his services, and Matius took charge of the shows which he exhibited on his arrival at Rome. These ancient friends of the Julian line continued, during the early part of his reign, to frequent the court of Augustus; and, though not first in favour with the new sovereign, they felt no jealousy of their successor, but lived on the most cordial and intimate terms with Mæcenas, who now held, near the person of the adopted son, the enviable place which they had occupied with the father.

To this favourite minister of Augustus the honour is due of having successfully followed out the views of his master for promoting the interests of literature. Some writers have alleged that, after the battle of Actium, a deliberate design was formed by Mæcenas to soften the heart of Augustus, and that, among the arts which he employed for this purpose, one of the chief was, the encouragement of learned men and poets, who would imperceptibly give him lessons of moderation, and incline his heart to justice and clemency. But this is refining too much; and it seems more probable, that in his patronage of literature, Mæcenas merely acted from the orders, or followed the example, of his master.

Caius Cilnius Mæcenas was descended, it is said, from Elbius Volterrenus, the last king, or rather Lucumon of the Etrurians, who perished in the 445th year of the city, at the battle near the lake Vadimone, which finally brought his country under total subjection to the Romans. His immediate ancestors were Roman knights, who having been at length incorporated into the state, held high commands in the army, and Mæcenas would never consent to leave their class to be enrolled among the senators; but he was proud, (as may be conjectured from its frequent mention by the poets), of his supposed descent from the old Etrurian princes. It is not known in what year he was born, or in what manner he spent his youth; but Meibomius conjectures that he was educated at Apollonia along with Augustus and Agrippa; and that this formed the commencement of their memorable friendship. He is not mentioned in the history of his country, till we hear of his accompanying Augustus to Rome, after the battle of Modena. He was also with him at Philippi; and attended him during the whole course of the naval wars against Sextus Pompey, except when he was sent at intervals by his master to Rome, in order by his presence to quell those disturbances, which, during this period, frequently broke out in the capital. In the battle of Actium he commanded the light Liburnian galleys, which greatly contributed to gain the victory, for Augustus, and he gave chase with them to Anthony, when he fled after the galley of Cleopatra. During the absence of his master in Egypt, Mæcenas, in virtue of his office of Prefect, was entrusted with the chief administration of affairs in Italy, and particularly with the civil government of the capital. After Augustus had returned from Egypt without a rival, and the affairs of the empire proceeded in a regular course, Mæcenas shared with Agrippa the favour and confidence of his sovereign. While Agrippa was entrusted with affairs requiring activity, gravity, and force, those which were to be accomplished by persuasion and address were to be committed to Mæcenas. The advice which he gave to Augustus in the celebrated consultation with regard to his proposed resignation of the empire was preferred to that of Agrippa; Mæcenas having justly represented that it would not be to the advantage of Rome to be left without a head to the government, as the vast empire now required a single chief to maintain peace and order; that Augustus had already advanced too far to recede with safety; and that, if divested of absolute power, he would speedily fall a victim to the resentment of the friends or relatives of those whom he had formerly sacrificed to his own security.

Having agreed to retain the government, Augustus asked and obtained from Mæcenas a general plan for its administration. His minister laid down for him rules regarding the reformation of the Senate, the nomination of magistrates, the collection of taxes, the establishment of schools, the government of provinces, the levy of troops, the equalization of weights and measures, the suppression of tumultuous assemblies, and support of religious observances. His measures on all these points, as detailed by Dion Cassius, show consummate political wisdom and knowledge in the science of government.

Mæcenas had often mediated between Anthony and Augustus, and healed the mutual wounds which their ambition inflicted. But when his master had at length triumphed in the contest, the great object of his attention was to secure the permanence of the government. For this purpose, he had spies in all corners to pry into every assembly, and to watch the motions of the people. By these means the imprudent plots of Lepidus and Muræna were discovered and suppressed, without danger or disturbance; and, at length, no conspiracies were formed. At the same time, and with a similar object, he did all in his power to render the administration of Augustus moderate and just; and as he perfectly understood all the virtues and weaknesses of his character, he easily bent his disposition to the side of mercy. While he himself, as Prefect of the city, had retained the capital in admirable order and subjection, he was yet remarkable for the mildness with which he exercised this important office, to which belonged the management of all civil affairs in the absence of the Emperor, the regulation of buildings, provisions, and commerce, and the cognizance of all crimes committed within a hundred miles of the capital. Seneca, who is by no means favourable in other respects to the character of Mæcenas, allows him a full tribute of praise for his clemency and mildness. "Maxima laus illi tribuitur mansuetudinis; pepercet gladio, sanguine abstinent; nec ullâ alia re quid posset, quam licentiâ, ostendit."

So sensible was Augustus of the benefit which his government received from the counsels and wise administration of Mæcenas, and such his high opinion of his sagacity, fidelity and secrecy, that everything which concerned him, whether political or domestic, was confided to this minister. Such, too, were the terms of intimacy on which they lived, that the Emperor when he fell sick, always made himself be carried to the house of Mæcenas: so difficult was it to find repose in the habitation of a prince.

During the most important and arduous periods of his administration, and while exercising almost an unremitted assiduity, Mæcenas had still the appearance of being sunk in sloth and luxury. Though he could exert himself with the utmost activity and vigilance, when these were required, yet, in his hours of freedom, he indulged himself in as much ease and softness as the most delicate lady in Rome. He was moderate in his desire of wealth or honours; he was probably indolent and voluptuous by nature and inclination; and he rather wished to exhibit than conceal his faults. But the thundering applause, which we are told by Horace resounded through the theatre, when he first appeared in that place of public resort, after a long and severe indisposition, evinces that his manners succeeded in gaining him popularity among his fellow-citizens. Dion Cassius also informs us, that he was beloved by those around the person of Augustus, to whose jealousy and envy he was more immediately exposed. That air of effeminate ease which he ever assumed, was, perhaps, good policy, in reference both to the prince and the people. Neither could he be jealous of a minister who was apparently so careless and indifferent, and who seemed occupied chiefly with his magnificent villas and costly furniture. He usually came abroad with a negligent gait and in a coarse garb. When he went to the theatre, forum, or senate, his ungirt robe trailed on the ground; and he wore a little cloak, with a hood like a fugitive slave in a pantomime. Instead of being followed by lictors or tribunes, he appeared in all public places attended by two eunuchs. He possessed a magnificent and spacious villa on the Esquiline Hill, to which a tower adjoined, commanding a view of all the hills of Rome and the surrounding country, in different directions, as far as Tibur, Tusculum, and Præneste. The inner walls of this villa were of foreign marble, the ceiling glittered with gold, and the floors were of corresponding splendour. All the apartments were richly furnished. The tables were particularly costly, and of various forms. Having a passion for gems and pearls, Mæcenas had many jewellers and engravers in his employment, and his cabinet was adorned with all sorts of trinkets and precious stones, which his freedman, Thalation, had engraved and set in gold. Each chamber was likewise stored with precious ointments, and with every species of balsam, perfume, and essence, which might be refreshing or agreeable to the senses.

The gardens of Mæcenas which surrounded the villa, were among the most delightful in Rome or its vicinity. The ground, which was given to him by Augustus to lay out in gardens, was previously the most unhealthy spot in the city. It had formerly been a burying place, where the bodies of slaves and of those who had squandered their estates, were confusedly interred. The air, in consequence, was unwholesome, and noxious to the whole town. But Mæcenas converted this cemetery into a spot the most salubrious and delightful; adorning it with every species of rare and exotic plants; and forming walks, along which were placed statues of the most exquisite sculpture. Here, seated in the cool of his green spreading shade, where the most musical birds constantly warbled their harmonious notes, he was accustomed to linger, and pay at idle hours, his court to the muses—

Fleridas Phœbumque colens in mollibus hortis,
Sederat argutas garrulus inter aves.

In one corner of this garden stood a temple to Priapus, where Mæcenas often resorted with his friends, who there recited, or inscribed on the walls, the verses which they had composed in honour of the productive god. These poems were written in the style supposed to be suitable to the divinity whom they celebrated. Hence was formed the collection which derives its name from Priapus, and to which Tibullus, and even Virgil, are said to have contributed.

Being fond of change and singularity, the style of Mæcenas' entertainments varied. They were sometimes profuse and magnificent; at others, elegant and private; but they were always inimitable in point of taste and fancy. He was the first person who introduced at Rome the luxury of young mules' flesh; his table was served with the most delicious wines, among which was one of Italian growth, and most exquisite flavour, called from his name Mæcenateum; and hence, too, the luxurious Trimalchio, who is the Magister Convivii in the Satyricon of Petronius Arbiter, is called Mæcenateum, from his imitating the style of Mæcenas' entertainments.

His sumptuous board was thronged with parasites, whom he also frequently carried about to sup with his friends; and his house was filled with musicians, buffoons, and actors of mimes or pantomimes, with Bathyllus at their head. These were strangely intermingled in his palace with tribunes, clerks, and lictors. But there too were Horace, and Varius, and Valgius, and Virgil!

Of these distinguished poets, and of many other literary men, Mæcenas was, during his whole life, the patron, protector, and friend. Desert in learning never failed, in course of time, to obtain from him its due reward; and his friendship, when once procured, continued steady to the last. Poets, however, seem always to have enjoyed a preference; and the first place in his favour was justly held by those who ranked highest in their number. Had he not loved and cherished, posterity, perhaps, would have been deprived of the chief works of the Mantuan bard, and would have known him only by his imitative Eclogues:—

Ipse per Ausonias Æneis carmina gentes
Qui canit, ingenti qui nomine pulsat Olympum, Mæoniamque senem Romano provocat ore,
Forsitan illius memoris latuisset in umbrâ
Quod canit, et sterili tantum cantasset avenâ,
Ignotus populis, si Mæcenate careret.

It was Virgil who first introduced Horace to the notice of Mæcenas; and though at first he paid no great attention to a young poet, as yet little distinguished by his works, and chiefly known as having fought in the Republican ranks at Philippi, he admitted him at length among the number of his domestic friends, selected him as a companion in all his expeditions, whether of business or pleasure; procured for him the favour of the Emperor, and at length gave him the most substantial proof of regard, by presenting him with a villa at Tibur, and obtaining for him a grant of a farm, in the eastern district of the Sabine territory. Varius, who was the first tragic writer of his age, and, till the appearance of the Æneid, was accounted the greatest epic poet of Rome, and next in rank to Homer, as also Domitius Marsus, the best epigrammatist since the time of Catullus, were befriended and enriched by Mæcenas. Propertius, likewise, in his elegies, repeatedly acknowledged him as his protector, as the encourager and guide of his studies, and as the statesman to whose party and principles he had uniformly and steadily adhered. To other writers and learned men whom he patronized, the palace of Mæcenas was an asylum, where they were not only maintained and protected, but became the friends and companions of their illustrious host. They were introduced by him to his prince, as persons deserving of notice and royal munificence; they accompanied him to the banquets of the great, and followed him in many excursions both of pleasure and business. When he went to Brundisium, to negotiate a treaty between Augustus and Anthony, he was attended on his journey by Horace, Varius, Virgil, and Heliodorus.

Among the most distinguished men who frequented the house of Mæcenas, a constant harmony seems to have subsisted. They never occasioned uneasiness to each other; they were neither jealous nor envious of the favour and felicity which their rivals enjoyed. The noblest and most affluent of the number were without insolence, and the most learned without presumption. Merit, in whatever shape it appeared, occupied an honourable and unmolested station.

As Mæcenas extended such liberal patronage to the learned, it is not surprising that the greatest productions of the Augustan age should have been inscribed by their authors with his name, in testimony of their respect and gratitude. At the head of these glorious works stand the Georgics of Virgil and Satires of Horace.

Mæcenas is better known to posterity as a patron of literature than as an author; but, living in a poetical court, and surrounded with poets, it was almost impossible that he should have avoided the contagion of versification. He wrote a tragedy, called Octavia; a poem, intitled De Cultu; and some Phæleucian and Galliambic verses. All these have perished, except a few fragments cited by Seneca and the ancient grammarians. To judge from these extracts, their loss is not much to be regretted; and it is a curious problem in the literary history of Rome, that one who read with delight the works of Horace, should have himself written in a style so obscure and affected. The Roman critics have collected examples of uncommon inversions in language from their poets and orators, which have found a place in their works of rhetoric; and Quintilian refers to many arrangements of words in the poems of Mæcenas, which he thinks not allowable even in verse. The effeminacy of his manners appears to have tainted his language: though his ideas were sometimes happy, his style was loose, florid, and luxuriant; and he always aimed at winding up his periods with some turn of thought or expression which he considered elegant or striking. These conceits were called by Augustus his perfumed curls (Calamistri); and, in one of that Emperor's letters which is still preserved in Macrobius, he parodies the luxuriant and sparkling style affected by his minister.

Some idea of the mode of composition employed by Mæcenas, at least in his smaller poems, may be formed from the following lines, in which he describes a river, with the woods on its banks, and the boats sailing on it, in a manner almost unintelligible:—

Amne sylvisque ripa comantibus,
Vides, ut alveum lintribus arent,
Versoque vado remittant hortos.

Or from the verses addressed to Horace, in which he declares that he is so grieved for the absence of the poet, that he has become careless, even concerning those gems for which he once had such an inordinate passion:—

Lugens, O mea vita, te Smaragdus
Beryllos neque, Flacce, nec nitentes
Nuper, candida Margarita, quæro,
Nec quos Thynica lima perpolivit
Anellos, nec Jaspiri Lapillos.

One good and energetic line of his composition is preserved and applauded by Seneca:—

Nec tumulum curo, sepelit natura relictos.

Mæcenas continued to govern the state, to patronize good poets, and write bad verses, for a period of twenty years. During this long space of time, the only interruption to his felicity was the conduct of his wife, Terentia. This beautiful but capricious woman was the sister of Proculeius, so eminent for his fraternal love, as also of Licinia Murena, who conspired against Augustus; and she is supposed by some, though I think erroneously, to be the Licymnia whom Horace celebrates for her personal charms and accomplishments, and for the passion with which she had inspired his patron. The extravagance and bad temper of this fantastical, yet lovely woman, were sources of perpetual chagrin and uneasiness to her husband. Though his existence was embittered by her folly and caprice, he continued through his whole life to be the dupe of the passion which he entertained for her. He could neither live with nor without her; he quarrelled with her, and was reconciled, almost every day, and put her away one moment to take her back the next, which led Seneca to remark that he was married a thousand times, yet never had but one wife.

Terentia vied in personal charms with the Empress Livia, and is said to have gained the affections of Augustus. She accompanied her husband and the Emperor on an expedition to Gaul, in the year 738, which, at the time, was reported to have been undertaken in order that Augustus might enjoy her society without attracting the notice or animadversions of the capital. Mæcenas was not courtier enough to appear blind to the infidelities of Terentia, or to sleep for the accommodation of the Emperor, as the senator Galba is said to have slumbered for the minister. The umbrage Mæcenas took at the attentions paid by his master to Terentia is assigned by Dio Cassius as the chief cause of the decline of that imperial favour which Mæcenas experienced about forty years previously to his death. For although he was still treated externally with the highest consideration, though he retained all the outward show of grandeur and influence, and still continued to make a yearly present to the Emperor on the anniversary of his birth-day, he was no longer consulted in state affairs as a favourite or confident. Others have supposed that it was not the intrigue of Augustus with Terentia that diminished his influence, but a discovery made by the Emperor, that he had revealed to his wife some circumstances concerning the conspiracy in which her brother Murena had been engaged. Suetonius informs us he had felt some displeasure on that account; but Murena's plot was discovered in the year 732, and the decline of Mæcenas' political power cannot be placed earlier than the year 738. The disgust conceived by masters when they have given all, and by favourites who have nothing more to receive, or are satiated with honours, may partly account for the coldness that arose between Augustus and his minister. But the declining health of Mæcenas, and his natural indolence, increasing with the advance of years, afforded of themselves sufficient causes for his gradual retirement from public affairs. His constitution, which was naturally weak, had been impaired by effeminacy and luxurious living. He had laboured from his youth under a perpetual fever; and for many years before his death he suffered much from watchfulness, which was greatly aggravated by his domestic chagrins. Mæcenas was fond of life and enjoyment; and of life even without enjoyment. Hence he anxiously resorted to different remedies for the cure or relief of this distressing malady. Wine, soft music sounding at a distance, and various other contrivances, were tried in vain. At length, Antonius Musa, the imperial physician, who had saved the life of Augustus, but accelerated the death of Marcellus, obtained for him some alleviation of his complaint, by means of the distant murmuring of falling water. The sound was artificially procured at his villa on the Esquiline-hill. But during this stage of his complaint, Mæcenas resided principally in his villa at Tibur, situated on the banks of the Anio, and near its celebrated cascades. The chief falls of the Anio were heard at the villa, but there were also a number of jets, formed by the stream, which flowed down the hill, on which the palace of Mæcenas stood aloft. "Mæcenas' villa," says Eustace, "stands at the extremity of the town, on the
